When asked how we knew of criminal records of undocumented aliens, he said, "these are estimates, part of a study," but couldn't say specifically to what study he was referring.

"Part of the problem is that we have some very serious stereotypes that have become fears," said Rolando Andrade, associate professor of ethnic studies and a native of Aguascalientes, Mexico. "Fears that Mexicans will destroy the economy, that they are criminals, that they will take and not give back."

"These fears are being manipulated by conservative politicians to get elected."

Another part of the problem, according to Andrade, is the legal immigration process.

For Mexicans, the process is expensive and can take up to a year.

But the only American consulate to offer immigration visas is in Ciudad Juarez, just across the border from El Paso, Tex.

After he was done speaking he took questions from students in the audience. Questions ranged from inquiring about Cosby's own interests in promoting education to asking his advice on what to do with young students who want to drop out of school. The overwhelming theme of Cosby's discussion was to encourage the teachers to establish their own goal. He said without doing so, teachers cannot help the lost student looking to drop out of school.

"You have to know your passion. If you can't defend it, then put the chalk down and go get a job at the post-office," said Cosby.

Cosby answered a variety of questions, ranging from inquiries about his personal interests to advice for teachers.

Defense Department claims duty to disclose vaccine risks

The Pentagon said Oct. 16, 2006, that it will force troops to be vaccinated against anthrax, restarting the program after U.S. regulators declared the shots safe and effective.

eral hundred thousand troops that will be deploying to Iraq, Afghanistan and other dangerous locations.

Pentagon officials are also working with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to determine if at least one of the six initial shots can be eliminated. The vaccine also requires an annual booster shot.

Other groups questioned the vaccine's safety.

"The [Defense Department] has a moral duty to fully disclose anthrax vaccine risks, as well as benefits, to soldiers and allow them to make an informed, voluntary vaccination decision," said Barbara Loe Fisher, president of the nonprofit National Vaccine Information Center.

The center has launched the Military and Biodefense Vaccine Project to inform the public and service members about potential illnesses, disabilities and deaths that may be associated with the vaccine.

Mother calls 911 when daughter is near death

any problems immediately after piercing her bellybutton in December 2004, but began to have diarrhea in June 2005 after she reinserted a belly ring that she had taken out months earlier.

After a brief improvement, she began to feel worse in July, when she said she lost her appetite and felt so weak that she spent most of her time lying on the couch.

"I started getting real sick for about two to three weeks before I went to the hospital," she said.

She said her stomach was bloated and a hole beneath her navel was oozing puss. She said she ate only "little tidbits," like soup, noodles and orange slices.

Her mother, she said, gave her orange juice and would adjust the temperature in the house to try to make her comfortable. Several days before she was hospitalized, she said, she stopped eating altogether.

In some ways, the girl's account matched the description given by prosecutors, who said the girl's illness worsened over a period of weeks while her mother did not seek any medical attention.

Assistant District Attorney David Deakin said that by the time Robinson called 911 on Aug. 3, 2005, her daughter was near death with a massive infection that had damaged her internal organs.

But the girl's account also contradicted claims made by prosecutors who said she would have been in intense pain because of the damage the infection had done to her organs.

"It wasn't physical pain to the point where I was wailing on the couch," she said. "I wasn't in pain."

At another point in her testimony, the girl said her illness "was kind of like period cramps the first couple of weeks, so I kind of blew it off."

When asked by her mother's lawyer, Janet Macnab, if she thought she needed a doctor, the girl replied, "I didn't think I needed hospital care."

Deakin told jurors Friday that Robinson watched as her daughter dropped from 115 pounds to 75 pounds, became incontinent and was so weak she couldn't get up off the couch.

An EMT testified that when he arrived at the family's apartment in a public housing project in Hyde Park, the girl was emaciated, wearing only a shirt and an adult diaper, and appeared to be unconscious.

Robinson, 39, is charged with wantonly and recklessly permitting substantial bodily injury to a child under 14, a felony that carries a maximum prison term of five years.

Her lawyer told jurors that Robinson was not the indifferent mother prosecutors described, but instead was a struggling single mother of two who tried to care for her daughter at home and called 911 when she realized her daughter was seriously ill.

Her defense rested its case Monday after calling the girl and her 16-year-old brother as witnesses. Robinson did not testify in her own defense.

Pentagon withholds information on photographer detained in Iraq

By Robert Tanner
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Pentagon has brushed off a request from a journalist organization seeking more information and a decision on Bilal Hussein, an Associated Press photographer held for six months in Iraq without formal charges.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman, in a letter to the Committee to Protect Journalists, did not provide details about why Iraqi photographer Bilal Hussein continues to be held without charges at a U.S.-run prison camp. He instead repeated the military's longstanding assertion that it detained Hussein under authority of U.N. resolutions and in accord with the Geneva Conventions.

Hussein was arrested in Ramadi on April 12. The military has said he was in the company of two alleged insurgents, in an apartment where there were bomb-making materials, and that his detention was for "imperative reasons of security" under U.N. resolutions. His "strong ties" to insurgents go beyond the basis of a journalist, the military has said.

The Associated Press last month made a public call for the military to either charge Hussein with a crime or release him.

After the AP request, Paul Steiger, chairman of the Committee to Protect Journalists, sought information about Hussein's detention and asked for the Pentagon to say whether it would charge him with a crime. He noted that in several cases where journalists have been detained by U.S. forces for lengthy periods, they ultimately were released without charges or convictions.

If U.S. military officials do not intend to charge Hussein with a crime we believe he should be released at once," Steiger wrote.

Whitman in his response, said Hussein has been notified and given an opportunity to provide information for consideration in at least two of three military reviews of his detention.

But an AP executive said that was true only for one of the three hearings, and the notice came after the hearing took place.

"Bilal Hussein was not aware that any of these took place," said Dave Tomlin, AP's associate general counsel. "So he obviously wasn't present for any of them, nor was he represented at any of them."

"We regard all these so-called due process events as legally meaningless and in fact consider it laughable that the term due process would even be applied to them," Tomlin said.

Don't blame the booze

Debbie Friedman

The surgeon general is set to release additional warnings regarding alcohol consumption. They will read as follows.

Warning: Alcohol may cause you to develop bigoted opinions of a race, sex or religion.

Warning: Alcohol may cause you to prey on minors.

Warning: Alcohol may lead you to engage in actions to which you have absolutely no control over.

I should probably mention these new guidelines appear solely in the dreams of former Congressman Mark Foley and former Hollywood A-lister Mel Gibson — two men who are pleading for public sympathy towards their embarrassing actions by attributing their behavior to alcohol.

After Mel Gibson was pulled over for drunk driving and observed spewing out anti-Semitic slurs, his agent quickly started damage control, claiming the actor was suffering from a severe case of alcoholism. And in an interview with Diane Sawyer, Gibson referred to his bigoted tirade as "the stupid ramblings of a drunkard," claiming he did not hold any contempt for the Jewish faith.

Friends also came to his aide, saying, "I have been with Mel when he has fallen off, and he becomes a completely different person … it is pretty horrifying," and "I believe it was the disease speaking, not the man."

Similarly, Congressman Mark Foley, who resigned after lewd Instant Messages between him and young male pages surfaced, blamed his disgraceful actions on his disease. Just after the scandal broke, his lawyer told reporters he was under the influence when contacting the minors, as if that was supposed to make it better.

Foley's alcoholism was news to friends of his, who said they never saw any evidence he had a drinking problem. Even Republican Representative Peter King of New York, who was Foley's colleague, told FOX News he didn't believe the story, calling it a "gimmick."

> It seems that today, substance abuse is being abused in itself, as a justification for unacceptable activities.

Whether their claims are true or not, Foley and Gibson's use of substance abuse as a get out of jail free card is nothing new. Representative Patrick Kennedy blamed his intoxicated car crash on an addiction to prescription drugs.

And after confessing to his involvement in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio checked himself into a rehab center for alcoholism. It seems that today, substance abuse is being abused in itself, as a justification for unacceptable activities.

With Washington (the supposed moral high ground of the country) and Hollywood (a place under constant public scrutiny) exhibiting these behaviors, it's really not surprising the youth of this country is taking these less than exemplary examples to heart.

In high school and college, it's common for students to treat alcohol as a way to magically escape the repercussions of any embarrassing night out or of a negative experience. Most morning-after stories are prefaced with, "Well, I was really drunk."

Our college culture seems to consider intoxication the ultimate immunity to the social consequences of drunken stupors. And since this is the case, people have learned to take advantage of it.

"It seems like some students drink too much just so they have an excuse to do things they normally wouldn't," University of Massachusetts senior Kevin Kroszner noted.

Alcohol may, in fact, give you the extra courage to do something you soberly would not, but that does not mean the desire was not already there. It's pretty clear Mel Gibson had been cursing Jews for "starting all the wars" long before his incident last summer. Foley was obviously fantasizing about younger men long before his scandal unfolded too.

Being under the influence gives everyone the opportunity to act out against the strict societal standards we are all held to. Many people who are typecast as "quiet" will use drinking as a way to break out of the mold their friends hold them to.

Others use it as a way to address issues they cannot soberly bring themselves to acknowledge. Some might use it as a means to validate their insecurities. But in the morning, whatever we used alcohol for the night before can be considered a wash because "it was just the beer talking," it was, "that last shot that made me do it" or it was because "vodka makes me a different person."

The fact of the matter is, who you are drunk is a large part of who you are, because your thoughts and actions in an inhibition-free state provide a powerful glimpse into your subconscious. For a majority of people, that glimpse is at the most very humorous, but for some, it is quite alarming.

Either way, blaming bad behavior on the bottle is just a means to comfort yourself, because we all know what the surgeon general should really be cautioning:

Warning: Alcohol may cause you to reveal your true self.

Universities v. penitentiaries

Domenic Poli

No one likes to go school. That's just a plain fact. The stress, the studying, the late nights and the early mornings — they're just no fun at all. Even if someone is like me and couldn't be happier with their choice, it's not uncommon for one to hear a student compare college to prison.

Thinking that the analogy was merely a result of the stress-ventilation process, I never put much thought into it. That is, however, until I sat down recently and pondered it. I realized the comparison is not so outlandish. Don't get me wrong — I'm not comparing college to a prison, but rather the other way around. If you think I'm being ridiculous, check out some of these aspects of both situations, and tell me the similarities aren't at all too close.

HOUSING:

If a jury of your peers finds you guilty of a crime that entails a prison sentence, you are brought to a correctional institution where you will remain until your prison term has been served. You are placed in a small room (for no money, obviously) that will serve as home until you have paid your debt to society. Most of the time, you are placed with a cellmate who will be the closest thing you have to a friend or confidant for the next few years.

Call me crazy, but that sure sounds like free housing to me. All I know is I get billed $3,705 per year to live in my cozy little dorm in Northeast. So, I have to shell out nearly four grand a year to live with moderate accommodations, while never having been arrested in my life. But a hardened criminal can enjoy almost the same luxuries as I can at no cost whatsoever.

MEALS:

The typical standard for the number of meals a prisoner receives per day is three. Anybody sensing a meal plan here? I get the deluxe meal plan, and it runs me $3,350 every year. (The other option is the value meal plan, which costs $3,084.) It used to be that inmates got only bread and water to eat, now they get a full-fledged dining hall comments. Oops, I mean "prison cafeteria" — I always get those two mixed up.

According to The New York Times Web site, inmates in New Jersey's correctional facilities receive a breakfast consisting of cereal, toast, jam, doughnuts, coffee and fruit. Lunch is often spaghetti with meatballs, salad with dressing, rolls, brownies and milk. For dinner meatloaf with mushroom gravy, Spanish rice and buttered collard greens frequently grace the menu.

Is it kind of sounds like the same thing they serve up at your local DC, doesn't it? It's an absolute crime (no pun intended) that prisoners enjoy the same variety of meals as an honest, hard-working college student does — meanwhile there are (at least) hundreds of thousands of homeless people who would do anything for the scraps these prisoners leave behind.

HEALTH SERVICES:

When you get sick here on campus, where do you go? You go to the Health Services building located in Central. I don't know if you've taken a look at your University bill lately, but each student is charged $623 a year to help keep it up and running.

> Isn't it a little embarrassing that the government puts as much effort into taking care of criminals as college students (a.k.a. the future of America)?

That's great — believe me. It's an essential and necessary part of any college campus. But did you know each penitentiary has its own infirmary as well? I'm not saying an inmate should have to rot in a cell while a stomach parasite eats away at his insides, but isn't it a little embarrassing that the government puts as much effort into taking care of criminals as college students (a.k.a. the future of America)?

Furthermore, is it right that the taxpayers' dollars are used to provide full health services to prisoners, while students like us have to scrimp and save for extra money to pay for things like the Student Mandatory Health Fee?

BOOKS:

Who the hell needs the Textbook Annex when you've got The Prison Library Project. Started in 1973, this volunteer-organization's sole purpose is to "supply books … to any inmate who requests them …. The books are for inmates to keep and are frequently passed on to other inmates or prison libraries."

Try to explain the justice in that. Prisoners get any book they want to read free of charge, while at the same time, I have a friend who was forced to pay $180 out of her own pocket for an organic chemistry textbook. How about changing it so there are organizations that provide free books for students and prisoners have to dish out money for something to read?

Try comparing college work study programs to prison work release programs and their similar workout facilities, and maybe you'll start to get as upset as I am about prisons and colleges being this comparable.

World Wide Web woes

Joshua H. Wilder

Many old-timers, elderly folk or people who grew up in the '60s and '70s are completely overwhelmed and confused when it comes to using and understanding the Internet. The realm of cyberspace is an advanced one to say the least, and when you think about all of the power it gives to the user, it can boggle the mind.

The Internet is perhaps the greatest man-made tool ever created; it gives you the power to look up basically any bit of information in mere seconds. However, I believe we have invested too much time, information and effort into the Internet and now, as human beings have a way of doing, we have taken something great and ruined it.

The cyber-space counterculture that has come into existence is trashier than a back alley in Atlantic City on a Saturday night. Instead of using the Internet for research and news, it has become flooded with pedophiles, stalkers, crooks touting fraudulent "get rich quick" schemes and degenerate online gamblers who would pawn their mommy's car for the chance to play another hand on Partypoker.com.

With the ever growing popularity of online networking and profile sites, such as Stalker-book, it is becoming increasingly easier for sickos to look up information about you. Don't know the cute girl sitting next to you in English class? Well just go online and read about her interests, favorite colors, blood type and what she is doing at this exact second. It is a lot better than actually going through the trouble of having a conversation with her.

Despite the convenience of online stalking and perversion these days, Congressman Mark Foley decided to skip the middle man and go straight to e-mail to get his ya-yas. This scumbag sent dirty e-mails to a 16-year-old boy, and the content was apparently so bad his fellow Republican buddies refused to even repeat them for print.

Unfortunately, what Foley did is becoming old hat these days. There seems to be a steady spike in cases of child predators using the Internet to lure young children into sexual situations. This year Amherst police used undercover agents online to foil the plans of a local man to meet a college co-ed in the library for a rendezvous, presumably for money. That wasn't the first case of such deals going down on the Internet, and it won't be the last either.

> Yes that's right; the guy who just got caught for talking dirty to little boys is in charge of The Missing and Exploited Children Caucus. Maybe Foley was trying to get into the heads of online wackos.

Surely somebody must be in charge of an agency that sets out to keep the Internet safe for children and college students alike. Well actually there is someone who has been appointed to the task: Mark Foley. Yes that's right; the guy who just got caught for talking dirty to little boys is in charge of The Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. Maybe Foley was trying to get into the heads of online wackos.

If a Congressman who is supposed to be cracking down on online stalking is actually contributing to the problem, then who can we trust? What is it about the Internet setting that makes people turn into sketchy sex fiends? Perhaps it is the feeling of anonymity you have when sitting behind a computer screen. Instant messages for example, are such an impersonal way of communicating with people that many will say things online they wouldn't say in person.

It seems painfully obvious that the Internet is no longer a safe place. What is even scarier, however, is the fact that Stalker-book is now starting to apply for not only colleges and high-schools but companies as well. Soon enough, there will be an online directory with everyone on it. You can look up information about people in your state, country or continent. It sounds like Big Brother looking over us all, which makes me more than a little nervous.

The government has recently been trying to crack down on certain Internet activities, such as downloading free music or gambling. Last year they gave the RIAA the green light to sue college students, about 50 or so from UMass. More recently however, the government has been trying to restrict online gambling as well.

I believe we need to monitor Internet activity, although it seems nearly impossible to do so effectively. A change is necessary, though. We need to ignore any suggestions the government gives for restrictions because it has lost all credibility at this point.

It seems like it may get to the point where you really can't be sure who you are talking to online anymore. Instead of fearing the worst, we should just ignore this whole fad altogether. People got along just fine without Instant Messenger and this cyber culture, so why are we dependant now? Its time to stop feeding the Internet with valued information. Use it for what it is. That way we can make sure we control the Internet, not the other way around.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PRESS COMPARISON

Ben Duffy's "Church and state: a two-way street" comes less than a week after The New York Times front page ran an article on Mary Rosati, a Catholic nun diagnosed with breast cancer, who was dismissed, probably due to her disease, and the same day The Times ran an editorial on "Faith Based Profits."

While Duffy argues that the coercion of Catholic Charities to allow gay couples adopt violates religious freedom, I would agree with The Times in saying the freedoms afforded to religious institutions in America have been too extreme, at the cost of the good of the people they purportedly serve.

Whether discriminating against employees, such as Mary Rosati, or the recent issues The Times subtly refers to as "children's security" (are kids really more secure in Catholic Orphanages than in gay homes?), the Church needs more interference from the state in order to protect the Christian ideals of compassion and love to which these institutions are obviously unwilling to hold themselves.

SUBSTANDARD GRADE AND ASSESSMENT

We would like to thank you for bringing up the report on the UMass sexual education programs by Sperling's Best Places and Trojan. As the co-chairs of the Student Health Advisory Board (SHAB), we think any discussion of the health programs offered at our school, whether they are negative or positive, are important issues about which UMass students should be aware.

Therefore, the article published on Oct. 10 concerning the sexual education at UMass served as a great basis for us to let UMass students know how much University Health Services (UHS) really does have to offer them.

One of the goals for SHAB is to make sure the mandatory student health fee students pay each year gets put to good use, and we are well aware of how pertinent adequate sexual education is on our campus. That is why there are a range of student organizations, facilities and supplies to keep UMass students aware and safe when making sexual decisions.

UHS hands out approximately 100,000 to 150,000 condoms per year, which seems like an awfully high number to have received an F in the condom availability category. These condoms are available not only at Health Services, but in the Campus Center, several RSO offices and student businesses, dorms and PHE tables in the Dining Commons.

These areas were chosen because they are frequented by students; this ensures protection never feels like it is far out of reach. There are also other forms of protection offered, such as female condoms, at UHS. And as if that isn't enough, the UHS pharmacy sells condoms at a better price than you will find in town.

The protection offered does not stop there. Several methods of contraception are offered at UHS. If one is not sure about what types of protection they need, they can always speak to people in Health Education. If one is seeking STD testing, they offer both anonymous and confidential testing. They offer a full circle of amenities to keep UMass students safe and informed and, as always, privacy is ensured.

For example, if one does not feel comfortable asking questions in person, they can always call the UHS triage nurse, or go to the general directory on the Web site to find contact information.

It is also important to note there are many groups sponsored by UHS to educate UMass students. As mentioned in the article, the Not Ready for Bedtime Players has an active role in sexual education; however, there is also the Women's Health Project, Peer Health Educators and SHAB. If these programs are not able to get to students, there are Resident Assistants on every floor of every dorm, armed with condoms and information for anyone in need.

We think it is important for students to know how much they have at hand to keep themselves and their partners safe. Sexual health is of great concern to UHS, and they want nothing more than to keep UMass protected and informed.

Attell trys out new material in two Hukelau performances

By Ryan McAskill
Collegian Correspondent

The "Insomniac" star made an appearance at The Comedy Connection Hukelau in Chicopee for two shows on Oct. 13. The 21 and up audience packed into the back showroom and downed tropical drinks and Chinese Pu-pu Platters complete with inferno centerpieces.

Fans of 'Insomniac' were not disappointed. During his routine Attell joked about topics such as smoking, drinking and having sex.

Jay Oakerson, who has appeared on Comedy Central's "Premium Blend" and "Tough Crowd with Colin Quinn," wrote for "The Chappelle's Show" and is a member of Attell's nationwide Insomniac tour, was the opening act. Oakerson's story style of joke telling, in contrast to Attell's rapid-fire delivery, made for a hilarious beginning to the evening.

Despite the difference in style, both comics share an affinity for foul humor. "I had a threesome with another guy. Let me tell you ladies, you think your doing us a favor, your not. Anytime there is a second guy there is a conversation that goes on right before in the bathroom between the two, which is something like, 'don't touch me and don't look at me,'" Oakerson said.

"And you know that moment will come when your hags touch and there should just be a fight to the death right there. Like Thunderdome, two enter, one leaves."

In his 20 minute set, Oakerson went on to relay stories of public restrooms, sex-tapes made with (and by) girlfriends — including a 30 minute audio tape — and also fraternity life and his own unfortunate sexual incidents.

Attell then took the stage for his hour long set, beer in hand. He immediately read the room and started in with the front row crowd, even going as far as to borrow beef teriyaki from a front table to talk about the very generous portion of meat. "It looks like they killed a hitchhiking hooker. I bet you don't want that ride now."

With his rapid-fire delivery, Attell's act was all over the place. It was near impossible to know where he was going from joke to joke, but Attell's quick delivery made smooth transitions a moot point. Jokes about the new Jackass movie, "you can't go home and read a book after that, you have to go out and do stupid s like pushing your grandma into a bucket of AIDS," flowed well with other jokes about making the Nazi salute while saying "you know this really is the best way to put on deodorant. You get every nook and cranny." His delivery flowed seamlessly.

Living up to his "Insomniac" persona, Attell drank several shots of various alcoholic beverages during his set — courtesy of a few audience members.

The show was slowed down when a group of inebriated female audience members interrupted the second half of Attell's set. The group, who was celebrating a birthday, yelled out an invitation for an after party at their apartment. Although the rest of the audience grew increasingly frustrated with their antics, the ladies made their way onto the stage. In their drunken state they almost knocked over Attell's bottle of Budweiser, which prompted him to kick them off and joke, "No one is moving to help the comic. You want to see what happens?"

"I'm sorry you had to see that," Attell joked after "I'm trying out new material for my new DVD so I don't mind the audience fights. It was a good night though."

Attell weathered the audience and delivered a performance typical of any "Insomniac" show. Fans of the show were not disappointed as Attell touched on all his favorite topics: drinking, smoking and sex in bits that are too vulgar to be relayed in print.

When it comes to Attell the man, his onstage persona is not an act. In between sets he could be seen outside smoking, drinking and talking with anyone around him. With Oakerson on stage, Attell took a seat in the corner, and watched, beer in hand.

Following his second set, Attell, along with Oakerson, hung around to talk with fans and take pictures, even bringing some fans into the back dressing room to share some shots and Chinese food. When the crowd finally died down, both comics headed to the packed bar for karaoke to cap off a successful night.

There is little difference between Dave Attell the man and Dave Attell the comic. In between sets Attell was seen talking to fans.

Stephen Kellogg jams at the Iron Horse

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers came home on Sunday: home to a familiar venue, in a familiar town, surrounded by familiar faces. The Iron Horse in Northampton welcomed a band that was comfortable and comforting. Their homey attitude and fun-loving demeanor emulated from the stage as a variety of stuffed animals sat along the stage, from Piglet to a pink poodle and a red fuzzy crab.

With the lights low, Vaudeville-type introductory music played over the speakers. Guitarist and vocalist Stephen Kellogg, bass and keyboardist Keith Karlson, guitarist Chris Soucy, and drummer Brian Factor ran down the aisle and onto the stage to overwhelming cheers by the audience. The lights brightened up and the Sixers began their set with "Wagon Wheel" by Old Crow Medicine Show, followed by "Vegas."

Adorned with different hats, each member grinned wide as they played each song. Kellogg, wearing a trucker hat with a pirate skull, explained the headgear came from a hit sale at Faces, a favorite store located in Northampton. The ears and pom-pom of Karlson's ski hat bounced playfully as he swayed side to side during each song.

Stephen Kellogg introduced the next tune by plugging their new DVD "The First Waltz." "Girlfriend as Pretty as You" is a song from "One Night In Brooklyn," an EP to be included along with the "One Night in Boston" DVD.

The boys harmonized into "Maria" before playing "Anthem of Our Discovery." They busted out the harmonica and performed the first verse of "Afternoon Delight" right into the old favorite, "Days."

Throughout the show, the Sixers injected pop culture references into old songs with interludes popular hits of "Don't Cha" and "Buttons" (Pussycat Dolls), "Promiscuous" (Nelly Furtado), and "London Bridge" (Fergie). Further more and in typical Sixers fashion, they performed a medley of songs from each decade starting with Beethoven ("for those classic rock fans," Kellogg joked) and ending with 50 Cent's "In Da Club."

Kellogg and the Sixers were personal in their temperament and welcomed the crowd into their world. They shared tidbits of information about their ties to the Iron Horse and Massachusetts in general. Kellogg explained how he worked as a poster-hanger and eventually booking agent for the Iron Horse. He reminisced about ripping off his now-band mates by underpaying them for playing on this very Iron Horse stage. They also narrated to the audience about a stint performing the national anthem at Fenway Park. Kellogg described their nervousness and how the fact they were playing at Fenway Park triumphed over an attempt to enjoy every single one of their shows. Feeling more comfortable at the Iron Horse, the Sixers recreated the performance a cappella as everyone promptly removed their hats.

During the next section of the show, the band performed "Such a Way," "Uninspired Gambling," and "Start the Day Early." During this portion, each member took a turn at the microphone reciting famous lines from movies like "Old School," "Talladega Nights: The Legend of Ricky Bobby," "Office Space," "The Princess Bride," "The Lion King," and "Dirty Dancing." Laughter erupted as the audience recognized their references, which just kept on coming as Karlson played the bass-line into to "Sweet Caroline." Everyone sang along and pumped their fist to this Neil Diamond favorite with cult-classic status.

In between songs Kellogg and his bandmates spoke of their connections to Massachusetts. At one time Kellogg was a concert promoter for the Iron Horse.

For one of the last songs, the boys unplugged their instruments and walked up to the staircase leading to the second level of the Iron Horse. They each stood on a different step and played "See You Later, See You Soon" as the audience sang along with quiet admiration. The band went back to the stage and played two more songs: "Diamond" and "Thirteen." During the latter, Kellogg egged Karlson on, eventually resulting in the shirt and pants of Karlson to be stripped off. He danced around the stage, displaying his acrobatic skills, as the song came to an end.

Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers were supported by Mozella, a singer-songwriter from Detroit with a similar lively disposition, as conveyed by her stage presence and between song witty banter. A drumming loop mechanism made up for the absence of a drummer. Throughout her half-hour set, she conversed with the audience about her love of coffee milk from Tall River, and obsession with Dunkin' Donuts. She played songs that resembled a female version of Damien Rice, except with more soul. Her voice and delightful songs, along with a laid back disposition, enchanted the audience.

Pixies DVD showcases band in hometown club performance

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

The Pixies story has been repeated countless times, even within this publication. For some the shock of their 2004 reunion has worn off and for others it never will, but after spending over a year straight on the road, the Pixies brought cause for celebration to innumerable fans around the world. Though it was no secret that the little cult band from Boston had grown following their 1992 break up, the fact that the alternative-rock icons had blossomed into superstars was somewhat of a surprise. And while few would complain about the opportunity to see the Pixies take the stage again, many certainly felt the ramifications of fame — that the Pixies might never take the stage in a small club ever again.

Pixies
Live at The Paradise in Boston
Eagle Rock Entertainment

On a roll, the Pixies proved that theory wrong as well in the summer of 2005, as their tour winded down. A surprise show at the Paradise in Boston announced a day before it was to happen — became the sort of event that had people of all ages lining up around the block, desperately hoping to score tickets. And while a DVD will never fully capture the live experience, the "Live at The Paradise in Boston" disc aims to bring some joy to everyone who was left out of the actual show.

Pixies fans will know right away if they want this disc or not, the set list printed on the back cover gives a pretty good idea of the type of night it was. With the band strolling casually on stage, joking around, and finally suggesting that they open with drummer David Lovering's vocal showcase, "La La Love You," it is immediately evident that this show won't just be a "greatest hits" set.

Each of the 29 songs the band barreled through was a classic, many of them rare to recent set lists. Putting two of their best b-sides (the jangle-pop Neil Young cover of "Winterlong" and the shoegaze, "Into The White" featuring bassist Kim Deal on vocals) back-to-back early in the set showcased the diversity of the Pixies sound. Watching Frank Black roar his way through frenetic tracks like "Dead," "Crackity Jones," and "Something Against You" is awe-inspiring as ever. It should be no surprise, but it is crucial to mention that the songs — some of them approaching twenty years old — sound as fresh, original, and daring today as ever.

Mixing material from all of their albums, the Pixies even brought out some rarely played latter-day tracks. While the catchy standout "Allison," which features a head-spinning solo from Joey Santiago, was the only track played off of the underrated "Bossanova" album, the band's criminally neglected last album "Trompe Le Monde," was given a lot of time to shine. The blues-stomp influenced "Subbacultcha," space-age "Planet of Sound," and schizophrenic, and aptly-titled, "Sad Punk" all sounded great and, of course, the native audience went wild for the live staple, "U-Mass."

After a rousing rendition of "Hey," one of the best tracks from 1989's classic "Doolittle" album, the band winds things down appropriately enough with "Caribou." The song, which was the first track on the band's debut LP, "Come On Pilgrim," was, according to the 1986 demo that was released on 2004's "Frank Black Francis" album, to have a Husker Du feel to it. Of course the song, and the band, came to define a brand new sound, something that was so unique that it can be imitated and attempted but, over 20 years later, still has never been copied.

As an added bonus, the disc also contains one of the Pixies very first shows, shot in 1986 at TT The Bear's in Cambridge. Though it has all the wearings of time the set list, which includes hits from the band's early days as well bootleg-favorites like "Rock A My Soul" and "Boom Chickaboom," the DVD should be endearing to any Pixies fan.

Wood reminds music fans that talent exists

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

What a long strange journey it's been for the improvisational jazz trio of John Medeski, Billy Martin and Chris Wood. From the back-alleys of Brooklyn to the hills of Hawaii's big island, they have delved into the corners of sound and soul only reachable through improvisation. The trinity of instrumentalists, with Medeski on keyboards, Martin on percussion, and Wood on bass, has reunited with guitar legend John Scofield for the collaborative effort "Out Louder."

Released in late September of this year, "Out Louder" is the debut album for MMW independent label Indirecto Records. Recoded in their downtown Brooklyn basement studio, dubbed Shacklyn, the four artists spent one week writing, recording, and improvising. The product is a multifaceted polyrhythmic odyssey through the realms of jazz, funk, rock, soul and reggae.

MMW and Scofield reunite for "Out Louder" after their acclaimed 1998 release "A Go Go." While their first effort utilized the trio as a backing band for Scofield's guitar and compositional prowess, this past Septembers' release is more of an egalitarian effort, with each member contributing and standing independently, together in their individuality.

On the opening cut, "Little Walter Rides Again," the quartet comes out of the gate with a swinging, upbeat funky-blues jam. The track shines while each band member takes a turn to test the limits of improvisation within the tight parameters of this solid groove.

The abrupt transition to "Miles Behind," a tribute to former Scofield recording partner Miles Davis, exposes MSMW's roots in the controlled chaos of free jazz, here the succinct explosion of cacophonic excess is punctuated by ripping solos from Medeski and Scofield.

As the album progresses through an array of styles, the funky rock-infused jazz style takes center stage as the calling card of MSMW. Mixed in with their well-established sound comes a psychedelic exploration unique to "Out Louder." The surreal and trippy are most at home in the tracks "What Now" and "Down the Tube." The first starts with a fierce organ jam by Medeski and delves into sonic bedlam, while the nearly 12-minute "Down the Tube" takes the listener on a ride across a spectrum of funk-fusion sound, standing as the centerpiece jam on the album.

Interspersed with the original content are two exquisite covers "Julia" a distant, down tempo tribute to the John Lennon classic, shines as one highlight on the album. Scofield's guitar weeps with melodic beauty and ease, while Medeski's organ provides a somber backdrop. The album closes with "Legalize It," a liberal instrumental interpretation of the Peter Tosh anthem.

The album as a whole has a concise flow with each transition purposefully executed and juxtaposed. At times "Out Louder" does fall into the hard-to-avoid trap of repetitiveness, with so many exploratory jams there is bound to be some track-to-track retention. That being said, the album should be applauded for its ability to stay simple and true to its sound, even if that means that the product, at times, becomes too analogous from cut-to-cut.

In a crowded soundscape of generic homogenized, over-produced acts, the alliance between MMW and Scofield give hope to a generation of listeners that missed the likes of Miles Davis, Billy Cobham, and any semblance of real musical innovation. Luckily for us a great trio of jazz musicians and a living legend have teamed up to create an organic sound unabashed of its roots and downright beautiful.

Final Four. And I'll be damned if you sure did.'"

They went to the Final Four in 1995. UMass' career-points leader – Jim McCoy – had already passed through during Calipari's tenure. But another superstar arrived in the form of a 6-foot-10 shot-blocking machine, a player destined for stardom at the highest level: Marcus Camby.

Camby – along with Edgar Padilla, Carmelo Travieso, and others – took UMass to the Final Four before Rick Pitino's fast-breaking Kentucky squad (that included future pros Antoine Walker, Tony Delk, Ron Mercer, and Walter McCarty) squashed the Minutemen in the semifinals.

In the ensuing years, Calipari and Camby were mired in a controversy that plagues UMass' image to this day. Camby allegedly received funding from an off-campus source to bribe him to come to UMass. Calipari's name was cleared of any wrongdoing, but the label stayed with him and he left UMass for the NBA's New Jersey Nets after the 1996 season.

Bruiser stayed – and tried to repair the damage.

Early exits

In the 1996-97 season, Bruiser's first as head coach, the Minutemen went 19-14 overall and 11-5 in the A-10. They made it to the NCAA Tournament and got the 11th seed in the East Regional bracket before sixth-seeded Louisville edged UMass, 65-57, in the first round.

Next season it was more of the same. A 21-11 regular season record and an efficient 12-4 in the A-10 led to postseason expectations. The Minutemen defeated Virginia Tech in the first round of the 1998 A-10 Tournament before rival George Washington sent them home with an 88-83 loss. UMass, despite the disappointing defeat in the conference tournament, earned an NCAA Tournament berth for the seventh straight year (the second for Bruiser as UMass' head coach). But the Minutemen, given a No. 7 seed, went down in the first round of the NCAA Tournament again, this time to underdog Saint Louis, a No. 10 seed.

> "I loved it [in Amherst]," Bruiser says. "I pledged money to the Jack Leaman Fund this year. People treated me very well. I just didn't get along with my bosses very well. We weren't always on the same page. But people treated me well up there, and still to the day."

"We wanted to try to win the national championship," Bruiser says. "We were coming off of some remarkable years so we were trying to keep that thing going. When I got the job, I was trying to just continue what I was trying to do."

Bruiser was one of the winningest coaches in UMass history by the end of his tenure. In five years, he won 86 games and lost 72. The only two coaches ahead of him on the all-time wins list – Jack Leaman and Calipari – are certified coaching legends. Leaman won 217 games in 13 years at the helm, and Calipari won 193 games in his eight-year reign.

Then it's Bruiser – third on the all-time list for coaching wins at UMass. But two NCAA Tournament appearances, an 86-72 overall record, and a 52-28 record against the A-10 wasn't good enough for a program that tasted the national semifinals just a couple of years before. The athletic director, Bob Marcum, was fiery and impatient, and Bruiser's relationship with his boss soured over time.

"I loved it [in Amherst]," Bruiser says. "I pledged money to the Jack Leaman Fund this year. People treated me very well. I just didn't get along with my bosses very well. We weren't always on the same page. But people treated me well up there, and still to the day."

Bonnie Otto is a secretary in the UMass athletic department and has been for 21 years. Bruiser mentioned her when he reflected on his times in Amherst and called her "family." He spoke fondly of friends and places he left behind. When the men's lacrosse team made it to the national championship in Philadelphia last year, Bruiser met up with some of his UMass friends who made it the trip down.

"I still come up [to Amherst] a lot," Bruiser says. "My daughter was born in that area. My wife is a UMass grad. I got a lot of ties. I feel proud that I got some people that I can call some real good friends up there."

"I do keep in touch with Bruiser," Otto said in an email. "We speak often and I try to get to some of his games when he is in the area. He still sends me a Christmas present every year. We got along well and I could talk to him about anything. I enjoyed working for Bruiser and was very sad when he left. I have a lot of great memories of Bruiser's time here at UMass."

A fresh start

Bruiser has moved on to the Colonial Athletic Conference and his Drexel Dragons, a school west of Philadelphia and about 10 blocks from Bruiser's childhood home. He's close to his family now. His wife, Rene, and daughter, Jada, were ecstatic that a big piece of their family was coming back for good.

"It was great going home," Bruiser said. "My family, they didn't really say anything to me about coming back. My family didn't want to say 'hey, we want you to come back home.' But when I told them I was coming to Drexel, they went absolutely crazy."

Bruiser moved back to Philly in 2001 after landing the Drexel job and started recruiting locally. But his father got very sick a short time after he moved. It was cancer, and it was terminal – a big blow for a father's child. Bruiser's dad was there for the long haul. He inspired his son back in the old recreation center where little James got his start on the hardwood. He went to every UMass game when Bruiser coached the Minutemen. When Bruiser moved to Philadelphia, he went to every practice and traveled with the team on the road trips. He was as much a fan as he was a father.

"For him, it was great," Bruiser says. "He could see me every day, he could come to practice. For him, that was really big. He actually started crying on the phone when I told him that I was going to take the Drexel job.

"And if I were still at UMass when he got cancer, I wouldn't have been able to deal with it because he got really sick and everything happened in a short period of time. I was able to be with him."

Bruiser had another rebuilding situation on his hands at Drexel – a small school without a fan base, playing in the CAA, a small a group of teams with little national exposure. When Bruiser arrived in 2001, four of the team's top scorers just graduated. Drexel was competing for recruits with some of the top basketball schools in the northeast – Temple, St. Joe's, Villanova, and Penn.

Bruiser believes that being a local guy helped him land the Drexel job because it increased Drexel's chances of stealing some of the local talent from the bigger schools.

"One of the things I talked to [the Drexel athletic department] about was that I knew that if I came to this school, they could get local kids that they couldn't get in the past," Bruiser says. "It was a little different for me. Now you're going into a different conference and you're recruiting a totally different kid.

"I think that that was one of the things I felt I could do anyway, put us in a situation where we could get local kids."

It wasn't easy to garner support from the fan base, either. When Bruiser arrived in 2001, enthusiasm for basketball at Drexel was nonexistent. The stands at the ends of the court didn't need to be pulled out because so few students went to the home games.

"It was crazy because the [Drexel athletic department] told me that they usually only got 500 people to the games," says Bruiser, laughing at the memory.

The Dragons finished with a 14-14 record in Bruiser's first season as head coach in 2001. They finished with an 11-7 mark in conference, tied for third in the league. The CAA named him Coach of the Year, and it wasn't long before Drexel fans began showing up at home games. ("From that point on, people were like, 'We got a shot,'" says Bruiser.)

In his second season, the Dragons went to the postseason for the first time in six years on the heels of a 19-win campaign and a 12-6 record in the CAA. Drexel got a bid to the NIT after that season, and won two games in the conference tournament before losing in the finals. Bruiser also notched his 100th career win with a 68-65 win over UNC-Wilmington.

Since then, Bruiser has added another CAA Coach of the Year award to his resume, along with another NIT appearance for the Drexel Dragons, just the seventh postseason appearance in the program's history.

But Bruiser and company have a long way to go if they are to attain national recognition. The CAA is improving now. With George Mason's Cinderella run to the Final Four last season, the CAA was suddenly on the national radar. Because of the Patriots' success in the NCAA Tournament, the rest of the conference is reaping the benefits, which include multiple national television appearances for Bruiser Flint's Drexel Dragons.

"The [CAA] just called me and said that we're going to have nine games on TV in the conference," Bruiser says. "We're going to be all over the place. And that's why the other teams get better, because people see [George Mason] and know they know that you're playing in a pretty good league.

"And the same thing happened with UMass and the Atlantic 10. When I was coaching there, that was probably some of the best years that the league has ever had. They were sending four or five teams to the tournament every year, and I think [George Mason] will have the same effect on our conference this year. George Mason is a really good team and they have great coaches, but our league is going to be better from top to bottom."

Bruiser is not a bitter man. He didn't hold grudges after he left UMass, and that has helped him preserve a solid relationship with the university and the athletic department. Things have changed since he left. Steve Lappas, the Villanova coach hired after Bruiser's departure, has come and gone without an NCAA Tournament appearance. Now it's Travis Ford at the helm, the Kentucky graduate who played for Pitino when Bruiser paraded the sidelines with Calipari. Ford and Flint crossed paths for the movie "The 6th Man," where Ford made a cameo as a bumbling backup without much skill.

"Travis was a player when we coached. I'm getting a little old," Bruiser jokes. "We did the movie 'The 6th Man' together. He had that funny little haircut.

"I know that the people up there really like Travis. They just like what he brings to the table in terms of uniting everybody."

Bruiser roots for UMass and doesn't let his untimely departure change the good times he had in Amherst. Marcum and Bruiser weren't on the same page at the end of his stint at UMass.

The Minutemen didn't make the postseason in the 2001 season, and the impetuous Marcum had had enough. The relationship came to an irreparable point, and that's when Bruiser knew that his tenure was close to its end. But now, six years and three NIT's later, he doesn't hesitate to talk about the past or share his opinions about what happened six years ago.

"If you want to have a good program, everybody has to be on board with what you're trying to do," he says. "I think that people lost their way up there [at UMass]. They just thought that it was going to happen. They thought that Marcus Camby's were going to come around all of the time. They didn't understand their part that they had to play in it."

Bruiser feels that he has a better relationship with his co-workers at Drexel, simply because there is positive dialogue with the athletic director. But Bruiser knows that financial support plays a substantial role in the success of a team, and without that support from the administration, the program will stall before it starts.

"A lot of it comes down to the money," he says. "Are you going to give the money up to be good enough to put yourself in the Top 20 or not? And I think that's the problem that they ran into [at UMass]."

Now the Minutemen have their best chance for a postseason berth since Bruiser's days on the UMass sidelines. Ford – like Bruiser did at Drexel – has brought instant credibility to the UMass program. He is recruiting players and grabbing talent from all over the country. Talented cagers are transferring to UMass in order to have a shot at an NCAA Tournament.

Bruiser watches from a distance and keeps close tabs on his old stomping grounds. When asked about this year's UMass squad, he mentions several players. Gary Forbes, Tiki Mayben, and Chris Lowe included – that he tried to recruit and goes into detail about their respective abilities.

He knows what is developing in Amherst these days. And he knows that his situation couldn't have worked at UMass, no matter how badly he wanted it to. So Bruiser has moved on. And so has UMass. But Bruiser Flint was an anchor for the UMass program for 12 years, and was on the bench for some of the greatest years in UMass basketball history. And no matter where the Drexel head coach goes next, he will always reserve a special place for his UMass Minutemen.

The Drexel Dragons men's basketball team went 14-14 in Flint's first year as head coach in 2001. In his second season, Flint took the Dragons to the NIT postseason tournament for just the fifth time in the program's history.

Flint, known as "Bru" to close friends and colleagues, speaks fondly of his years at UMass and the ties he made during his time here.

Where are they now?

Bruiser Flint: The Drexel men's basketball coach started anew in 2001 after 12 years in Amherst

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

(This is the first story in the "Where are they now?" series, which will examine the careers of UMass coaches and players after their time in Amherst.)

James Flint was born in Philadelphia. He grew up as a basketball player. Basketball is a hard sport to escape in Philadelphia, the hub of east-coast hoops.

Temple, Saint Joseph's, Villanova, and the University of Pennsylvania all reside in, or close to, Philadelphia. Legends like Wilt Chamberlain, Moses Malone, and Julius Erving have suited up for the 76ers over the years, and Philadelphia matched the Boston Celtics blow-for-blow in the early 1980s, when the Bird Era was in full swing.

This is where Flint grew up. We know him best as "Bruiser," the name his grandfather bestowed upon him at birth. Bruiser – known as "Bru" to colleagues and friends – spent 12 years in the UMass basketball program. He started as an assistant coach in 1989 after John Calipari brought him on board.

Calipari mentored Bruiser for seven years, before he took over the head coaching position after Calipari left for the NBA's New Jersey Nets in 1996. He was there when UMass basketball began its transformation to a prestigious Final Four program. And he was there when the team's popularity nosedived in the wake of a scandal involving star player Marcus Camby, which forced the NCAA to revoke the Minutemen's Final Four appearance in 1995.

Bruiser tried to turn things around after Camby and Calipari left for the pros. And he did so successfully – for a few years at least. Bruiser was the fastest coach in UMass basketball history to reach 30 and 40 wins, and he was the second-fastest to reach the 50-win mark. Now, he is but a memory at UMass, and the student body ever-changing and fickle has forgotten the man who devoted so much of his time to UMass basketball.

These days, you won't find Bruiser coaching at a high-profile ACC school or doing play-by-play broadcasts. The Philly native has started over with a new program in the Colonial Athletic Association, and, just like he did in the Pioneer Valley over 10 years ago, is overseeing the development of a small-time basketball program. This time, it's Drexel University.

FROM PHILADELPHIA TO UMASS

Bruiser's inspiration, like so many other men in sports, came from his father. The elder James Flint ran a recreation center when Bruiser was growing up, and the young Flint did everything at the club – managing, coaching, getting the players towels, and of course, playing.

"Our recreation center was famous for basketball players," Bruiser says. "I did everything. I had been around it so much for so long. I enjoyed it. I loved it."

And he was good at it, too. Bruiser went on to play college ball at St. Joe's, leading the Hawks to an A-10 championship in 1986. At St. Joe's, he got a tip from an unlikely source.

"Jim Foster, the women's basketball coach at Ohio State – he was the women's coach at St. Joe's at the time – asked me to go help him with his team one day," Bruiser says. "It was a Saturday morning and he asked me to go to the practice and the other coach didn't show up. So [Foster] had to coach the other team and I had to coach his team. And from that point on I used to go every week.

"[Foster] used to come and watch my teams play in the summer league. One day, he told me in the office that I should think about [coaching] as a profession."

His dad, the basketball lifer, agreed.

"I thought about it, and my dad thought I'd be good at [coaching], too," Bruiser said. "He said, 'I think you're good around the kids and that's the most important thing. You should try it out.'"

So he did. He started at Coppin State where he coached for two years (1987-88) before an encounter at a summer basketball camp led him down a path that eventually made its way to Amherst. It was there that Bruiser met Billy Bano, one of Calipari's assistants at UMass, and Bano asked him to join the UMass coaching staff.

Calipari was small-time then. There was no Final Four appearance, no superstars in the Pioneer Valley, and no NBA teams calling. There was just a young, energetic coach that would do anything to win. Bruiser liked the situation, but Calipari's presence made some people question the UMass program.

"Everybody told me to watch out for [Calipari]," Bruiser said. "When I told everybody in Philadelphia that I was going up to work with Cal – and I'd had some history with some guys that he had recruited in Philly – I'll tell ya, they were crushin' me, man. 'Don't go up there with him. He's not a good guy.' And I told those guys that they were crazy."

As Bruiser says, the rest is history.

A YOUNG PROGRAM

It wasn't all fun and games when Bruiser arrived on the scene. UMass had just 10 wins in Calipari's first year and the shadows of Julius Erving and Al Skinner still stretched across the UMass campus. Bruiser, however, didn't see it like that. He saw hope in Calipari, even though the results had yet to come.

Bruiser Flint spent seven years as an assistant coach under John Calipari before taking the head coaching position in 1997 when Calipari signed with the New Jersey Nets. He remained the head coach for five seasons.

"It was tough at the beginning, but John was great with that and still is to the day," Bruiser says. "John can get the masses moving, man. And although the year before they only won 10 games, people felt good about him.

"I came the year after [Calipari] had started. And people felt good about it. They were saying that we had some pretty good talent. We were young, but the talent was there. John's great with the players, too. He made everybody believe."

Bruiser speaks fondly of these times. It was a long time ago, 17 years now, but the Philly coach with the raspy voice and enough optimism to fill a room talks about his early UMass days like it was yesterday.

When Bruiser and Calipari recruited Travis Best, the NBA regular who made stops in Indiana, Miami, and Dallas during his professional career, they ran into some stiff resistance from Best's family. Best is from Springfield and played high school ball there. He asked Calipari and his coaching staff to come to his house for a face-to-face talk, and what happened then still gives Bruiser a good laugh at his own expense.

"We were at [Best's] house and his sister was giving us a hard time," Bruiser recalls. "Cal says to his sister, 'Listen to me, one day we're going to be playing in the Final Four.' And his dad and his sister and his mother started laughing at us. Seriously. They actually started laughing.

"So we go the Final Four. Travis goes to Georgia Tech. I see [Best's] dad a few years later because I saw him off and on after that. And his dad said, 'You know what? I still remember that day when you and Cal said that we're going to the

Elite runners sit before A-10s

The Massachusetts cross country teams had their final tune-up race before the conference championships began. The Minutemen placed 12th with 321 points, and the Minutewomen finished ninth with 231 points at the Albany Invitational on Saturday.

In order to rest up for the Atlantic 10 Championships, the Minutemen were without their elite runners. The team went into Albany with seven sub-varsity runners. Leading the way for the men was junior Mark Kenwood who placed 54th (26:17.3). Two seconds behind Kenwood was sophomore Josh Boone, who finished 57th with a time of 26:19.5.

The Minutemen's bottom five runners finished the race relatively close together. Sophomore Kevin Quadrozzi finished 62nd with a time of 26:25.3. Senior Aaron Strellner came in 69th (26:28.8) while junior Joseph Cuprvna rand the course in 26:43 to finish 79th. Just behind him were Sophomore Jonathan Pierce in 80th place (26:44.0) and junior Matthew Klypka – checking in with his 92nd-place finish (27:15.2).

This season the top runners for the Minutemen have been sophomore Jesse Regnier and junior Nils Fischer. Regnier has been the top runner for two of the three meets he has raced in. He finished first overall at the home meet against Boston College and Maine and second on the team at Meet of Champions in New York. He also finished 14th overall at New Englands.

Junior Nils Fischer (far right) sat out the Albany Invitational in order to rest up for this weekend's Atlantic 10 Championship.

Fischer is racing just as strong. He's placed within the top two spots for every race. His highlights include a fourth-overall finish against BC and Maine and placing first for the team at The Meet of Champions.

These runners will be well rested and ready to go for the A-10 Championship meet this Saturday in Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Minutewomen raced against a field of 22 teams and about 200 runners in Albany.

Junior Christina DeRosa finished first for the Minutewomen placing 18th with a time of 18:30.5. It was the 19th consecutive race that DeRosa finished first for the team.

Junior Christina DeRosa is the Minutewomen's top runner. She has finished first for UMass in 19 consecutive races.

Junior Amber Sayer ran on Saturday after hurting her back last week –the injury kept her out of New Englands. She finished behind DeRosa, placing 45th (19:04.9).

Before Saturday, Sayer had not finished second on the team since the first race of the season. Sayer has battled illness and a bad back this year. She gave a gutsy effort running with the flu at the home meet against BC and Maine finishing fifth for the Minutewomen. The following week at the Meet of Champions, she placed fifth on the team and then sat out New Englands because of her back.

Behind Sayer in a tight pack were the Kierans sisters. Senior Cuisle Kierans finished 47th (19:05.9) and freshman Lilis Kierans placed 52nd – she completed the course in 19:09.6.

Rounding out the rest of the pack were junior Ashley Davidson in 69th, (19:36.9), junior Amanda Bodette in 76th (19:45.8) and junior Taryn Trapp, who finished 87th (19:53.7).

Lauren Liuzzo has consistently been one of the team's top runners, but she injured her ankle last week in New Englands and did not race in Albany. Liuzzo and Lilis Kierans have run well in their rookie year at UMass. Both have placed consistently in the top five for every race.

Experience gained in exhibition

The UMass men's and women's swimming teams began their season with an exhibition meet on Friday. Team scores were not kept at Friday's invitational, when UMass squared off against UConn, Stony Brook and Southern Connecticut.

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming teams began their seasons at the UConn Invitational on Friday afternoon.

Even though team scores were not kept at the event, it provided an opportunity for the swimmers of each school to gain valuable experience in competition. The Maroon and White faced off against athletes from Connecticut, Stony Brook and Southern Connecticut in the 28-event meet.

Both teams will be in action again this Saturday at 4 p.m. when they travel to New York to face the Stony Brook Seawolves. The Maroon and White return home the following Saturday, Oct. 28, to take on Army.

UConn swimmers won the majority of the events on both the men's and women's sides. However, since the competition was not scored, it's difficult to determine the results because team scores were not recorded.

Senior Evan Swisher shined for the Minutemen, winning two events. He finished first in the 100-yard breaststroke and the 200-yard backstroke with times of 1:02.70 and 1:54.94, respectively. He also added a second-place finish in the 200-yard individual medley.

Sophomore Nate Bromage took first place in the 200-yard freestyle, with a time of 1:46.47. He finished second in the 100-yard butterfly. He also earned fourth-place finishes in both the 50 and 100-yard freestyle events.

The Minutemen earned second place in two other events. Junior John Weaver swam the 100-yard breaststroke in 1:04.23, to finish less than two seconds behind teammate Nate Bromage. The sophomore earned second-place finishes in the 400-yard individual medley and the 1,000-yard freestyle.

Men's coach Russ Yarworth was able to enter most of his swimmers in four events. He was satisfied with his team's performance.

"[It was a] good total-team effort for the first meet of the year," he said. "The players worked hard and had a great attitude."

On the women's side, senior Liz Lovejoy starred for the Minutewomen, winning the 100 butterfly in a time of 59.16. She also finished third in the 200 and 500 freestyle events.

The team fared well in the 200 individual medley – taking both second and third place. Junior Samantha Demty finished second in 2:16.15 and sophomore Christa Narus placed third in 2:17.32.

Narus also earned second place in the 100 butterfly, finishing less than two seconds behind winning teammate Lovejoy. Demty meanwhile took third place in the 200 butterfly and fourth in the 400 individual medley.

The 200 freestyle was the only women's relay event of the meet. The UMass "A-team" took second place. It contained representatives from all four class years and finished in 1:41.09. Lovejoy swam the first leg, followed by freshman Kathryne Chalikis, then junior Allison Volpe, and finally Narus. The "B-team" finished less than six seconds back, followed by the "C-team."

Women's coach Bob Newcomb was satisfied with the way his team performed.

"The meet gave us a good opportunity to see how far along we are with a lot our swimmers," he said. "I think we are where we should be at this point in the season."

Nursing School to hold diversity conference

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts will hold its second annual conference on Tuesday, October 24, to promote racial and cultural diversity in the field of nursing.

The conference, called "A Nursing Celebration and Orientation Conference" will take place from 8:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. at the Campus Center Auditorium.

The conference is part of UMass's "Embracing the Challenge: Increasing Workforce Diversity in Nursing" project, funded by a three-year, $957,755 grant from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. The project aims to enhance social, financial and academic support structures for minority and disadvantaged individuals who want to enter the nursing field. This is done at the university level, in middle and high schools, and local community colleges where students have shown an interest in the profession.

Jean Swinney, who is leading the program, believes diversity within the nursing field is in need of a boost.

"The diversity in nursing sh uld mirror that of the general population, and as of today, it doesn't," said Swinney.

According to the American Association of Colleges of Nursing (AACN), 12 percent of nurses are from African American, Hispanic, Asian, or Native American communities. Men make up 5.4 percent of registered nurses.

Swinney, who is also chair of the Research Centers/Institutes subcommittee at UMass, referenced medical evidence that states patients respond better when nursed by a person of their own ethnicity.

Dr. Marie N. Fongwa, who holds a doctorate in nursing and is an Assistant Professor at UCLA's School of Nursing, says there is marginal truth to the claim.

"Having a nurse who is the same ethnicity as you is an added bonus," said Dr. Fongwa. "But in the end, people just want someone who cares for them and takes care of the issues at hand. Latino patients would be really happy to be cared for someone who speaks there language. But I wouldn't say that it's a rule."

Dr. Fongwa has explored quality of care from African American, Latino, and white perspectives. At UCLA, she modified a popular patient satisfaction instrument to make it sensitive to concerns of African Americans. The instrument holds promise for use in studies of the satisfaction with care delivered to African Americans and perhaps other vulnerable population groups.

"It's important, as medical professionals, to do whatever we can to make our patients as comfortable as possible," said Swinney.

More than 300 students from high schools in Springfield, Holyoke, Northampton, and Amherst will attend the conference. The program aims to find students who are interested in nursing and inspire them to pursue careers in the field. There will also be education workshops and entertainment.

The keynote speaker is Helen Caulton-Harris, director of the City of Springfield's Division of Health and Human Services. Other speakers include Swinney, state representative Ellen Story, Eileen Breslin, dean of the School of Nursing, and Esther Terry, associate chancellor.

Patrick to speak at Westfield

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Westfield State College is preparing to host a Regional Community Meeting with Deval Patrick and Tim Murray, candidates for Massachusetts Governor and Lieutenant Governor this Saturday, October 21, from 3:00 p.m. to 4:00 p.m.

The meeting will be held at the Woodward Center on 577 Western Ave. in Westfield.

The Center contains bleacher seating for 1,000 people, and there will be assisted seating available for people who need it. There will be a brief opportunity for questions and answers at the end.

Patrick, who rose from poverty in Chicago's South side to a top position in the Clinton administration, swept to victory in the Democratic Party primary for governor last month, becoming the first African American to win a major party's nomination.

Patrick is pitted against Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey, the GOP gubernatorial nominee, who is seeking to become the first woman elected governor in the state. She is the first woman that the state GOP has nominated for governor.

Last Saturday, the Massachusetts Lawyers Weekly endorsed Patrick for governor, marking the first time the publication has picked a candidate for elected office. The endorsement comes after numerous law enforcement and public safety officials have endorsed Patrick in recent weeks, including several major police groups.

Recent advertisements that attacked Patrick created a stir throughout the state.

The first of the soft-on-crime ads targeting Patrick opens with a scene that looks like a low-budget version of the 1988 documentary, "The Thin Blue Line" about the cold-blooded murder of a Dallas policeman. The narrator faults Patrick for his role as the lawyer for a Florida "cop killer," asking, "While lawyers have a right to defend admitted cop killers, do we really want one as our governor?"

The second ad linking Patrick to convicted rapist Benjamin LaGuer is drawing comparisons with the infamous Willie Horton ads from 1988 that helped kill Michael Dukakis's presidential aspirations. "What kind of person defends a brutal rapist?" the narrator asks.

In a statement released Friday, Patrick sounded off against Healey's recent attack ads.

"Kerry Healey has never offered a single reason why she should be governor that doesn't depend on tearing me down. She has no vision, no plan, no positive agenda, and no leadership experience. Her record on jobs and the economy, on health care, on higher education, and on crime has been one of shortcuts, gimmicks and failure," said Patrick. "And so rather than deal with that, she has done everything she can to change the subject."

Candidate for Massachusetts governor, Deval Patrick, became the first African American to win in the Democratic Party primary for governor last month.

A graduate of Milton Academy, Patrick earned a Bachelor's and Law degrees from Harvard University. He first appeared on the political scene 20 months ago, having just resigned as general counsel for Coca-Cola.

President of labor council arrested for racketeering

BY PAT MILTON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The president of the nation's largest municipal labor council was arrested on federal racketeering charges Tuesday, accused of stealing more than $2 million from the state, labor unions and even a Little League fund.

Brian M. McLaughlin, a seven-term Democratic state assemblyman and president of the New York City Central Labor Council, has been under investigation for several years.

He surrendered Tuesday morning and was released on $250,000 bail after a brief appearance before U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. Francis. McLaughlin and his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, declined to comment as they left U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

"Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations," said the labor council's executive board chairman, Denis M. Hughes.

The labor council is an umbrella group of unions that has supported Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

In a 186-page indictment unsealed Tuesday, McLaughlin and others are accused of engaging in racketeering from 1995 through 2006 by using money collected for union activities to instead pay personal expenses, including credit card bills, rent and home improvements.

The indictment alleges McLaughlin committed mail fraud, embezzlement, money laundering and labor bribery by diverting money from various funds he controlled.

Among the funds identified were McLaughlin's political campaign committee, union accounts meant to provide benefits for union members and even contributions meant to support a Little League baseball program.

The indictment also alleges McLaughlin and others misappropriated funds from the state by creating fictitious jobs on his legislative staff and submitting false expense forms.

Among the expenses named in the indictment were more than $4,100 to maintain a boat in Tuckerton, N.J., and $4,200 for Long Island country club membership dues.

The indictment accuses McLaughlin of combining with others, not named in the indictment, to obtain hundreds of thousands of dollars in unlawful payments and things of value from street lighting contractors and other companies in the street lighting and traffic signal industry.

It also focuses at one point on a housing development created in 1950 by union leaders and electrical industry management that resulted in more than 30 large apartment buildings. As part of the development, residents created the Electchester Athletic Association Inc. to run a youth sports programs.

The indictment alleges McLaughlin used his position as state assemblyman to direct state money to that athletic association, then defrauded the association of more than $95,000.

Meanwhile, the indictment noted, McLaughlin continued soliciting donations to the athletic fund with sponsorship forms thanking the contributor and concluding with the message: "A CHILD IN SPORTS STAYS OUT OF THE COURTS!"

UMass Homecoming week begins

BY LORAINE BURGER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

UMass Homecoming week kicks off today with events and activities that stretch until Saturday evening.

Events include a talent show, a pops concert, a pep rally, a road race, a barbeque, the football game, and a concert featuring the All American Rejects.

Homecoming weekend isn't all about football. Alumni, students, and their families all come together for the weekend to show their Minutemen pride.

The MinuteMic Talent Show is the first event and will be taking place today at 8:00 p.m. at the Blue Wall cafe in the Campus Center. Be sure to stop by the Campus Center to sign up for the show!

The next event is the Alumni Appreciation Reception which will be held tomorrow at 2 p.m. at Memorial Hall.

Friday is the 32nd Annual Multiband Pops concert at the Fine Arts Center. The concert begins at 8:00 p.m. and includes jazz, percussion, wind music, and dance. Tickets are $12 for students and $18 for general admission. Would you rather be on the stage than in the audience? Join the first ever Most Spirited Student Contest at Pond Lawn at 8:00 p.m., where there will be a bonfire and pep rally.

Start your Saturday off bright and early with the Homecoming 8K Road Race! Runners meet at the tent at the Northeast Corner between the Alumni Stadium and lot 11 at 9:00 a.m. There will be a five dollar registration fee for UMass students. The benefits from the race go to the University Scholarship Fund.

Afterwards, get your football pre-game on at the stadium. There will be live entertainment, a climbing wall, face painting, games, and much more beginning at 11:00 a.m. The Alumni Association is holding a barbeque within the stadium from 11:00a.m. – 1:00 p.m. Tickets, which cover the barbeque and the football game, cost $10 for alumni and $15 for non-members.

The UMass Minutemen play the Rams of the University of Rhode Island at 1:00 p.m. at McGuirk Stadium. Show some Minuteman support for the team, and remember to sport the maroon! The first 4000 fans to enter the stadium will receive free T-shirts. Admission to the game is free for students with valid UMass IDs.

Homecoming weekend will end with a bang with the All American Rejects performing at the Mullins Center. They will be accompanied by special guests Under the Influence of Giants, ImaRobot and Damone. Doors will open at 7:00 p.m. and the concert will begin at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are on sale now for $15. Call for tickets at (413) 733-2500.

Homecoming events are brought to you by the Student Homecoming Committee, Alpha Phi Omega, the Center for Student Development, and the Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Preparing for demolition

Workers disconnect the domestic water lines and large sprinkler lines on North Pleasent St. in front of Frat Row. According to Alpha Tau Gamma, Inc. officials, this is the last step that must be taken before the five houses can be demolished, and UMass can purchase the properties.

Nevada to vote on legalizing weed

If passed, a ballot to legalize marijuana in Nevada may allow adults to possess up to an ounce of pot that they could buy at government-regulated marijuana shops.

BY SANDRA CHERRB
ASSOCIATED PRESS

RENO, Nev. — Gambling, prostitution, and now pot? Organizers of a Nevada ballot measure hope voters in a state where almost everything goes will go one better and legalize marijuana.

If it passes Nov. 7, Nevada will be the first state to allow adults to possess up to an ounce of pot that they could buy at government-regulated marijuana shops.

The Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana, which has pushed medical marijuana and decriminalization laws around the country, thinks Nevada — with its embrace of certain vices and its streak of Western independence — is a perfect venue.

In an editorial last spring, the rural Lahontan Valley News argued that gambling, Nevada's most powerful industry, caters to "visceral pleasures," and that it would hypocritical to oppose the legalization of marijuana on moral grounds.

Proponents of the measure also argue that the legal system wastes time and money on low-level marijuana offenses, and that taxing and regulating pot would put drug dealers out of business while freeing law enforcement to focus on violent crime and more dangerous drugs such as methamphetamine.

"Put it into a tightly controlled and regulated environment. We think that makes a lot of sense," Neal Levine, executive director of the committee.

Opponents, including law enforcement, the nation's drug czar, and civic and business groups, argue the measure would encourage the use of other drugs, and they question whether it will even prove to be a good source of tax revenue.

"The fact is, growing, distributing and warehousing marijuana will still be a federal offense," said Todd Raybuck, a Las Vegas police officer and spokesman for the Committee to Keep Nevada Respectable, which opposes the measure.

Question 7 allows people 21 and older to possess an ounce of marijuana in their homes — the same amount allowed under Nevada's medical marijuana law. Currently, possession of an ounce or less is a misdemeanor punishable by a $600 fine.

Twelve states have decriminalized small amounts of marijuana that is, possession is punishable by a ticket and a fine — and 11 allow its use for medical purposes. Possession of up to an ounce at home is legal in Alaska under a court ruling there, but the case is under appeal.

Colorado residents will vote next month on whether to legalize possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by those 21 and older, similar to an ordinance Denver voters approved last year.

But the Nevada measure goes further. It directs Nevada's Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate marijuana growers, distributors and retailers. At the same time, it doubles penalties for selling or giving pot to minors and for vehicular manslaughter while under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

The legislation also imposes a $45-per-ounce excise tax, with some of the proceeds going toward the budget and alcohol, tobacco and drug abuse programs. An ounce of pot on the street costs upwards of $300, depending on the quality.

A 2002 study by researchers at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas estimated taxing and regulating marijuana would generate $28.6 million in revenue.

The Justice Department in Washington did not respond to calls and e-mails seeking comment. In June, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled people who smoke marijuana for medical reasons can be prosecuted under federal drug laws, and Raybuck said it is doubtful federal agents would tolerate commercial pot ventures in Nevada.

In 2002, Nevada voters overwhelmingly rejected a move to legalize up to three ounces of marijuana. The latest measure got onto the ballot after 86,000 people signed petitions.

A poll conducted in September for the Las Vegas Review-Journal found 51 percent of voters opposed Question 7, while 42 percent supported it and 7 percent were undecided.

The measure has found some surprising allies.

"Make no mistake, I don't think using marijuana is a wise choice for anyone," said the Rev. William C. Webb, a Baptist minister who joined dozens of other religious leaders in announcing their backing. But "if there has to be a market in marijuana, I'd rather it be regulated with sensible safeguards than run by violent gangs and dangerous drug dealers."

Teenager's tongue piercing linked to pain

BY CARLA K. JOHNSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — The teenager said the stabbing pains in her face felt like electrical shocks that lasted 10 to 30 seconds and struck 20 to 30 times a day. Her doctors diagnosed trigeminal neuralgia, a nerve disorder sometimes called "suicide disease" because of the excruciating and dispiriting pain it causes.

Doctors tried painkillers, then stronger medication, but in the end, a cure proved more simple: The young woman removed the metal stud from her pierced tongue.

Two days later her pain vanished.

The account in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association is the latest documentation of complications, some life-threatening, linked to tongue piercing.

Other problems include tetanus, heart infections, brain abscess, chipped teeth and receding gums. One woman developed so much scar tissue that it resembled what she called a "second tongue."

In the newly reported case, the young Italian woman's mouth jewelry apparently irritated a nerve running along the jaw under her tongue. That nerve is connected to the trigeminal nerve, one of the largest in the head.

"There are people who have been dropped to their knees" by trigeminal neuralgia, said Alana Greca, a registered nurse and director of patient support for the Trigeminal Neuralgia Association. "That's how intense and how horrendous the pain can be."

The teenager is lucky her pain disappeared, Greca said.

"Certainly, this was an isolated case, an extremely rare complication of this kind of piercing," said Dr. Marcelo Galarza, a neurosurgeon at Villa Maria Cecilia Hospital in Ravenna, Italy, who reported the case to the journal.

The tongue is "a particularly dangerous place to pierce" because it is rich in blood vessels that can spread infection to major organs and because it is near important nerves and the upper airway, he said.

Jeanne Fritch, owner of Personal Art, a piercing and tattooing studio in Lake Station, Ind., said she has not heard of a similar case in her 21 years in business.

Fritch recommended people interested in tongue piercing see only professional, experienced piercers and use only "implant grade" metal jewelry. Good mouth hygiene while the tongue heals also is important, Fritch said.

Stefania Fraccalvieri, the patient in the report, is now 21 and a student in Rome. Her advice to people considering tongue piercing: "Don't do that. My experience was so bad. I was so sick and now I feel much better."

The American Medical Association documented many complications, such as tetanus, heart infections and brain abscess that are linked to tongue piercing.

Bush signs bill on terror prosecution

President Bush is seen after signing the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which sets new standards expediting the prosecution of terror suspects, during a ceremony in the White House yesterday.

BY NEDRA PICKLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Some of the most notorious names in the war on terror are headed toward prosecution after President Bush signed a law Tuesday authorizing military trials of terrorism suspects.

The legislation also eliminates some of the rights defendants are usually guaranteed under U.S. law, and it authorizes continued harsh interrogations of terror suspects.

Imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and awaiting trial are Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be 9/11 hijacker, and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells.

"With the bill I'm about to sign, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people will face justice," Bush said in a White House ceremony.

The Pentagon expects to begin pre-trial motions early next year and to begin the actual trials in the summer.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that trying detainees in military tribunals violated U.S. and international law, so Bush urged Congress to change the law during a speech on Sept. 6 in the White House East Room attended by families of the Sept. 11, 2001, victims. He also insisted that the law authorize CIA agents to use tough — yet unspecified — methods to interrogate suspected terrorists.

Six weeks later, after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the bill, Bush signed the new law "in memory of the victims of September the 11th."

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said. "I have that privilege this morning."

Civil libertarians and leading Democrats decried the law as a violation of American values.

The American Civil Liberties Union said it was "one of the worst civil liberties measures ever enacted in American history." Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold (news, bio, voting record) of Wisconsin said, "We will look back on this day as a stain on our nation's history."

"It allows the government to seize individuals on American soil and detain them indefinitely with no opportunity to challenge their detention in court," Feingold said. "And the new law would permit an individual to be convicted on the basis of coerced testimony and even allow someone convicted under these rules to be put to death."

The legislation, which sets the rules for court proceedings, applies to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq. It does apply to 14 suspects who were secretly questioned by the CIA overseas and recently moved to the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay.

Bush has been criticizing Democrats who voted against the law, called the Military Commissions Act of 2006, during campaign appearances around the country. He has suggested that votes against the law show that Democrats would not protect the country from another terrorist attack.

"The Democratic plan would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans' lives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said.

Bush noted that the law came amid dispute. "Over the past few months, the debate over this bill has been heated, and the questions raised can seem complex," he said. "Yet, with the distance of history, the questions will be narrowed and few. Did this generation of Americans take the threat seriously? And did we do what it takes to defeat that threat?"

The legislation says the president can "interpret the meaning and application" of international standards for prisoner treatment, a provision intended to allow him to authorize aggressive interrogation methods that might otherwise be seen as illegal by international courts. Bush said such measures have helped the CIA gain vital information from terror suspects and have saved American lives.

After Bush signed the law, CIA Director Mike Hayden sent a note to employees saying it gives them "the legal clarity and legislative support necessary to continue a program that has been one of our country's most effective tools in the fight against terrorism."

"We can be confident that our program remains — as it always has been — fully compliant with U.S. law, the Constitution and our international treaty obligations," Hayden wrote.

The White House has said that disclosing the techniques that are used would give the enemy information to resist those techniques. White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush would probably eventually issue an executive order that would describe his interpretation of the standards, but those documents are not usually made public.

Foley to reveal name of clergyman

BY BRIAN SKOLOFF
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Disgraced former Congressman Mark Foley, who claimed he was sexually abused by a Roman Catholic clergyman when he was a teen, will reveal the man's identity to the Archdiocese of Miami, his attorney said Tuesday.

No criminal charges can be filed because the statute of limitations on sexual assault expired long ago, but the archdiocese requested information about Foley's accusations, attorney Gerald Richman said.

"We're talking about issues that happened 36 to 38 years ago," Richman said. "This is all part of the healing process for Mark Foley. He thinks it's important to go ahead and bring this information out and hope and encourage other people who have been similarly abused to go ahead and come forward."

Richman said that when details are released they would deflate critics who have accused Foley, 52, of making up the abuse allegation shortly after he was confronted last month with sexually explicit electronic messages he had sent to teenage male pages.

"It's going to be very clear in the coming days that it is a fact as opposed to any possible allegations that it was a fantasy or something made up for political purposes," Richman said.

Richman said Foley has not told him the name of the clergyman but has told another attorney. He said the clergyman is still alive.

Archdiocese spokeswoman Mary Ross Agosta said the church had urged Foley to identify his abuser but said she was not aware that any meeting with Foley had been scheduled. She said the archdiocese's attorney is on vacation and not immediately available.

Foley, a Florida Republican, abruptly resigned last month over the sexually explicit Internet communications he had with teenage boys who worked on Capitol Hill. He has since entered an alcohol rehabilitation program at an undisclosed location.

His criminal defense lawyer, David Roth, has said Foley was an alcoholic and gay but denied any sexual contact with minors. He has not been charged with a crime.

Foley's departure left behind an Internet-age sex scandal that shook Republican confidence — and poll numbers — little more than a month before elections at which their control of the House will be tested. It also threw the spotlight on House Speaker Dennis Hastert regarding conflicting claims about what senior lawmakers knew, when they learned it and what they did about it.

Hawaii quake damage hits $46M

BY JAYMES SONG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WAIKOLOA, Hawaii — Preliminary damage estimates from the earthquake that shook Hawaii over the weekend hit $46 million on Tuesday, and President Bush declared a major disaster, opening the way for federal aid.

Damage to seven schools and a harbor on the island of Hawaii accounted for most of the preliminary figure, said Janet Snyder, a spokeswoman for Hawaii County Mayor Harry Kim. Damage to businesses, homes, roads and bridges accounted for the rest.

"These figures are going to change radically, I believe," because information continued to stream in, Snyder said.

The damage estimate included $31 million for schools, $8 million at Kawaihae harbor, $4.89 million to businesses, $650,000 to homes, $809,000 to roads and $754,000 to bridges, Snyder said. A statewide figure including damage to the other islands was not available.

The president's disaster declaration makes federal aid available to the state and local governments and nonprofit organizations for debris removal and other emergency purposes.

A Federal Emergency Management Agency team flown in from California planned to begin surveying the damage by ground later Tuesday.

Sunday's magnitude-6.7 earthquake was the strongest to hit the islands in more than two decades. No deaths or serious injuries were reported, and the damage appeared to be scattered, allowing most tourists and residents to resume life as normal.

The quake struck near Hawaii's Big Island, a 4,000-plus-square-mile isle with a population of 167,000. Most of its land is undeveloped or agricultural.

By comparison, the magnitude-6.7 earthquake that struck the Los Angeles area in 1994 caused $25 billion in damage.

The damage estimate is key because it could become part of the state's request for federal assistance.

The quake was the second major natural disaster to hit Hawaii this year. In April, heavy rains pounded the islands, contributing to a dam break that killed seven people. The rain also caused a major sewer line to rupture, closing Waikiki beaches.

The state estimated that the flood damage exceeded $50 million. It is spending tens of millions more to replace sewer lines.

Show some school spirit, players need our support!

In many colleges around the country, Homecoming is the most anticipated event of the year. It's a time to show some pride in your future alma mater. It's a time to connect with your fellow classmates, to be brought together as a unified community. It's a time not only for students, but the faculty, staff and alumni to show school spirit. Unfortunately, at UMass, it's a time that is completely forsaken by the student body.

Every year, we have Homecoming Week. Many of you probably don't even know, or worse, don't even care, that it is actually this week. Yes, initiated with Midnight Madness and the season-opener for the hockey team, Homecoming has officially begun.

If you look around campus, you will be sure to see signs promoting the array of events to coerce you into expressing a sense of identity as a proud and active student of UMass Amherst. There is a raffle, a talent show, a 5k road-race and a bonfire at the Campus Pond. Granted ours is nothing like the Texas A&M bonfire that was so magnificent it killed people, but it nonetheless can still act as an instrument to coordinate the collective orchestra of UMass students.

Nobody is motivated to attend the bonfire because, simply put, nobody attends the bonfire. It's a lethargic cycle we can't seem to pull ourselves out of. We tell ourselves we would go if it were worth going to, but fail to realize, at the same time, that it will only be worth going to if you go (and if your friend goes, your floor goes, your peers go). And it's not just the bonfire — this applies to all the sporting events on campus as well.

Last spring our lacrosse team went to the NCAA Division I National Championship. How many only tuned in for that final game? How many didn't watch at all?

How amazing would it have been if the entire school had attended that first playoff game, where the Minutemen began their march to the top by defeating Syracuse? It was a great game that many attended, but it could have been better because there could have been more.

With a massive crowd, it would have been an event for the ages, something much nobler than the UConn basketball game, a memorable upset that only drew a full crowd because people were looking to see the Champion Huskies in action. This apathetic attitude hurts the University, a pain that is helped along by ignorance.

Many people think our sports teams suck: they don't. Our football team is No. 7 in the nation, and they just trounced Towson 35-0. Our hockey team after this weekend is 1-1-0. That's not bad at all.

Listen because these words are not written to encourage, rather than condemn. Right now, whether you graduate in three years, two years or next semester, think about what you will remember about UMass; is it the blurry nights jumping from one party to the next? The frustration of keeping your feet clean of new dirt? This doesn't sound too appealing. Now picture the Mullin's Center, packed full of people wearing maroon, united in our common student spirit. It makes for a much better mental photo.

That is what we envision, but it's not going to happen without a collective effort from everyone. The only times we seem to be able to get together is when the Red Sox are on TV and we feel like failing to disperse. Let's change that. We can make this University much more cohesive and fun, and all we have to do is go to a sports game, for free. Homecoming is in the air this week, and we think you should take a proud whiff.

Should online groups be censored?

Greg Collins

One night while procrastinating I came across a Facebook.com group called, "Armenian genocide is a HUGE LIE."

Created by Texas Tech student Erat Tarik, this group, as one of the many cultivated on the online social networking site for and by students, conveyed an important political message to the public: "Armenian Genocide is nothing but a HUGE LIE. This lie is being used to cripple and divide the Turkish Republic."

The pressing issue is whether Facebook executives should censor certain student groups for expressing contrarian viewpoints which are particularly unsettling to other Facebook users, such as expressing racially or ethnically discriminatory messages. For instance, there is a group called, "The Confederacy will rise again," which to many students is offensive.

Yet, Facebook executives have rightfully allowed these groups to exist for the purpose of upholding free speech principles. The fact that certain historical areas of study are sensitive in the hearts and minds of American citizens is not sufficient enough reason to suppress viewpoints which may contradict conventional opinions about the subject.

This standard can be applied to different venues of academic inquiry at universities. In a course at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, lecturer Kevin Barrett argues that the 9/11 terrorist attacks were organized by the United States government. In both cases, censorship must not inhibit the quest to discover the truth regarding these events. Of course it remains to be seen whether Barrett intends to pursue the truth.

Unpopular views deserve to be taken seriously by people. But if such bold and contrarian claims are to be made, such as denying the extent of the murders of Armenians or President Bush's possible foreknowledge of the attacks, then they also deserve to be scrutinized with as much attention and detail as other viewpoints regarding controversial historical events.

In other words, those who express bold and unpopular viewpoints should be commended for their efforts to stimulate dialogue on important matters. But they should also be held responsible for presenting assertions which, after being analyzed, are proven to be false or intentionally misleading.

In this case, the group maintains the forced evacuation and subsequent deaths of hundreds of thousands of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire during World War I did not reflect the characteristics of genocide to explain its purpose calls into question whether it is truly devoted to pursuing historical truths or, rather, to promoting a Turkish nationalist agenda regardless of historical inaccuracies.

> The bombastic language used by the group's contributors to explain its purpose calls into question whether it is truly devoted to pursuing historical truths or, rather, to promoting a Turkish nationalist agenda regardless of historical inaccuracies.

Genocide is commonly defined as an intentional and systematic extermination of a particular cultural, race or ethnic group. Most Turkish scholars and Turkish nationalists acknowledge many Armenians died between 1915 and 1917, yet they do not accept the proposition this was genocide.

The Turkish government echoes the feelings of the Facebook group's founder. It maintains Armenians were relocated rather than compulsorily evacuated, and calls for the prosecution of people who argue an Armenian genocide did occur.

These policies appear to be in contrast with the principles of the Facebook group, which asserts it promotes tolerance and political diversity. However, the bombastic language used by the group's contributors could upset what peace there is in the Middle East.

Iraq's reemergence as a local power is vital for the interests of the United States. With North Korea testing nuclear weapons and Iran biting its thumb at the international community, the world can ill afford a civil or regional war in the Middle East. The spread of democracy will also continue when it is proven the system can work.

Patience is necessary. Democracies take time to form. The United States was essentially anarchy under the Articles of Confederation until four years after the war when order was restored with the ratification of the Constitution.

A third reason for winning this war, though maybe not politically correct, is oil. Oil is the greatest natural resource the earth has to offer. Despite popular belief, it does not just run our cars, but drives the whole economy. Its ill effects on the economy are very complicated, but to sum it up, as oil prices rise so will costs for businesses and consumers: everyone suffers.

However, there is a forum for skepticism. The most iconic image I have from the war in Iraq is still Mr. Bush flying onto that aircraft carrier and making a speech declaring, "major combat operations in Iraq have ended" while standing under a sign announcing, "Mission Accomplished."

> The current violence would pale in comparison to the violence caused by the onslaught of genocide; such an event could upset what peace there is in the Middle East.

Three years and five months later, the troop level has not changed dramatically in either direction. This breeds impatience. Also, as time passes, the total number of dead and wounded American soldiers and coalition fighters grows. According to a CNN count dated October 16, 2006, 2,770 soldiers have lost their lives with another 20,895 listed as wounded. This is surely a heavy price to pay but, in the end, their lives will not have been lost in vain.

Three and a half years later, we must still approach the war with the future in mind. The people who will suffer from a premature withdrawal from Iraq are the Iraqi people. Think about the children caught in the midst of nationwide civil war. Think about an Iran without a force to balance it. Think about the empty promises the United States will never be able to live down.

The deaths of Iraqi civilians will shoot through the roof without anyone there to serve as protection. There is one definite: an immediate withdrawal will cause a violent end to the Iraqi government. The decision to keep soldiers in Iraq is a very difficult one, but the path less traveled by may make all the difference.

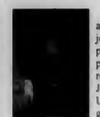
Premature withdrawal not a better option



Nick Milano

"The Lancet," a British medical journal, recently published a study performed by researchers from Johns Hopkins University. The group, led by Gilbert Burnham, refined a 2004 version of the study counting the deaths of Iraqi civilians. It reports there have been 654,965 excess deaths in Iraq since the start of the war.

This number is far beyond any maximum offered by a variety of sources from the U.N. to the Iraq Body Count. The results may lead people to advocate for a quicker exit by American forces from Iraq but the opposite is true. The astonishingly high number of deaths is another sign Iraq is still a lawless land, and reaffirms the necessity of keeping a force there to complete the job.

I will not enter the debate surrounding the reasons for the invasion of Iraq because they are so controversial, but will only say the reasons we went to war with Iraq were not valid. At this point, we have too compelling an interest in Iraq, and we cannot cut and run.

The Iraqi military is growing in size, and there are 130,000 soldiers in various stages of development. The National Police has 24,400 members, and there are 120,190 regular police officers. These numbers are on their way to the necessary threshold, and with time and assistance will ensure Iraq can provide for its own safety.

Leaving Iraq tomorrow would force these limited resources to fight off the sectarian violence on their own. They are clearly not able to do this. Looking at the data from the Johns Hopkins study shows the percentage of deaths caused by the coalition has decreased, while the total number of deaths has risen. The coalition is not causing the deaths directly, but violence among the political sects and terrorist attacks are responsible. The only people currently able to help minimize the violence are the ground forces fighting for the Iraqis' rights.

In a report issued by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, one of the fears of a withdrawal of coalition forces is devolution to a state of sharp internal fighting and ethnic cleansing. Iraq will become the center of struggles for power among the region's different countries. A more direct term for ethnic cleansing is genocide. The current violence would pale in comparison to the violence caused by the onslaught of genocide; such an event could upset what peace there is in the Middle East.

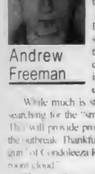
The 'smoking cow'



Andrew Freeman

Government mismanagement, corporate malfeasance, countless mistakes: they all culminate in tragedy. I speak, of course, of spinach contamination, which has currently sickened hundreds of Americans and killed three people.

Escherichia coli 0157 H7, a bacterium that lives in cow stomachs, was introduced into spinach in California's Salinas Valley. When the bacterium is eaten by humans its toxins cause illness, and it can kill people with weak immune systems, such as children or the elderly.

While much is still unknown about the case, authorities are searching for the "smoking cow," as one California official said. This will provide proof of the connection between the cattle and the outbreak. Thankfully, this "smoking cow," unlike the "smoking gun" of Condoleezza Rice's imagination, is unlikely to be a "mushroom cloud."

The specific cause may be difficult to find, but the connection can be made easily enough. Investigators tracked the bacterium to a cattle ranch that happened to grow spinach, in an area where the spinach fields are often encircled by pastures. The bacterium could be spread from cattle to spinach in a number of ways: for example, manure containing it could seep into the local water supply.

Although this crisis is severe, it is not a new problem. The Monterrey County region, which includes the Salinas Valley, has been responsible for 19 other cases of E. coli contaminating leafy greens over the past decade, according to the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). The FDA has repeatedly urged growers and shippers to improve product safety, starting with guidelines in 1998 and more warnings in 2004 and 2005.

Unfortunately, the FDA has little regulatory power over the produce industry and could only beg for compliance with its rules. In fact, it is only through voluntary recalls by distributors, like Natural Selection Foods, the company most affiliated with the outbreak, that the contaminated food is off the shelves of supermarkets.

Produce companies are, unsurprisingly, resisting efforts to allow for governmental regulation of their products. An industry spokesman declared "we are doing everything possible to provide the nation with safe and healthy produce." Given the repeated failures of the produce industry to improve safety and despite repeated warnings and outbreaks, these words ring hollow.

While much of the blame for this crisis rests with business, government should have done more. Former FDA official Michael Taylor, writing in the Baltimore Sun, noted there is no one agency charged with securing the nation's food supply with resources spread among the FDA, Centers for Disease Control and Department of Agriculture. Taylor urges the formation of such an agency, to coordinate research and regulatory efforts.

Thanks to the lack of governmental oversight, local groups are left to make their own decisions with regards to the outbreak. Here at UMass, Dining Services has done its part, removing all spinach from the D3's. Director of Dining Services Ken Toong stated in his blog, "Most of the spinach that we use during this time of year comes from local farms," and he feels such spinach is "safe." Nevertheless, he rightly asserted it is "in the best interest of the consumers" to wait for the FDA to declare spinach safe to consume.

Significantly, one authority that has not become involved in this crisis is the president. In his speeches and remarks to the media over the past month, the spinach outbreak has not been discussed. Given the upcoming Congressional elections, it is probable he is keeping a low profile to avoid affecting the campaigns of his fellow Republicans. Still, it is difficult to imagine the president being unconcerned, or even unaware, of a disaster that is harming hundreds of citizens.

In some ways, however, it is good that the president isn't involved. He won't go to a hospital with a loudspeaker to speak to the victims of this outbreak, which could have been prevented under his watch. When the crisis abates, he won't stand on top of an ambulance, with a banner declaring "Mission Accomplished." Needless death will not be converted to political capital and tax breaks.

The spinach outbreak has exposed major flaws in food safety symptomatic of private sector indifference and lack of government authority.

Nevertheless, our present crisis could be much worse. Contaminated spinach does not encourage torture or moral degradation. It does not send thousands of young men and women home in body bags, or leave others emotionally traumatized. It does not destroy America's reputation abroad or its unity at home. That would be another crisis entirely.

Addicted to addiction

Jackie Hai

In the mid-1800s, when opium abuse ran rampant throughout the Western world, injectable morphine was introduced as the cure. When it turned out that morphine was just as addictive and abusable, heroin came next in line as treatment.

Heroin, a morphine derivative, was developed and distributed by Bayer in the early 1900s as a safe cough medicine and way to rid oneself of morphine addiction. Oops – it turned out that the liver processed heroin into morphine anyway, and users found themselves right back where they started.

Today, methadone (also known as dolophine) is the legally recognized medication of choice for treating heroin and opiate addicts. Drug rehab centers across the country prescribe it to patients for long term use, citing studies that claim it is safe to continuously use for 10 or more years. But if it's so safe, why does it come with warning labels that say, "has potential for abuse and must be used with caution?"

Doesn't it sound like we're simply trading in one addiction for another?

If so, then the war on drugs has one big winner: pharmaceutical and medical research corporations. They win because every few decades, certain existing drugs are reclassified as the ills of society and new, legal drugs are rolled into the market to replace them. Cha-ching: thank you for buying, please come again soon! If the unforeseen side effects haven't killed you, that is).

Perhaps more disturbing is the trend toward medicating alcoholism and other behaviors whose classifications as diseases are still under debate among experts.

The U.S. government-sponsored National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA) firmly sticks to the pro-disease line, and funds research for the development of treatments. Already released is naltrexone (ReVia™), defined on their Web site as an "anti-craving medication" with the added note that "NIAAA-supported researchers found that this drug, in combination with behavioral therapy, was effective in treating alcoholism." Call me skeptical, but I find it a little hard to believe those study results are completely neutral; they were funded by the same organization that had a hand in creating the drug in the first place.

> Call me skeptical, but I find it a little hard to believe those study results are completely neutral; they were funded by the same organization that had a hand in creating the drug in the first place.

A new field in the treatment industry is burgeoning today as more and more behavioral problems are pulled into the addiction-as-a-disease tent. Responsibility for actions with negative consequences, like excessive shopping, gambling and eating, is shifted away from the individual and placed in a neat box labeled "impulse-control disorders." This is problematic for a number of reasons.

First, it means conscience and accountability are becoming qualities of the past. By continuing along the path we're on, all instances of behavior damaging to others and oneself could potentially be written off as a disease one day.

The insanity plea sure would gain a lot of traction in court. Thieves could hide under the umbrella of kleptomania, arsonists under pyromania, assailants and murderers under intermittent explosive disorder. If this seems like a far-fetched possibility, one only needs to look at the news today to see politicians and celebrities paving the way as they dodge repercussions of misbehavior by checking in to rehab.

Secondly, calling alcoholism a disease and compulsive behaviors disorders takes the power of control away from those who are affected. It creates a vicious cycle, a self-fulfilling prophecy where believing you don't have control results in the loss of it.

Groups like Alcoholics Anonymous, who support the disease theory, affirm those beliefs when they state, "The majority of A.A. members believe we have found the solution to our drinking problem not through individual willpower, but through a power greater than ourselves."

The "not my fault" attitude rears its head on campus today, too, where loss of control is one of the most popular excuses for binge-drinking and the dangerous or destructive behavior that stems from it. But is this the only explanation? What about other factors like confidence and self-discipline in the face of peer pressure?

UMass, at least, does one thing right in addressing those with drinking problems on campus – the Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students (BASICS) program that students are sent to after getting caught violating policy. BASICS focuses on self-assessment, education and moderation rather than the disease-treatment model advocated by groups like A.A.

In this particular regard, I applaud UMass for respecting us as humans capable of making our own choices and following through with them out of our own volition. After all, when it comes to autonomous power over our own bodies, why would we willingly hand over the keys to someone else?

UNITY SERVICE AA RECOVERY

Point-Counter-Point
Views on campus politics

James Mathews

Wesley Miller

James: Do you ever get sick of the political tilt on this campus? I was thinking, just now, about the Radical Student Union and Tent State University and the Students for a Free Tibet, when I caught myself wondering – what would have happened if they'd gone to a different school?

It was a good thought, but it didn't last. I was halfway through imagining a sea of dreadlocked, birkenstocked skateboarders transforming into crew-cut, Nike-wearing, pro-America pedestrians when I said to myself, "Hold the phone, James, you're in fantasy land." Because really, where in this great green nation of ours is there a college that won't suck you in clean and pump you out wearing a "No George W." sticker? It's terrible, really.

Wes: James, it just so happens that the other day I was thinking about our great nation and transforming our yuppie scum and Minutemen (border patrol) alike into a peace loving, environmentally friendly citizenry, when it occurred to me – It's not going to happen. If anything, we need a little Liberal University hegemony to save our impressionable youth from shipping out to North Korea and starting yet another Vietnam.

James: Oh, cut the hysterics, Miller. If you think college campuses are the only thing keeping us from another Vietnam, you're severely misguided. The year 2006 is not 1966, and if recent events are any indicator, it doesn't even matter what the Academia thinks. If the White House wants a war, it'll have it. Any activism on a campus like ours is nothing but righteous noise.

> James: "It helped get our boys out of Vietnam?" If that's the name of the game, then you and I might as well just drop a tab of acid and space out to "Sgt. Pepper's" for a while.

If you catch someone on the Student Union lawn with a sign [as long as it ain't a Jesus sign,] they're preaching to the choir. And I won't let you go thinking that some perceived political imbalance is any justification for professors to get up on their soapbox. As far as I knew, we were learning in an impartial system, where education dealt with facts and ideas, not values and ideologies.

Wes: You can take off your tinfoil hat, Mathews. At least you have the power to make choices at the University, unlike the Vietnam vets who were drafted and thrown headlong into it. All that "Liberal noise" was the exposure that helped us get our boys out of there (eventually).

As for an impartial system, what do you want? Would you rather our professors be bland and a-political with no sense of righteous anger or history? Would you rather be back in high school watching Mr. "so and so" "didn't quite make it" translate a textbook onto a blackboard? I happen to like a little passion in my educators.

James: "It helped get our boys out of Vietnam?" If that's the name of the game, then you and I might as well just drop a tab of acid and space out to "Sgt. Pepper's" for a while. After all, wasn't it the drugged-out music scene that gave the movement the exposure it needed to bring our boys home? Good grief. Forget the 60's reminiscence. Nothing nauseates me more.

What's at stake here isn't the legacy of the flower children or the sacred anti-war movement: it's our American education. In a decade when the presidential elections have been split right down the middle and the map is painted equally red and blue, campuses are still clinging to the Left, playing the great game of "la-la-la, we're not listening." It's high time the great old other half of American thought be allowed to get its two cents in.

Wes: We're talking about activism here, not fashion. I agree with you that sometimes the University student finds it difficult to differentiate between the two. If by two sides of the political picture you mean Democrat and Republican, then yes, it's a truly massive failure, as you say.

> Wes: You want to talk about my generation? Globalization, healthcare crisis, war, inequality, environmental destruction; these are real issues, and they require real minds to champion their remedy.

But then again, what would constitute a massive victory: students graduating with neutral, non-partisan standpoints? You forget the average student doesn't walk in with a blank slate. The bulk of UMass students are (you guessed it) from Massachusetts. It's called free speech Mathews. If you don't like it, move to Russia.

James: Good God almighty, Miller. Did I mention free speech? Did I say you don't have a right to protest." Quick, call in the A.C.L.U. If you're still under the unholy impression that someone out there is oppressing you, wake up. Stop dreaming. The sun came out. The Vietnam War ended.

If I hear one more allusion to what our parents faced 40 years ago, I'm quitting. Different times call for different strategies, and the United States of America is a very different place in 2006.

I refuse to be part of a generation that wastes its time in the sunshine of youth by playing make-believe and pretending it's still '69. I'm looking for equal representation: I 'm looking for different professors with different views, professors who keep their ideological affiliations to themselves and excite students with their passion for their subject first, and leave their cause behind. I'm looking for the whole spectrum of American thought, not a stomping ground for one half of the discourse. For too long the University has been the playground of the Left. Recess is over, and it's time to play nice with the rest of the class.

Wes: You want to talk about my generation? Globalization, healthcare crisis, war, inequality, environmental destruction: these are real issues, and they require real minds to champion their remedy. If we take away the University, we rob our activist intellectuals of their last safe haven.

If we load our universities with non-partisan, bureaucratic pep talkers, these issues can and will fall by the wayside. We don't need crutches, we need people who are willing to challenge us beyond textbooks.

I once received a fortune cookie that read "a mind, once spread beyond its original parameters, never regains its original dimensions."

James: I'm sorry to say, but on a scale of one to "I'm a raging hippie," "I once received a fortune cookie" is getting up there. Don't you mean "I once received a fortune cookie, maaaan?"

Do you want to talk globalization, healthcare and environmental destruction? By all means. But make some room for a two-sided debate on immigration issues, the good old Israel debate, the value of wars abroad, or even the extent of Supreme Court power.

There are two sides to the political coin, and there might even be more. Teaching both sides of the issue does not require a lack of enthusiasm or a dry, textbook discourse. If anything, it should jump-start the discourse, make room for debate, trade laziness for a sense of competition and maybe even foster the beginnings of a meaningful American political discussion.

And as exciting as it may seem when you're there, those are the last things you're going to find in a class where a professor from one side of the tracks is given carte-blanche to say whatever he wants. There's a word for that: indoctrination.

Wes: First of all, I went to a Catholic high school. I don't think you have any idea what real indoctrination sounds like. As for western-Muslim divide in Europe, that's not exactly a local issue. It is, perhaps, interesting when considering the state of world affairs, but how does the student deal with that when making every day decisions or taking a stand?

Perhaps these issues are more heuristic (directing one's attention in learning, discovery or problem-solving) than you've considered. I think your version of the University is a little on the unrealistic side. After all, if non-partisan politics actually worked, we wouldn't be dealing with the massive red/blue state divide or the emergence of the religious Right.

I just don't see your model as sustainable, especially when universities are prone to develop their own discourses and cultures. Your fantasy university would just degenerate into the same kind of politically correct disaster you seem to be perceiving anyway.

James: There's one thing we should be beyond today, and it's the bureaucratic nightmare that is political correctness. If our best excuse for not giving a realistic academic dialogue a chance is our fear of the 'ol P.C. monster, then I'm afraid we have no courage, let alone brains.

As for the "indoctrination" word, I appreciate that UMass may function quite well as a big political rehab center for unsuspecting Catholic-schoolers, but we've got to face the music. Harvard may be allowed its discourse and Princeton may be allowed its style, but UMass is a public school, and we've all got our sticks, fingers in the tax-cookie jar. We want our say. You want the meaningful experience of activism I say that just crowds the real world out. I say, reverse the lyrics to that good old Elvis bit a little less action, please. I let's have more conversation.

Wes: If I'd is were alive today, he'd kick you in the balls. There are blogs for people like you, James. How about you drop out and join an eating club at Princeton? You can make the contacts you need to join a think tank, at least there you can have the Conservative groupthink that you seem to need so badly. Ass.

James: I believe the correct term is "politically challenged American," as in "the Conservative groupthink that you seem to need so badly." "Politically challenged American." It's a much more sensitive term, and it has been approved as completely inoffensive by a think tank, you know, one that does that Liberal groupthink you love so much...donkey.

American sexuality

M.J. Toomey

You can point the finger any number of ways, but as far as I'm concerned, pornography was instrumental in the capitalist plot to keep the low, low Look at the history of sexuality in Western societies. It was shunned, stigmatized and made sinful, and it seems that all this turns around when people realize (gasp) they can make money off of our animal drives.

We all know capitalists are hypocritical Hobbesians in that they believe our nature as humans is inherently sordid and brutal but, of course, they are the beneficiary exceptions to that rule. Any piece of meat that can be thrown to promote a feeding frenzy among us dogs keeps us from noticing anything at all.

And so it goes with sexuality, all of a sudden in great America, the industrial boom loosens garter belts and shreds frocks down into thong panties and halter tops and tells girls it's OK to fornicate and express interest in it publicly. Throw out some crude videos detailing how it should be done, but, more importantly, with whom it should be done, and look where our proletariat minds are today.

Sons of all the plans, the structures, the conspiracies that may or may not shape our very lives, I'd be pressed to find one more expertly erected than the sexual plot. Now, would you be surprised? We've got haves and have-nots throughout history. The minute haves of today tend towards ugly, bald, filthy-rich execs, while thoroughly duped working class individuals get a very short end of the stick.

For some reason, human nature has almost universally surfaced as violent oppressions of sexuality (from the Middle East to Puritan Europe to Japan). In other words, sexual rigors seem absolutely critical to keep society in order. Otherwise, and "God" forbid, the imminent recourse appears to be libidinous anarchy – everybody too busy shacking up with each other to work and get their work quotas fulfilled to capitalist benefit.

So, we've got a clear view of the danger of horniness, because just a touch of it is all it takes to lose your mind over it. Remember Thomas Morton from the early days of Puritan Massachusetts? He was the outwardly respectable head of the Merry Mount trade outpost in today's Quincy, who was the epitome of moral scourge to our uptight colonists.

Morton was into socializing with the Native Americans, selling them guns and ammo, getting drunk, maypole dancing and, worst of all, apparently hosting large, interracial orgies. This dastardly fellow, a colonial Hugh Hefner maybe (the contemporary guy is celebrated and serves as a role model for millions of boys and men today), was jailed, fined and banished from the colony.

Somewhere along the line, things took a turn though. Just look at Tom Morton through today's lens, like I said, maybe a Hugh Hefner. Maybe conceptually, but think about this: what's Hugh Hefner have that Morton didn't? A flippin' industry, that's what.

He's the figurehead of relaxed machismo with a harem of freaky blondes, and that's what tricks us fools into liking him, but we forget he's on top of billion dollar corporate workings. He's a capitalist before he's anything else. He keeps you down directly. There's no question as to what he's selling you, but the reason it works so well today is because some genius marketer realized that centuries of pent-up desire could pull our wallets around by the pants. Since chauvinism has been a large part of most societies since forever, of course it's the women who are going to be objectified. It may not be pc, but it is historically accurate.

> Since chauvinism has been a large part of most societies since forever, of course it's the women who are going to be made into the object, the symbol of this all.

The cleverest part of this endeavor is its magical hold on both sexes. The precedent of beauty in society, establishing there's nothing more valuable than a beautiful woman, makes both men and women push income into petty little buys with the hope to get in on a piece of the action. Look in any women's publication and the advertising has the slant of "look how great you can look with in [useless product name here]."

The stuff aimed at guys says "look how much chicks will dig you with in this [name of useless piece of junk here]." It's everywhere, but that's nothing new, however Internet porn is a relatively new deal.

See, the thing is, by and by, it's free: yeah, memberships, this and that, but there are millions of free sites. It's worse than leeching our monies because it distracts. How many guys have had a large portion of the motivation to be upwardly mobile in society lobotomized by the rise of "Busty Adventures" and "Bangbus?"

It's right there, you don't have to go anywhere to get beautiful women naked. That, my friends, is the implicit goal of capitalism: the power to get beautiful women naked. So, for the sake of all us proletariat saps, block those sites, and really go for it. Make some waves in this corrupt system, and demand your power back. To get...equal access to resources. Yeah...that's it.

Half Nelson hits theaters

BY PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Perhaps the crowning achievement of Ryan Fleck's "Half Nelson" is its demonstration that there is some underlying truth to the persistent whine of self-proclaimed cineastes. The independent film community is capable of producing movies that Hollywood could never manufacture, at least not with the same aura of reality. Had one of the Big Ten backed "Half Nelson," the film's many cracks and rivets would be polished beyond all recognition. The editing and camera would be oily-slick, the music performed with only the finest of instruments and recording equipment. The actors, it goes without saying, would be prettier.

To summarize, it would be too well done, too over-the-top, the product of an industry obsessed with logistics, professionalism, and marketability. Fleck's raw depiction of the movie's subject material only serves to better confront the viewer with the grim realities of its plot. The audience is free to inspect the characters of the character-driven "Half Nelson" with an uncommon clarity, with no Hollywood glaze to streak the glass of the display case.

Ryan Gosling ("Remember the Titans") plays Dan, a junior-high history teacher in a decrepit school in Brooklyn. Introverted by default and extroverted when he feels he is expected to be by society, Ryan is generally a loner whose only full-time living companion is his cat, Dave. Dan is caught smoking crack cocaine by one of his students, Drey (Shareeka Epps, in her film debut) and the two form a bond neither wants to admit is horrifically awkward. Drey has personal problems of her own, and she and Dan attempt to make things better for each other despite a crippling lack of knowledge of how to do so.

Dan employs unorthodox teaching methods and treats his students as equals, an attitude that pushes the film dangerously close to an inescapable pit of cliche filmmaking. Few plots are as trite, timeworn and mawkish as the "Mr. Smith Goes to Teach Public School" story, where the kids are unruly but their instructor teaches them respect by respecting them in return. But the film never approaches such levels of maudlin storytelling, nor does it acknowledge that the cliche even exists. Rather than the teacher being a wise, blameless guru, he is as fallible as his indigent students, desirous to enrich their lives but afraid his own problems will rub off on them if he does not remain in the sole position of their teacher.

Grade A-

The entirety of the film is grainy, and possibly shot exclusively with handheld cameras as well. It could probably fit the guidelines of a Dogma 95 film, and certainly is in tune with the movement's purpose. Throughout the movie, there is little change in the camera angles, rate of cuts, or even the tone of the music. Such homogenous directorial style leaves the actors to convey the changing mood of the film all by themselves, unaided by differing camera or editing techniques forming a cheat sheet for the audience. As a result, the audience's attention is forced upon the characters themselves.

Smith professors receive Sherrerd award

Professors Justin Cammy, John Hellweg, Samuel Intrator and Kevin Shea all received the Sherrerd Prize for Distinguished Teaching yesterday.

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Sherrerd Award is a big deal at Smith College.

Every year, four professors are chosen from the Smith College faculty board to receive the Kathleen Compton Sherrerd '54 and John J. F. Sherrerd Prize for Distinguished Teaching. This award was established four years ago, and this year an all-male selection was elected. Professors Justin Cammy, John Hellweg, Samuel Intrator and Kevin Shea highlighted this year's list.

The four professors were told of their success earlier in the year, but yesterday they were recognized publicly in Sweeney Concert Hall on the Smith campus.

Justin Cammy started teaching at Smith College in 2001 after completing his doctoral work from Harvard University. Being an expert in modern Yiddish literature and Eastern European Jewish culture, Cammy focuses his studies on the literature of Israel. He teaches about the Holocaust and Jewish American culture, as well as an introduction to Judaism.

John Hellweg brings a theatrical presence to the list of winners. This University of California, Berkeley graduate earned his doctorate and began teaching at Smith in 1979. He has directed more than forty performances throughout the years. His focus lies mainly with Southeast Asian theatre and dance, performance theory, inter-culturalism and performance. His recent work has consisted of two, one-woman performances, "Mother Maroon," and "I Used to be One Hot Number."

Samuel Intrator is a professor of education and child study at Smith. He arrived at Smith in 1999, and has since brought much to the campus, such as his lecture titled "The Inspiration Gap: Why Structural Reform Rarely Impacts the Achievement Gap," which was featured last March at Middlebury College. He has written various books, including the award-winning "Tuned In and Fired Up: How Teaching Can Inspire Genuine Learning."

Kevin Shea started off his professional career at Smith in 2000, right after he received his PhD at MIT in the spring of that same year. He teaches general chemistry at Smith, and focuses on organic chemistry and it's role in today's scientific culture. He has released several essays and publications of his research, which focuses on new methods for carbon-to-carbon bond formation and developing syntheses of biologically active molecules.

The professors have clearly made their mark in the nation's largest undergraduate women's college.

Story of the Year to play Pearl Street Nightclub

BY JEREMY FOWLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After much acclaim for their freshman release, "Page Avenue," Emo-rock quintet Story of the Year has made a household name for itself. With mega hits "Until the Day I Die" and "Anthem of our Dying Day" Story of the Year has developed a very devoted following who are sure to turn out in large numbers for their performance tonight at the Pearl Street Nightclub.

While "growing up" on the Vans Warped tour exposed Story of the Year to a very large audience, it was their solo club touring that built a strong following which makes Story one of the biggest bands of the Emo genre. They toured with their album "Page Avenue" non-stop from early 2003 to the end of 2004 before taking a break. During this break they recorded their sophomore follow-up to the platinum album, "In The Wake Of Determination" was released in October of 2005 and, as the band members agree, more accurately displays the true Story of the Year. "In The Wake Of Determination" has a much heavier sound and is very different then the Emo ballads found on "Page Avenue."

Although many fans of the "Page" were surprised with the change of sound, those who grew to love the band after their live shows were pleased with the new-found edge.

In between "Page" and "Determination," the band members from Story found time to release a live disc titled "Live In The Lou," filmed and recorded in their hometown of St. Louis, Missouri. Showing their energetic live show, this disc depicts all that one can expect at tonight's performance. They bring an amazing presence to stage and have been known to even have a little fun putting new spins on old favorites such as Guns & Rose's "Sweet Child Of Mine," Michael Jackson's timeless "Billy Jean" and tackling new found hardcore favorite Bon Jovi's "Living On A Prayer" (Atreyu has also covered Bon Jovi doing their best hardcore impression of "You Give Love A Bad Name").

Seeing Story of the Year live will put a whole new perspective on how you view the band. If you have only heard "Page Avenue," you will be in for a surprise. Although they are sure to play "Anthem..." and "Until The Day I Die" the other songs on the setlist will be, most likely, more hardcore than ballad, in an attempt to get the crowd going and bouncing to a furious pace and the mosh pit going beserk. Those who are fans of crowd surfing are sure to find plenty of opportunities as Story plays.

In support of Story will be new-comers Greeley Estates. Fresh from this year's Van Warped Tour, featuring their first full length album "Far From The Lies," they depict screamo rock at its finest. With the catchy and riff driven "Y'all with the Vampire Squad" they have been turning heads since coming onto the scene. Although the constant screaming vocal styles can be hard to stand for some people, Greeley Estates lead singer Ryan Zimmerman has such a unique vocal style it is hard not to at least find yourself becoming somewhat interested in Greeley Estates style.

Anberlin will also be lending their sound to the opening performances, so make sure to turn out early so you can catch all these great bands under one roof. The show starts at 6:30 at Pearl Street in Northampton so come out and enjoy one of the premier bands in the Emo-rock scene and some great new up-and-comers in this growing genre.

New to the music scene, Story of the Year will try their luck at Pearl Street for a performance tonight.

Closing of CBGB marks the end of a musical era

CBGB, after 32 years, finally closes up shop on October 31. The club was widely known to reel in such inspiring bands such as the Talking Heads and The Ramones.

BY JIM FARBER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

NEW YORK — I admit it: I can't remember the last time I went to see a show at CBGB. Not only was this sacred dump hardly a hotbed of scene-making lately, it hasn't worn that mantle since the hard-core matinee era of the early-to-mid-1980s.

Yet every time I pass the place I smile and swoon, reminding me that some memories pull so hard on the senses that they feel more like events in the present tense than a glance into the rearview mirror.

Clearly, I'm not the only one who feels this way. Whenever I pass this homely piece of history, I never fail to see people staring moonily at its crumbling facade, or eagerly pointing cameras at its drooping canopy, all dreaming of a past glory most of them probably never saw but which they each hold as dearly as if they had.

That's what happens at historic sites: They resonate so finely with the past that, if you stand close enough, you can feel their spirit coursing right through you.

It's also why, in a more reasonable world, CBGB would leave its squat home on the Bowery the same day the Statue of Liberty gets evicted from its harbor isle. That this club's battered walls withstood their lasts blasts of striking noise Sunday night is both a crime to pop culture's collective memory and a desecration of the city's spirit. It also doesn't do much for the local tourist board, which sells CBGB in youth-oriented guidebooks in every language short of Esperanto.

The shuttering of the club Oct. 31 also makes more distant and circumscribed some of the best events of my life — not to mention the thousands of others who bore witness to CB's manic peak.

To my great and enduring fortune, I spent a significant portion of the mid-'70s drunk and gazing at the ratty rock hands who found their screechy voices mere feet away.

Like many, I first read about a new scene percolating at the place where Bleecker Street slams into the Bowery in a 1974 Village Voice article by the wonderful James Wolcott. I was 16 and so hobbled with just a learner's driving permit. By the time '74 turned to '75, however, I had the necessary license to begin tooling my 1969 Chevy Nova down to one of the dankest intersections in the city.

Braving the squeegee men, robbers and ne'er-do-wells who ran the area at the time, I arrived with two friends in early '75 to see a band whimsically titled the Talking Heads. At the time, they were then a spindly, acoustic trio. "Psycho Killer" was their signature piece, and it sounded funnier, darker and more wondrously odd than anything as is the goal of a character-driven film.

The film's grainy look also serves to aid its stark portrayal of New York's inner cities, which is outstanding in that it's refreshingly realistic compared to the portrayal of such settings in mainstream fare. Hollywood tends to be predictably condescending to its lower-class characters. It repeatedly portrays them in shades of varying but still constant ineffectiveness (for example: blameless and dignified characters are portrayed as simultaneously strong and helpless). While a lower-class viewer would feel a bizarre and unnatural combination of pride and self-pity watching such a movie, he would immediately be able to relate to the characters of "Half Nelson," thanks to the film's unapologetic realism in depicting them.

It's easy to recognize the elements of "Half Nelson" that would be muted, obscured, or downright perverted had it been manufactured by the Hollywood machine. Dan would certainly not be addicted to crack, but a narcotic with an air of romanticism attached to it, such as heroin or alcohol. The character's personal problems would be easier to digest, with none of the excessively gnarly problems the urban population has in real life. The film's look would be immaculate, and the camera would be handheld only during scenes of action or confrontation to give them a disorienting feel. The movie would be scrubbed down with disinfectant and vacuum-sealed, too afraid to offend to make a valid statement about anything.

"Half Nelson" has the unfortunate tendency to become aware of its independent film status and strut its provision of social commentary, which is most evident in scenes of Dan's students presenting reports of civil rights issues ranging from Brown v. Board of Education to the Harvey Milk assassination. The necessity and relevance of such scenes is questionable, but at least they underscore the film's theme of people making do in times of injustice. The film is deceptively simple, fleshed out by the intricacies of its plot and characters to form a startlingly realistic depiction of honor – and friendships – in the ghetto.

Ryan Gosling plays Dan, a drug-addicted junior high teacher in Ryan Fleck's unapologetic urban portrayal in his new movie, "Half Nelson."

Stanley goes solo

BY ALAN K. STOUT
WILKES-BARRES TIMES-LEADER

With "Live To Win," Paul Stanley's first solo album since 1978, the "Starchild" of KISS has not only delivered a terrific hard-rock record, but has also dropped a batch of fiery and incredibly melodic songs that will remind even the most disillusioned of KISS fans why they fell in love with the band in the first place.

For plenty of the KISS faithful, it's never been about the makeup or the huge stage shows. The love for the band came from the music, and Stanley, more often than not, was the one dishing out some of KISS' best songs. With "Live To Win," Stanley — minus Gene Simmons and the rest of the "Hottest Band In The World" — is not only in top form, but has clearly released the best KISS-related item of any kind in more than a decade. It is a tremendous rock album.

The disc, in stories Oct. 24, kicks off with the explosive title track and then slams into the fresh and modern, yet also somewhat grand and trippy, "Lift." And it only gets better from there.

"Wake Up Screaming" is loaded with infectious hooks and clever instrumentation, and despite its aggressive title, it's really a song about loss and comes with some heavy sentiment. "Every Time I See You Around" — perhaps the best track on the album — is also insanely melodic, perfectly arranged, and is one the most passionate and visual tunes Stanley has ever penned.

Stanley, who often writes with a great sense of bravado, steps into those shoes again with the gritty and soulful "Bulletproof," which is also one of the few songs on the LP that sounds as if could have come from the KISS catalog, particularly the late '80s "Hot In The Shade" era of the band. The stomping and soaring "All About You" is one of the album's purest rockers, though it too is anchored by a fine mix of punch and melody and also gets some extra pizzazz from Stanley's proficient knob-twirling. Same goes for the dismissive "It's Not Me" and the uplifting "Where Angels Dare," which are also, like the rest of the album, bolstered by his strong vocals and the beefy production.

What's most interesting about the CD, besides Stanley's ability to craft a completely modern-sounding album that also stays true to his roots, is how he apparently has also remained so true to himself. The beautiful "Second To None" is clearly an ode to his second wife, with whom he recently had his second child, and yet some tracks, such as the equally beautiful "Loving You Without You," sound as if they were written during his divorce. Whatever the case, he's put all on the table and into the songs, and it's all a part of the reason he's delivered such a memorable album.

Perhaps the fact that "Live To Win" is loaded with so many highlights shouldn't come as surprise. When all four members of KISS surprised the rock world in 1975 at the height of their career and released solo albums on the same date, Stanley's was the best. And when it comes to combining memorable lyrics with a hard-rock kick, all you have to do is play KISS gems such as "Hard Luck Woman," "Sure Know Something," "Reason To Live," "Forever" and "I Still Love You" to hear what he's capable of.

The same cannot be said for the majority of his solo efforts, especially those during the makeup-'80s era, which, as the band's KISS, especially during the makeup-'80s era, which, as the band's KISS, especially during the makeup-'80s era, which, as the band's KISS, especially power and was carted off by a teammate and trainer.

"It's a pulled hamstring," Koch said. "With our miracle doctor [referring to athletic trainer Kristen Wilson], hopefully she'll have him back for Sunday [against Rhode Island]."

SLOWING DOWN THE GAME

The Minutemen have struggled on the road this year, mounting a 3-3-2 record away from Rudd Field, including 1-3 mark when visiting a conference foe. Koch doesn't blame the struggles on anything specific. There's no mystique on the home field, or some weakness in the players' character. However, Koch did mention how much he prefers playing on his own "field" specifically.

"A cow can eat the field we play on," Koch explained. "On Sunday [Oct. 8 at Xavier], a cow can't eat that field."

Rudd Field is a well-maintained natural-grass field that, frankly, is beautiful to see or step on. It is also one of the widest fields in the A-10. It is a far cry from some of the other surfaces in the A-10. Many teams play on the new artificial grass surface, or "FieldTurf", made of a rubber-like material that imitates real grass with out the maintenance. George Washington and Xavier (both road losses for UMass) have this type of field. The biggest difference is the speed of play on the artificial fields.

"The width of the field makes us a better team, playing on a grass surface which is not as quick helps us," Koch said. "I definitely think we're better on our own field than we are on other fields."

STOPPING EVERYTHING

UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons, who set a new single-season shutout record with his 10th blanking Sunday against Temple, received conference and regional accolades Monday for his weekend performances.

The redshirt sophomore was given A-10 Men's Soccer Performer of the Week honors and was named to the TopDrawerSoccer.com's Team of the Week after shutting out Saint Joseph's and Temple over the weekend.

Simmons helped the Minutemen grab a win and a tie, significantly improving their playoff chances in the A-10. He now has a 0.78 goals-against average and has made 72 saves.

He now has 14 shutouts in his career, just two shy of the of the school career record set by Bryan O'Quinn, who played from 1998-2001. Simmons is in just his second season. He has the remainder of this season and two more seasons to get three more clean sheets and become the all-time shutouts leader at UMass.

Junior captain Kenny Cook anchors the UMass defense this season. All eight of UMass' wins have come via the shutout.

play is the No. 9 Saint Louis Billikens (8-3-2, 4-0-1 A-10). In the first ever midseason men's soccer Ratings Percentage Index (RPI) released by the NCAA, the Billikens rank ninth among 199 Division I programs.

Last weekend they went, 1-0-1, against division foes Xavier and Dayton. St. Louis battled Xavier (6-7-1, 3-1-1 A-10) into a double overtime 2-2 tie.

On Sunday, they shutout the struggling Dayton Flyers (4-9-0, 0-5 A-10), 2-0. St. Louis will travel to Philadelphia where they will face a struggling Saint Joseph's squad.

Last season, the Billikens embarrassed Saint Joseph's in a dismantling 8-0 victory in only their second meeting since 1970. The Billikens lead the all-time series 2-0.

RHODE ISLAND AT THE TOP

The Rhode Island Rams (8-4-3, 5-1-0 A-10) stand alone at the top of the Atlantic 10 conference standings with 15 points. Right on their heels is Charlotte and Richmond with 13 points but more importantly zero losses.

The Rhody's collected two wins over the weekend. They defeated Temple (2-10-1, 1-4-0 A-10), 2-1. junior midfielder Geoffrey Cameron scored the game-winning goal.

The Rams also toppled Saint Joseph's, 6-1. senior forward Jeffery Gonsalves scored two goals and an assist over the Hawks.

In all the Ram's offense out-shot both teams, 36-6. Gonsalves leads the conference in both points (28) and goals (13). The Rams will host UMass on Saturday.

Jason Scudamore and the Minutemen are 8-5-3 overall and 2-1-1 in the Atlantic 10 this season.

miss a field-goal attempt against UMass. When Coen fumbled after being sacked in UMass territory, the Tigers were in prime position to get on the scoreboard late in the first quarter.

Linebacker John Webb recovered the ball at the UMass 10-yard line where the offense took over. A false start penalty backed the Tigers up to the 15, and their momentum vanished.

After a Nick Williams run and a screen to Marcus Lee netted the Tigers just six yards, DeSautels game out to try the 24-yard attempt. The kick sailed wide right.

UMass took over and scored the very next drive on a 3-yard pass from Coen to London.

NATIONAL RECOGNITION

Coen was named the Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week and was named a I-AA.org Weekly All-Star for his 303-yard, five-touchdown performance against Towson.

The five scores tie a UMass school record. The last Minutemen quarterback to throw five touchdowns in a game was Matt Guice in a game against James Madison in 2001.

Coen also passed Tim Day – the man he replaced last season – on the school passing-yardage list. He now has the fifth-most passing yards in UMass history with 3,584.

TU limited without Schaefer

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Friday afternoon, Towson athletic trainer Terry O'Brien gave Tigers coach Gordy Combs some of the worst news a coach can receive just before game day. O'Brien informed Combs that his starting quarterback would be unavailable to face Massachusetts on Saturday. Sean Schaefer came down with what the team called an unspecified illness.

UMass Football

"How much is it going to change if you don't have time to practice it? It's a little bit different if you know the guy comes out with an injury," Combs said about his game plan. "But its [tougher when it] happens when we go into our last script of the practice and the trainer comes up to you and says your starting quarterback may not be able to play tomorrow."

The worst news for Combs turned out to be the best news for UMass coach Don Brown and the Minutemen. Schaefer leads the conference in passing yards – throwing for an average of 260 a game.

"We were excited about the challenge [of facing Schaefer] and obviously when you have your guy that's leading the league in throwing unavailable to you, that's a difficult situation," Brown said.

Junior Andrew Goldbeck started for the Tigers in place of Schaefer. Not having much time to prepare with Goldbeck, Towson threw a lot of short-yardage screens opposed to its usual downfield attack.

On their first drive, the Tigers ran the ball three times, had a false start and threw one screen play that gained six yards. The drive ended after just four plays when Brandon Smith intercepted a short pass intended for DayRon Arnold.

"In that situation instead of trying to thread the needle you have to throw the ball away. You just have to eat it," Combs said of Goldbeck's poor decision making.

The UMass defense dominated Towson all game long. Of the Tigers' 11 possessions, seven ended in punts, three ended with turnovers – one interception, two fumbles – and one ended with a missed field goal at the Minutemen 7-yard line.

Quarterback Liam Coen hands off to tailback Steve Baylark, who passed the 4,000-yard mark for career rushing yards Saturday.

The shutout moved the Maroon and White atop the conference in scoring defense. It's allowed just 10.5 points per game this season.

"The guys work hard. We pride ourselves on working hard during practice," senior safety James Ihedigbo said. "Guys say that we play games during practice because we basically do. We feel we need to be that good. What we're doing is [because of] our effort, it's showing."

BLUSTERY CONDITIONS

The flags at the east end of Johnny Unitas Stadium didn't rest at all on Saturday. The wind was whipping left to right through the stadium all game long at 21 mph, sometimes reaching as high was 27 mph.

With the wind came problems. Both the Minutemen and Tigers felt the wind's wrath at different points in the contest.

"In this game when you're playing on artificial surfaces now, the one thing that can kind of impact the game negatively [is the wind]," Brown said. "I thought the wind certainly impacted the football game. You had to make your hay when you had the wind."

On fourth-and-one in the first quarter, Brown decided to go for the first down with his team positioned at the Towson 36-yard line. The play he called seemed to beat the defense, except the wind had other ideas.

Quarterback Liam Coen dropped back to pass, looking for tight end Ian Jorgenson running an out pattern to the left side. Coen threw the ball, only to have it knocked down by the stiff breeze, and reach Jorgenson on a bounce.

Special teams was also a struggle, especially for Towson punter Bill Shears. Several times the wind got a hold of a Shears kick and sent it either out of bounds or directly to the turf. One such attempt traveled a mere 13 yards before the breeze got a hold of it and sent it towards the sideline.

STILL PERFECT

The Minutemen have yet to surrender a field goal through their first six games of the season, holding opponents to 0-3.

On Saturday, Towson kicker Chris DeSautels was the latest to

UNH defeat opens door for A–10 teams

BY MIKE WALSH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Let the madness begin. With No. 7 New Hampshire's loss on Saturday the quest for the conference title just got a whole lot more interesting.

Three teams, No. 6 Massachusetts, No. 13 James Madison, and No. 23 Maine, still remain unbeaten in conference play and with five weeks of the season yet to be played, it is anyone's guess as to how it will all play out.

HOW THE MIGHTY HAVE FALLEN

A-10 Football

After narrowly escaping defeat in their last two games, New Hampshire (5-1, 2-1 A-10) could not keep its bid for a perfect season afloat any longer.

No. 13 James Madison (5-1, 3-0 A-10) marched into Durham and stunned the home crowd. The score was 42-23, but in reality, it wasn't even that close. In fact, after taking the 10-7 lead early in the second quarter, the Wildcats looked completely outmatched.

Behind junior running back Eugene Holloman's three touchdown performance, the Dukes were able to build up a 42-10 lead before allowing two fourth-quarter touchdowns.

The key to the Duke's success came on the defensive side of the ball as they held the home team to a nine total rushing yards on 32 attempts. The Wildcats, on the other hand, were not nearly successful at stopping the run as they allowed 259 yards on he ground and four scores.

New Hampshire will look to rebound from their ugly performance as they head to Boston next week to take on Northeastern (2-4, 1-2 A-10).

James Madison will look to extend their four game win streak as they host William & Mary (2-4, 0-3 A-10).

NOT TO BE FORGOTTEN

No. 6 Massachusetts (5-1, 3-0 A-10) continued its winning ways as it pummeled host No. 22 Towson 35-0. The Minutemen have outscored their opponents 131 to 14 in their last three contests.

In the victory, sophomore quarterback Liam Coen completed 21 of 27 pass attempts for 303 yards and five touchdowns. Four of those touchdown passes were to senior wide out Brandon London. London finished the day with 7 receptions for 100 yards and those four trips to the end zone.

No. 23 Maine (4-2, 3-0 A-10) also improved to 3-0 in A-10 play as they knocked off visiting Villanova (2-4, 1-2 A-10) 20-7.

Next week, UMass will host Rhode Island (2-4, 0-3 A-10) and Maine will square off against Hofstra (2-4, 1-2 A-10).

MORE CONFERENCE ACTION

Coming off of its close loss to New Hampshire, No. 10 Richmond (5-1, 2-1 A-10) bounced back nicely as it took care of Rhode Island with relative ease, 31-6. The Spiders fell behind 6-0 early but responded by scoring 31 unanswered points to seal the deal.

Junior quarterback Joe Flacco's seven-yard touchdown pass was all that Delaware (3-3, 1-2 A-10) would need as it defeated Hofstra 10-6 in a defensive struggle.

The Fighting Blue Hens will take on Richmond next week.

The only other A-10 team in action over the weekend was William & Mary which picked up its second win of the season against Liberty, 14-13.

James Madison head coach Mickey Matthews led the Dukes to their 42-23 upset victory over No. 1 New Hampshire this weekend.

Koch on Ofosu and cons of turf surface

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the Massachusetts soccer team's 2-0 victory over Temple on Sunday, sophomore Prince Ofosu scored his second goal of the season. He scored his first in the season-opener against Maine, another 2-0 win for the Minutemen.

UMass Soccer

Since coming to UMass last season, Ofosu was expected to be an offensive force for the Maroon and White. Sunday, UMass coach Sam Koch was happy to see him put a ball in the net.

"I've been waiting for two years," Koch said. "It was good. He had some chances Friday that he didn't get, but he got it in today. We needed it, and he came through."

One possible reason Ofosu has scored just two goals this season has been his inability to stay onsides when he has a chance to break away for a scoring chance. UMass has gone offsides 40 times, this season (most by Ofosu) compared to 26 by opponents.

Koch believes that is not necessarily a bad thing.

"We work on it, but obviously not enough," Koch said. "He's too fast for his own good. He tries to run too early and he doesn't need to. We're working on it. We'll continue to work on it. I'm glad he's anxious. I'm glad he wants to go forward. In a funny way, getting called offsides a couple times isn't a bad thing. When you get called offsides all the time, then it's a bad thing.

"Every time it happens, it gives the ball to the other team. We don't want that. I don't want him to do it, but it's the mentality that is behind it that is not a bad thing as long as it's not very often."

Another speedy player for the Minutemen, forward Greg Cirillo, was slowed up severely on Sunday. The junior injured his hamstring in the same game against the Owls.

Early in the second half, Cirillo chased the ball down the right sideline and had his man beat. As he looked to send the ball into the box, he pulled up lame, immediately grasping the back of his left leg. He could not leave the field under his own

Bunched up A–10 creates heated race

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

No clear favorite has emerged from the Atlantic 10 women's soccer league this season. Four teams have only one conference loss, six teams have four or more victories and five teams are within three points of first place.

A-10 W. Soccer

With two weeks left in the regular season, the teams in the top tier have ample opportunity to take charge. Meanwhile, the teams from the bottom half of the league still have time to emerge as contenders.

After stumbling through the non-conference part of its schedule, Rhode Island (9-7-0, 5-1-0 Atlantic 10) is first in the league with 15 points.

The Rams successfully defended their home turf twice last week, earning a 3-1 victory over Temple (3-11-0, 0-5-0) and a 2-1 win against Saint Joseph's (5-9-0, 2-3-0).

Dayton, Charlotte, and Fordham all have 4-1 records and 12 points in the conference, only three behind Rhode Island.

The Flyers (6-4-3, 4-1-0) split their games last week, defeating Duquesne (3-7-2, 2-2-1), 1-0, on Oct 13 and falling to Saint Louis (8-3-2, 3-2-0), 2-0, two days later.

Charlotte (9-4-2, 4-1-0) defeated Richmond (1-11-2, 1-4-0) 2-1 on Oct. 14 at home in the team's only game last week.

Fordham (10-4-0, 4-1-0) bested George Washington (9-7-0, 2-4-0) on Oct. 13, 2-1. The Rams then defeated LaSalle (7-8-0, 4-2-0) by the same score on Oct. 15.

LaSalle and Massachusetts (10-4-0, 4-2-0) are also within striking distance of Rhode Island. They each have 12 points in the league.

NATIONAL RANKINGS

The No. 1 team in the nation no longer has a perfect record. Notre Dame (14-0-1) tied a match with unranked Connecticut (8-7-2) this past week. However, the Irish still retained the top spot in the Top 30 National Rankings, produced by Soccer Buzz Magazine.

North Carolina (16-1-0) kept its No. 2 ranking, while No. 8 Santa Clara (11-3-1) tumbled five spots from last week. UCLA (12-2-0) moved up one spot to No. 2.

No. 16 Boston University (12-3-2) is the highest ranked team from the Northeast Ivy League power Dartmouth (9-3-1) improved its standing, moving up eight spots to No. 20.

For the second consecutive week, the Atlantic 10 does not have a representative in the rankings.

PLAYERS OF THE WEEK

The Atlantic 10 named senior midfielder Dee Guempel of Saint Louis and sophomore forward Katie Sanchez of Fordham its Co-Players of the Week.

Guempel scored two goals in the Billikens' 2-0 shutout victory over Dayton on Oct. 15. She also scored one goal on 10 shots in the team's 4-3 loss to Xavier two days earlier. The Saint Louis native is second on the squad with 14 points.

Sanchez provided the only offense for the Rams in the team's 2-1 overtime win over LaSalle on Oct. 15. She scored her team's first goal with only 10 minutes to play in regulation and added the game-winning goal in the second overtime.

The sophomore also netted a goal on Oct. 13 in a 2-1 win at George Washington. This is her league-leading third A-10 Player of the Week award this season.

ROOKIE OF THE WEEK

The A-10 named freshman midfielder Brittany Green of Xavier its Rookie of the Week. In the Musketeer's 4-3 victory over Saint Louis on Oct. 13, Green scored two goals, including the game winner. The freshman's five goals this season is good enough for fifth on the team. Rhode Island junior forward Deb Nelson and senior midfielder Courtney Hulcer of Saint Louis both lead the league in shots per game with 3.62. However, Nelson is ranked only fifth in goals per game and Hulcher is not in the Top 10. Katie Sanchez of Fordham is first in the category with 1.77 goals per game, followed by Hulcer's teammate, Julia Bradenberg, at 1.20.

Saint Louis remains undefeated in A–10

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts sophomore goalkeeper Zack Simmons earned Atlantic 10 Men's Soccer Player of the Week and is on the TopDrawerSoccer.com Team of the Week. Over the weekend he led the Minutemen with two shutouts against Temple and Saint Joseph's. Simmons now owns the school record for the most shutouts in a season with 10. He made eight saves including a five against Temple to give him a league leading total of 72. This is Simmons second A-10 Player of the Week honor.

A-10 M. Soccer

ROOKIE OF THE WEEK

St. Bonaventure freshman midfielder Robert Maheu is the A-10 Rookie of the Week. Maheu scored the game-winning goal just 46 seconds into overtime against George Washington on Sunday. That goal provided the Bonnies (1-10-2, 1-2-2 A-10) with their first victory of the season. He also notched the assist on a game-tying goal against La Salle in the 2-2 tie. Maheu leads the Bonnies with three goals and is tied for first with seven points.

STILL UNBEATEN IN CONFERENCE PLAY

The Richmond Spiders (6-5-3, 3-0-1 A-10) played an important game on Saturday night versus the unbeaten Charlotte 49ers (8-3-3, 4-0-1 A-10). The battle of the undefeated teams played to a scoreless (0-0) tie. Richmond junior goalkeeper Eric Sciocchetti posted his fourth shutout of the season with seven saves. On the other side, freshman goalkeeper David Martin notched his fifth shutout for the year. The game was a close affair with Charlotte out-shooting Richmond by a slim margin of 13-10. The tie keeps it's unbeaten streak alive at eight games. This weekend both teams will face off against St. Bonaventure and Fordham.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

This week's stand-out athlete is UMass hockey forward Cory Quirk. He registered his first assist of the season in the team's season-opener on Friday night against Sacred Heart. Quirk added a goal and an assist in UM's second game of the season against Clarkson on Saturday. He now has a team-best three points in two games.

Carroll to receive journalism award

Jill Carroll will receive the Courage of Journalism award, Oct. 24.

BY DARYL POPPER AND CHARLES THOMPSON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

Each year the International Women's Media Foundation honors three distinguished female journalists with the Courage of Journalism award. On Oct. 24, University of Massachusetts alumna Jill Carroll will become one of the recipients in New York City.

Carroll, a freelance reporter for the Christian Science Monitor, was kidnapped and held hostage for 82 days in an undisclosed location in Baghdad. Armed attackers broke into the car Carroll was driving in, shot and killed her translator, and beat her driver before taking her hostage.

"'They're going to take me out into a field and kill me,' I thought as we bumped down rural back roads," she wrote later.

While in captivity, she performed household chores with the other women, played with the children and heard tales of the war going on outside.

Meanwhile, back at UMass, where Carroll graduated in 1999 and had been a Massachusetts Daily Collegian editor, students, faculty and friends attended rallies in support of her safe release. A giant banner hung over the Student Union read "Free Jill."

She was safely released on March 30, 2006.

During the fall semester of 2006, Carroll will research the decline of foreign bureaus due to changes within the newspaper industry at the Joan Shorenstein Center at Harvard University.

Upon Carroll's return, she wrote an 11-part series for the Christian Science Monitor, narrating her tale from her kidnapping to day of her release.

She includes details like watching Oprah on television, making videotapes that were broadcast in the United States and constantly thinking of how to survive.

In one installment of the Monitor series, Carroll learned of the willingness of Iraqi women to become suicide bombers. As she heard one woman declare her intention, Carroll wrote, "I feigned confusion while I tried to think to think what to say."

Carroll, who has an IQ of 140, according to the Monitor, often used her wits to stay alive.

The IWMF's Courage in Journalism award honors female journalists who have shown "extraordinary strength of character and integrity while reporting the news under dangerous or difficult circumstances," according to organization's Web site. The awards were announced on May 31 and will be presented at ceremonies in New York on Oct. 24 and in Los Angeles on Nov. 2.

The truth about lying on resumes

Bruce Koenig, professional resume writer and owner of Resumes Etc. in Lexington, Kentucky, says employers shouldn't count on resume writers to keep lies out of resumes.

Study shows employers are watching

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Think boosting your resume with "white lies" is harmless or untraceable? A recent study shows 92 percent of hiring managers perform extensive background checks on potential candidates.

The study, conducted by careerbuilder.com, found that while only 5 percent of workers admit to fibbing on their resumes, 57 percent of hiring managers say they have caught a lie on a candidate's application.

The ten-day study survey was conducted in June 2006 and included more than 2,200 workers and more than 1,000 hiring managers.

Many hiring managers have no tolerance for resume lies.

New study finds link between anti-depressants and aggression

BY JARED MASON
DAILY TEXAN (U. TEXAS)

AUSTIN, Texas—Prozac and other anti-depressant drugs may promote aggression when taken in small doses, according to a new University of Texas study.

Kereshmeh Taravosh-Lahn, a neurosciences graduate student, led the study at the UT Institute for Neuroscience analyzing the effects of varying doses of Fluoxetine, known in pill form as Prozac, on the behavior of old and young hamsters.

The researchers would inject a hamster with the drug, then introduce a smaller hamster of the same gender to the cage to observe their interaction, Taravosh-Lahn said. Researchers also observed a group of similar-aged hamsters given a placebo pill as a control group.

The adolescent hamsters given a low dose of Fluoxetine started fights 40 percent more often than those given a placebo, Taravosh-Lahn said. The young hamsters given a high dosage of the drug initiated 65 percent fewer attacks than those given placebos but were still more aggressive than adult hamsters in the same situation, Taravosh-Lahn said.

"[In the adult group], the aggressive behavior was practically entirely inhibited," Taravosh-Lahn said.

The results of the adolescent behavior are alarming, she said, because they reveal the kind of abnormal behavior that may arise when anti-depressant drugs are mixed with a juvenile brain.

Although the effect of Prozac on adult behavior has been widely researched, research dealing specifically with adolescents is just beginning to be investigated, Taravosh-Lahn said. Prozac has come under scrutiny in the news recently following accusations that the drug may lead to suicidal behavior in certain rare cases.

Fluoxetine works by maintaining the levels of the mood-altering chemical serotonin in the brain, which helps combat depression, said Kay Springer, spokeswoman for the National Institute for Mental Health, a government organization based in Maryland. Smaller doses of the anti-depressant may be given to young people occasionally, particularly if they are underweight, she said.

Taravosh-Lahn said she hypothesizes the anomalies observed might take place at low doses because the serotonin links with serotonin-3, a receptor in the brain that is tied to aggressive behavior. The results may be more prevalent in the young hamsters, she said, because of the ratio in a younger brain between serotonin-3 receptors and serotonin-1a receptors, which inhibit aggressive behavior. More serotonin linking with more serotonin-3 receptors, may be the cause of the heightened aggression, Taravosh-Lahn said.

Right now, nobody knows for sure what is causing this aggressive behavior and more work must be done, Taravosh-Lahn said.

"Hopefully, people will do more research, but for now [giving adolescents Prozac] may not necessarily stop," she said.

Goldman given 'Lifetime' award

BY ANNA DOLIANITIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sheldon Goldman, professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts, has received the 2006 Lifetime Achievement Award of the Law and Courts section of the American Political Science Association.

The American Political Science Association is the leading political science organization in the world, and serves over 15,000 members in over 80 countries.

At the ceremony, Goldman's former students as well as various professors from around the country spoke about the impact Goldman has had on the study of the judicial process, according to political science professor John Brigham.

"We think we would look at judges differently without his work," said Brigham.

The association called Goldman "unquestionably the premier scholar in the country on the identification, appointment, and confirmation processes for the selection of federal judges and one of the finest scholars of public law in the country."

The award was based on Goldman's research and the books that he has written, according to Brigham.

Sheldon Goldman, professor of political science at the UMass.

Goldman is the author of "Picking Federal Judges: Lower Court Selection from Roosevelt Through Reagan," "Constitutional Law: Cases and Essays" and "The Federal Courts as a Political System" and the co-author of "American Politics and Government; American Court Systems" and "Judicial Conflict and Consensus."

Goldman received his bachelor's degree in political science from New York University in 1961, and his master's degree and doctorate from Harvard in 1964 and 1965.

He has been teaching at the University as an assistant professor since 1965, was promoted to an associate professor in 1970, and became a full professor in 1974. He is also the chief undergraduate advisor for the political science department.

"I have always been fascinated by politics and when I began college as an undergraduate, my goal was to do research and teaching in political science. This meant earning the Ph.D. and teaching at the university level," said Goldman.

He currently teaches Constitutional Law, Civil Liberties and Politics, Law, and Judicial Behavior. In the past, he has taught Comparative Judicial Politics and Introduction to American Politics. Additionally, he teaches a graduate seminar on law and the political process.

'Cocaine' drink sparks controversy

BY LAUREN MCCORMACK
DAILY COLLEGIAN (PENN STATE)

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa.—The name and contents of the new, controversially named energy drink Cocaine have prompted supermarkets to ban the product from their shelves and sparked a lawsuit against its "immoral trademark."

The energy drink, which is manufactured by Las Vegas-based company Redux Beverages, declares Cocaine is 350 percent "greater than the Bull," likely referring to Red Bull, the leading energy drink. Redux Beverages also claims drinkers will experience no sugar-low crash after consumption.

Redux Beverages said on its Web Site, www.drinkcocaine.com, that the company didn't want to "beat around the bush," with a less intense name. The company goes on to explain that although it has chosen the name Cocaine, the makers in no way endorse the drug.

James Kirby, the co-founder of Cocaine, could not be reached for comment by press time Wednesday.

A Cleveland State University law class and its professor Mickey Davis filed an opposition with the U.S. Trademark Trial and Appeal Board Oct. 10 against Redux Beverage's trademark request for the name "Cocaine," which was filed in March. They "Cocaine" is 350 percent "greater than the Bull," say manufacturers.

Government doubts threats on NFL stadiums

BY LARA JAKES JORDAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—A Web site is claiming that seven NFL football stadiums will be hit with radiological dirty bombs this weekend, but the government on Wednesday expressed doubts about the threat.

The warning, posted Oct. 12, was part of an ongoing Internet conversation titled "New Attack on America Be Afraid." It mentioned NFL stadiums in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland and Cleveland, where games are scheduled for this weekend.

The Homeland Security Department alerted authorities and stadium owners in those cities, as well as the NFL, of the Web message but said the threat was being viewed "with strong skepticism." Officials at the NCAA, which oversees college athletics, said they too had been notified.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said there was no intelligence that indicated such an attack was imminent, and he said the alert was "out of an abundance of caution."

"The department strongly encourages the public to continue to go about their plans, including attending events that involve large public gatherings such as football games," Knocke said.

The FBI also expressed doubt about the threat.

"While the credibility of the threat is questionable, we have passed the information on because it has been carried in some open source reporting," said FBI spokesman Richard Kolko. He said the FBI was discussing the threat with the NFL as "part of our routine discussions this week."

The nation's alert level remains at yellow, signaling an elevated risk of an attack. The threat level for airline flights is at orange, a higher level, where it has been since a foiled plot to bomb U.S.-bound commercial jets was revealed on Aug. 10.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said stadiums around the country "are very well protected through the comprehensive security procedures we have in place, including secure facility perimeters, pat-downs and bag searches."

Officials were made aware of the Web posting on Oct. 16. The threat was timed to be carried out on Sunday, Oct 22, marking the final day in Mecca of Ramadan, the Islamic holy month.

Marijuana compound may fight Alzheimer's

NEW YORK—In rats with brain inflammation due to natural aging or in response to an artificial inflammatory stimulus, treatment with a synthetic compound akin to marijuana markedly reduced brain inflammation and slowed memory loss.

"It will be important to find a drug that reduces brain inflammation, but that does not produce the classic 'high'" that marijuana does, Dr. Gary L. Wenk from Ohio State University in Columbus told Reuters Health.

Wenk said his research is motivated by evidence that brain inflammation contributes to many age-related degenerative brain disorders, including Alzheimer's disease. "This inflammation appears to be present many, many years prior to the onset of the symptoms," he said.

In rats with brain inflammation that mimics that seen in patients with Alzheimer's disease, Wenk and his associates discovered that daily treatment with a synthetic marijuana-like drug called WIN reduced inflammation in the brain and improved memory.

On tests of memory performed during the third week of treatment, WIN-treated older rats were able to hold on to key details of a specific water maze task that they'd been taught, whereas the untreated older rats were not.

Younger WIN-treated rats also navigated the water maze faster than non-treated younger rats, but the difference wasn't as remarkable as that of the older group, perhaps because of the lack of age-related changes in the brains of the younger rats.

Wenk presented his group's research today at the Society for Neuroscience annual meeting in Atlanta.

Studies have shown that people who routinely use anti-inflammatory drugs, particularly the ones that cross the blood brain barrier, have a significantly reduced incidence of Alzheimer's disease.

Marijuana has strong anti-inflammatory effects. "This is why I believe that people who used marijuana a few decades ago are much less likely to develop any disease, such as Alzheimer's, that relies upon the slow development of brain inflammation," Wenk told Reuters Health.

"What we need now is to better understand the mechanisms underlying this effect," Wenk said. Increased efforts to find or create a drug with the anti-inflammatory but not the psychoactive properties of marijuana are also in order.

7 plead guilty in corpse plundering

By Tom Hays
Associated Press

NEW YORK—Seven funeral home directors linked to a scheme to plunder corpses and sell the body parts for transplants pleaded guilty to undisclosed charges and have agreed to cooperate with investigators, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

The unidentified directors secretly pleaded guilty in the probe of what investigators say was a plot to harvest bone and tissue and sell it to biomedical supply companies, Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said.

"It is clear that many more funeral home directors were involved in this enterprise," Hynes said at a news conference.

The seven entered their pleas in closed courtrooms and their names were withheld, but defense attorneys said that among those cooperating was the director of a funeral home that took parts from the body of "Masterpiece Theatre" host Alistair Cooke, who died in 2004.

The four original defendants in the case pleaded not guilty on Wednesday to enterprise corruption, body stealing and other charges in the new indictment. If convicted, they face up to 25 years in prison. All remain free on bail.

Prosecutors allege Michael Mastromarino, a former oral surgeon, and three other men secretly removed skin, bone and other parts from up to 1,000 bodies from funeral homes, without the permission of families. He allegedly made millions of dollars by selling the stolen tissue to biomedical companies that supply material for common procedures including dental implants and hip replacements.

Josh Handshaft holds a photograph of an X-ray showing PVC plumbing pipe inserted where bones should have been Feb. 23, 2006, in New York.

They were charged in February with counts including body stealing, unlawful dissection and forgery in a case a district attorney called "something out of a cheap horror movie."

All the defendants pleaded not guilty before being released on bail.

Mastromarino, owner of Biomedical Tissue Services of Fort Lee, N.J., allegedly made millions of dollars by selling the stolen tissue to biomedical companies that supply material for procedures including dental implants and hip replacements, prosecutors said.

At the time, prosecutors said they had unearthed evidence that death certificates and other paperwork were falsified. In Cooke's case, his age was recorded as 85 rather than 95 and the cause of death was listed as heart attack instead of lung cancer that had spread to his bones.

Other evidence includes X-rays and photos of exhumed cadavers show that where leg bones should have been, someone had inserted white plastic pipes — the kind used for home plumbing projects, available at any hardware store. The pipes were crudely reconnected to hip and ankle bones with screws before the legs were sewn back up.

School to pay state for unlicensed staffers

CANTON, Mass—A school known for its use of shock therapy to treat children with severe behavioral and mental problems agreed Friday stop referring to staff members as psychologists if they have not been licensed with the state, and to pay the state for each staff member who inappropriately used the title.

Matthew Israel, executive director of the Judge Rotenberg Education Center, acknowledged that some of the school's staff members were unaware of a 1996 change in state law requiring them to register with the State Board of Licensure.

He denied misrepresenting anyone's qualifications and noted that the 13 staff members who claimed to be psychologists had substantial training in the field. School officials said they immediately changed their titles to "clinician" after the state pointed out the mistake last month.

Israel said he thinks the investigation of his school had more to do with shock therapy.

"I believe that we and our professional staff were singled out because of a bias against aversive therapy, and not because of our mistake. Dozens of professionals employed at other schools made exactly the same honest mistake and to this day have not faced penalty," Israel said in a statement.

Officials at the State Division of Professional Licensure did not immediately return several phone calls Wednesday.

Sen. Brian A. Joyce of Milton — who has worked to ban the use of shock therapy — released a statement calling the incident "the latest ugly chapter" in a book filled with serious allegations.

"How many more times will the Judge Rotenberg misrepresent important information before the Legislature takes notice?" Joyce asked in his statement.

Michael Flammia, an attorney for the school, said the agreement makes clear that no disciplinary actions will be taken against staff members.

"It was a defensible position," he said, "but rather than defend something that clearly the board is not pleased with, we've changed the titles."

A large number of the school's students come from New York, whose state Education Department is seeking to restrict shock therapy for children it sends there. But some parents who support the practice have obtained a temporary court order last month to continue the treatments pending a court hearing.

School officials have said repeatedly that the shock therapy is about as painful as a bee sting, just enough of a jolt to prevent the severely disabled students from hurting themselves or other students. Critics say some children have been burned by the shocks.

Tattoos, piercings slowly slipping into dress code

By Madlen Read
Associated Press

NEW YORK—Colleen Harris doesn't fit the stereotype of the buttoned-up librarian. Her arms are covered with a pirate queen motif and black scrolling tattoos, which extend down the side of her body to her ankle. A black rose and the words "Dangerous Magic" adorn the back of her left hand, and the words "Anam Cara" (old Gaelic for "soul friend") letter her knuckles.

The 27-year-old — who has multiple masters degrees and a job at the University of Kentucky's research library — feels no pressure to cover up.

"It's not really possible at this point, unless I wore gloves," Harris said, adding that she thinks academia has been more accepting of her body art than the corporate world would be. "I think my qualifications should speak for themselves."

The face of the young American worker is changing, and it's increasingly decorated with ink and metal. About half of people in their 20s have either a tattoo or a body piercing other than traditional earrings, according to a study published in June in the Journal of the American Academy of Dermatology. That figure, which is higher than the national average, is growing, said Anne Laumann, the study's co-author and a dermatologist at Northwestern University.

As a result, employers are finding that dress codes may need updating. In some cases, bosses are loosening up to attract young talent. In others, managers are adding new rules to keep body art covered up.

"In the past, there were very general dress codes. Now, I see dress codes that are five pages long," said David Barron, an attorney with Epstein Becker Green Wickliff & Hall PC. "Employers see a need to be very, very specific, and draw lines very clearly."

At the medication flavoring company Flavorx — where the average employee is about 28 years old — chief financial officer Woodie Ness recently told human resources to add a body art section to the dress code, after an employee showed up to work with an eyebrow piercing.

A sizable portion of his 40 employees have body art, Ness said. He knows it because he's seen them show it off to each other in the office.

"Do whatever you want to your body, but I don't want to be subjected to it in the workplace," Ness said. He added that body art can be a distraction, and especially important to hide when investors visit the office.

Usually, it's a simple matter of discussion and compromise. Most piercings are on the face, according to the recent study, but they can be removed. Only about 15 percent of people with tattoos have them on their face, neck or hands, the study showed, so the rest can be covered by clothing.

Michael Sacks, 24, who works at the public relations firm Shead Hodges Group in Mid-town, Va., has three tattoos on his stomach, the initials of a friend who died; on his back, the word "Persistence"; and on his ankle, his fraternity letters. Phi Gamma Delta. These can be seen when he's wearing his work clothes, and he says that's intentional.

"It's a visibility issue. No one cares what you have on your body as long as you don't have to look at it," Sacks said. "I want to be perceived as a professional."

Librarian Colleen Harris shows off a small portion of her body art Oct. 13, 2006, outside the William T. Young Library where she works, in Lexington, Kentucky.

It all depends on the industry. Harris, the librarian, worked in corporate technology sales before her library science degrees and tattoos. Her only visible body art was a nose stud, but she voluntarily removed it while at work.

"It's a matter of catering to your clientele, no matter where you are," she said.

For some companies, allowing body art can be a boon — it attracts young workers that may not feel welcome in more conservative environments, said Paul Forster, CEO of the job search Web site Indeed.com (which shows that postings for tattoo artist have surged in the past year). Forster allows body art in the office, and about a quarter of his 25 employees have it.

"Most work is done via e-mail, instant message, over the phone. We don't have those face-to-face issues," Forster said.

Of course, at workplaces like design firms, salons, and retailers targeting the young demographic, hiring employees with body art is par for the course. Joe Duffy — CEO of the design firm Duffy & Partners, which has developed branding for companies including Coca-Cola, BMW and Starbucks — said he hired a young woman about a year ago who used her tattoos as part of her application portfolio.

But in traditionally suit-and-tie service industries, bosses want body art hidden, according to Talar Herculian, an employment attorney with Fisher & Phillips LLP in Irvine, Calif. — and that means going about restricting it legally. More employers err on the side of being too vague about their dress code rather than too strict, she said, and that's when problems emerge.

Forty-three percent of hiring managers say they would automatically dismiss a candidate who fibbed on their resume. Others say it depends on the candidate and situation.

"Catching a lie on a resume raises a red flag about a candidate's overall ethics," said Rosemary Haefner, vice president of human resources for CareerBuilder.com. "Even the smallest inconsistency or embellishment is likely to get noticed and could cost you the job."

Stretched dates to cover up employment gaps is the most commonly-caught resume lie, with nearly one in five hiring managers saying they have found this on a candidate's application.

Other top resume lies include: past employers (18 percent), academic degrees and institutions (16 percent), technical skills and certifications (15 percent), and accomplishments (8 percent).

Rosie Barry, director of the University of Minnesota's Employee Career Enrichment Program, which specializes in helping students build strong resumes, says lying on your resume may reap immediate rewards, but could come back to haunt applicants in the end.

"I've seen situations where a person has been working at the same job for months and were fired after their employer explored their resume even deeper and found lies," said Barry.

Barry said employers have been aided in performing background checks by using Google.com.

"It's getting increasingly easier for employers to check resumes," said Barry.

On personal Web sites such as Facebook, MySpace and Friendster, users can post written profiles, pictures and other information about themselves. These niche sites can offer a great venue for connecting people on-line with shared interests, backgrounds and experience, but can also be used as a way for employers to get a quick glimpse of a potential candidate.

Laura Morsch, career advisor for CBCampus.com, Career Builder's college division, says applicants should look over any personal Web site that may have incriminating evidence before handing in your resume.

"It'd be smart to take down anything from your Myspace page that could be held against you," said Morsch. "I'd definitely advise applicants to take down any photos that show drug use or underage drinking, as well as any quotes that can make you appear immature."

Goldman's commentary on judicial nominees, both to the Supreme Court and to lower federal courts, have often been seen in media outlets including the Wall Street Journal, The New York Times, The Washington Post, Time, Newsweek and National Public Radio, according to the UMass News Office.

Goldman is also the recipient of other outstanding teaching recognitions. In 2004, he delivered a Distinguished Faculty Lecture, and was awarded the Chancellor's Medal. He has also been voted Best Professor by UMass students.

Junior Jamie Zaitchik-Meldon, who has been in Goldman's Civil Liberties and Politics, Law, and Judicial Behavior classes, said, "Through his vast knowledge and sense of humor, he keeps a full class paying full attention daily."

"He's a caring teacher — he really wants his students to do well and his classes are the best I've taken at UMass," said junior Kathryn Bergquist. "He's my favorite teacher and really inspired interest in his subjects."

"Professor Sheldon Goldman embodies the very highest level of faculty achievement: a creative and rigorous researcher whose work makes an impact, as well as an outstanding teacher," said John Hird, chairman of the political science department at UMass.

"In addition to his many other awards, this signals that Sheldon Goldman is on a very short list of the very finest public law scholars of all time."

"The study of politics is the study of the process by which public policy is made. Who gets what, when, how and why. This is something that all citizens should know as public policy affects their very lives — and in some situations, such as going to war and making the country more vulnerable to terror — can ultimately cost them their lives," said Goldman.

'Cocaine' drink seen as legal alternative

are representing two clients, Americans for Drug Free Youth and Progressive Intellectual Property Law Association.

The lawsuit is based on the Lanham Act, which protects against immoral trademarks, Davis said.

"My students would like to stop the registration [of Cocaine as a trademark] and see if the law applies," he said. "If anything is an immoral scandal, it has to be this stuff."

Redux Beverages has 40 days to respond, and has yet to file an answer or contact Davis, his students or the lawyers involved in the case, Davis said. Request for the Cocaine trademark was preliminarily approved by U.S. Patent and Trademark Office after it was filed in March.

Some businesses in State College are skeptical of the beverage, especially those that would have the opportunity to sell and promote the drink.

"We had a lot of options we could go with and had no reason to promote a product with that kind of connotation," Bob Ferraro, head of cold drinks at Sheetz, said.

Tony Sapia, owner of Tony's Big Easy Bar and Bistro, felt that it had a "weird name" and said he would not carry the product because of its name and competition with Red Bull. "It's the name of a narcotic and is bad for business," Sapia said.

Experts in the food science field were skeptical of Cocaine's contents.

Manfred Kroger, former Pennsylvania State University professor of food science, said drinking the "super-charged soft drink" is like downing three cups of coffee.

"My analysis is that it's a hyped-up product envious of Red Bull, bending over backwards to capture a market," Kroger said. He said calling it an energy drink is fallacious.

"The only energy in this drink comes from two teaspoons of sugar," according to the supplement facts from the official Web site. "The caffeine and energy are mislabeled on the site," he said.

Currently, the drink is only available in New York and Florida, though samples are offered on its Web site and Myspace.com.

The drink's creators said that the company wanted an intense name.

Officials skeptical about NFL stadiums threat

countless other fatalities will later occur as result from radioactive fallout," according to a copy of the posting that was obtained by The Associated Press.

The bombs, according to the posting, would be delivered to the stadiums in trucks. All but one of the stadiums — Atlanta — are open-air arenas, the posting noted, adding: "Due to the open air, the radiological fallout will destroy those not killed in the initial explosion."

Explosions would be nearly simultaneous, the posting said, with the cities specifically chosen in different time zones.

The posting said that al-Qaida would automatically be blamed for the attacks and predicted, "Later, through al-Jazeera, Osama bin Laden will issue a video message claiming responsibility for what he dubbed 'America's Hiroshima.'"

Tony Wyllie, the vice president of communications for the Houston Texans, said the team had been in contact with the NFL regarding what security precautions should be taken for Sunday's game against the Jacksonville Jaguars.

In Indianapolis, where the Colts were preparing for a home game this weekend, head coach Tony Dungy said, "I've been waiting for this to happen for a couple of years now and you try and handle the security and put it out of your mind."

"We'll let the security people do their job, and we'll do our job," Dungy said. "We've got a lot of confidence in NFL security and our own security here."

Amy Trask, CEO of the Oakland Raiders, said, "We work closely with a number of governmental agencies, including the FBI, and with the NFL on an ongoing basis."

Stacey Osburn, associate director of public relations for the NCAA, said the organization passed the warning to members "so that they may take the appropriate precautions."

The postings were made on a Web site dubbing itself "The Friend Society," which links to various online conversations and off-color cartoons.

Authorities traced the site's Internet provider back to Voxel Dot Net Inc., which has support and engineering staff based in Troy, N.Y. A man who answered the phone at Voxel, who declined to give his name, said he was unaware of the posted threat on the Web site and refused further comment.

The author of the threats, posted at 9:31 p.m. EDT on Oct. 12, identified himself online as "jayness."

"In the aftermath civil wars will erupt across the world, both in the Middle East and within the United States," jayness wrote. "Global economies will screech to a halt. General chaos will rule."

Fellow online posters sounded skeptical about the claims.

"This isn't something you should joke about," a poster identified as "Kim Possible" wrote in response almost two hours later.

Not it. Elementary school bans tag

ATTLEBORO, Mass. — Tag, you're out. Officials at an elementary school south of Boston have banned kids from playing tag, touch football and any other unsupervised chase game during recess for fear they'll get hurt and hold the school liable.

Recess is "a time when accidents can happen," said Willett Elementary School Principal Gaylene Heppe, who approved the ban.

While there is no districtwide ban on contact sports during recess, local rules have been cropping up. Several school administrators around Attleboro, a city of about 45,000 residents, took aim at dodgeball a few years ago, saying it was exclusionary and dangerous.

Elementary schools in Cheyenne, Wyo., and Spokane, Wash., also recently banned tag during recess. A suburban Charleston, S.C., school outlawed all unsupervised contact sports.

"I think that it's unfortunate that kids' lives are micromanaged and there are social skills they'll never develop on their own," said Debbie Laferniere, who has two children at Willett, about 40 miles south of Boston. "Playing tag is just part of being a kid."

Another Willett parent, Celeste D'Elia, said her son feels safer because of the rule. "I've witnessed enough near collisions," she said.

Failures of foreign policy

Michael Shulman

These past few weeks, many new stories have not been about Iraq, but another country in President Bush's axis of evil, North Korea, long time communist dictatorship, has finally gone too far, and this president has had enough.

Last Saturday, the United Nations voted to impose weapons and financial sanctions on North Korea because of its claimed nuclear test. Resolution 1718 demands that North Korea eliminate all its nuclear weapons, weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles. The resolution allows nations to inspect cargo moving in and out of North Korea to check for non-conventional weapons, but is not backed by the threat of force.

It also calls for Pyongyang to return "without precondition" to stalled six-nation talks on its nuclear program. This comes after North Korea said it completed its first test of a nuclear weapon, but the success of that test has been called into question.

Nevertheless, failed policy specifically regarding North Korea, as well as botched foreign policy around the globe, has been the direct cause for the weapons build-up. Now this country is the largest threat to the United States.

We could always point out that North Korea has a crazy dictator and that there are still thousands of troops patrolling the demilitarized zone since the Korean War in the 1950s.

However, instead of trying to make them a nation we can have open relations with, instead of trying to curb their nuclear ambitions, our president called them a rouge nation and decided not to deal with them unilaterally.

Name-calling and economic sanctions have insulted the North Koreans and created a poor nation that feels it is under constant scrutiny from the United States and United Nations. North Korea is one of a handful of countries the United States has so tactlessly ignored.

We have allowed the dictatorial rule of Kim Jong-Il to get out of control, and now we do not possess the diplomatic lines of communication necessary for intervention. After World War II, we allowed the Soviet Union to control the north of Korea and establish a separate communist government, which eventually led to the Korean War in the early 1950s.

We have the power to broker a deal regarding North Korea and its nuclear projects.

This war created the demilitarized zone and has kept the United States involved in the conflict. With almost 60 years of having troops and other officials so close to North Korea, we have failed at starting a dialogue with a country that now is a global threat. We became so preoccupied we allowed this country to become a breeding ground for nuclear weapons and human negligence.

For some reason, we pressured many of our foreign policy interests without regard for concern from any other nations. Our great coalition force the president spoke about at great lengths has no membership from many key European nations. However, in the case of North Korea, the United States has refused to negotiate without support and cooperation from other nations and the United Nations.

As the strongest country in the world, with the most economic and militaristic influence, we have the power to broker a deal regarding North Korea and its nuclear projects. We can offer them food, medicine, infrastructure assistance and legitimacy in the world as a major player in foreign policy.

Instead of all this, we have taken a hard-nosed attitude. This is another example of failed foreign policy by the Bush administration. We have not been able to figure out when we need to act alone, or when we need cooperation of many nations.

Our inability to create comprehensive and effective policy regarding North Korea has led to a troublesome situation that has the makings of another Cold War. Most recently, other Asian nations have stated to increase their weapons projects as a defense against possible North Korean aggression. This continuous cycle of nuclear build-up is dangerous for all nations, and must be controlled and stopped before it gets any more out of hand.

President Bush, Secretary Rice and all the other government officials in Washington need to wake up. There are dangers in the world that are not located in the Middle East. North Korea is a ticking time bomb waiting for a reason to explode.

Our nation has had success when it operated as a negotiator of peace. We must forge an agreement with North Korea for the safety and security of all people, and work with them, just as we worked with the former Soviet Union and other communist countries to assist their people and support the population with food and basic health care.

Nuclear ambitions are killing the population of North Korea, and we must use our diplomatic strength to work with the leaders of North Korea. The weapons of mass destruction do exist, but they are on the Korean Peninsula and not hiding in the desert.

Unwilling to hide my differences

Chris Reardon

Back in August, there was an incident on an American Airlines flight from Paris to New York. Stephan Varnier placed his head on his boyfriend George Tsikhiseli's shoulder to nap, and the two were asked to stop by a flight attendant.

With support from nearby passengers who agreed that the men had done nothing inappropriate, Varnier and Tsikhiseli asked who had made the complaint, and requested to speak with a representative of the airline at John F. Kennedy International Airport. Both requests were denied, and the men were told to stop arguing or the flight would be diverted by multiple officers onboard the plane.

Ever since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, airplane security has been tight and tensions in the sky have been high. Just 12 days before the incident on Flight 45, police in England managed to prevent a terrorist plot to blow up as many as 10 U.S.-bound airliners. It is understandable that the crew of Flight 45 would be somewhat anxious for the unthinkable to happen. Two men showing affection for each other, however, is not terrorist activity, and it is certainly not cause for any flight to be diverted.

This seems more like an instance in which the airline, with newfound muscle due to the previous terrorist threats, was using that power to threaten any hint of societal difference aboard its airplane.

Two men showing affection for each other, however, is not terrorist activity, and it is certainly not cause for any flight to be diverted.

Over the past decade, homosexuality has become a part of mainstream society. Yet there is a difference between toleration and acceptance. Homosexual love is tolerated because people are beginning to realize that nothing can be done to change who people really are.

Still, we are shown every day that people are not totally comfortable with gay love. Gay bashings may have decreased, and incidents like that on Flight 45 may be somewhat rare, but society still is not ready to fully accept that gay love is not going away, no matter how much we try to hide it.

Public displays of affection are generally looked down upon. I'll agree that seeing a couple — gay or straight — lock tongues and feel each other up in public is inappropriate, and it makes me cringe.

Yet even the simplest show of love between gay people can bring with it discomfort and even disgust. I've seen the dirty looks and heard the whispers from my peers while simply holding my lover's hand or putting an arm around his shoulder. I've seen parents cover their children's eyes in the presence of gay affection.

These kinds of reactions are demoralizing, leading to the assumption that gay love needs to have a negative stigma behind it. What gay people do in their bedrooms is fine, but to show affection in public is to embrace a difference, and so invite scorn from society.

Yale law professor Kenji Yoshino told CourtTV.com, "The new generation of discrimination targets not entire groups but the subset of the group that refuses to 'cover,' that is, to assimilate to mainstream norms. So — gays are told not to 'flaunt' their homosexuality."

To flaunt our sexuality is to not be afraid to declare it in public. Though straight couples who hold hands are not thought to be flaunting their straightness, the same cannot be said for homosexual couples of their gayness.

In order to acclimate the world to gays and gay culture, we must not hide our emotions for one another. I commonly hear people asking why gay people have pride parades, especially since there are no straight pride events. The answer is that straight love already has all the support it needs to progress in society. If gay people have no pride; if we continue to "cover" as Yoshino puts it, then we are doomed to second class citizenship forever.

We also need some help from our straight "allies" that claim to support us but still haven't explained homosexual love to their children. Of course kids don't need to know how gay sex works any more than they need to see straight porn. What they need to learn — to be taught — is that there are all different kinds of love.

We are in a position to raise a generation of accepting humans, but if we continue to hide that which is different from society, there will always be discrimination and the need for minorities to "cover."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

TIMES THEY A-CHANGE

Like the panel members in the public program for the Feinberg series, which was held at UMass a few weeks ago, I was at "UMass in the '60s" as an undergraduate English major.

While the panelists focused primarily on the political tenor of the times, my mind drifted to the chaos of my personal experience, a mirror of the revolution in consciousness that accompanied those political events and changed my world and ours.

When I arrived, freshman girls had a curfew, and males were not allowed on residential floors. By the time I graduated, just as the campus was shut down by student protests, there were no more rules.

During freshman year, three of us girls from the eighth floor of Coolidge hung out together: Candy, Margaret and myself. I had a boyfriend, Harry, who was a studious physics major.

By my junior year, Candy had disappeared and Margaret was tripping most of the time — I remember her talking about the hobbits in "Lord of the Rings" with a far-away look in her eyes.

Harry had changed with the times: now a heavy LSD user, he became a political radical. Later that year, he was voted campus freak. He persuaded me to smoke grass, which must have been laced with something. He also stuck a poster in my hand and told me to go to Whitmore and join the protest. I did — for about five minutes. When he ranted about being under surveillance by the FBI and CIA, I thought he was nuts. (Of course, it turns out that he was correct.)

I got a new roommate, Brenda. Unfortunately, she was bulimic before the condition officially existed. One evening she tried to kill herself in our room by swallowing a bottle of pills; I called 9-1-1. She had met Harry, and I found out later they had actually married and were living together in his room in Pierpont.

I remember one weekend when a student from Kennedy committed suicide by jumping off the 19th floor. Later in the day, I spoke to a few friends who spontaneously became vegetarian. Soon after, my new boyfriend, Kim, decided to become a conscientious objector and dropped out of school.

Still committed to being a student, I ended up alone in my now single room, studying "Paradise Lost." I got the best grade in the class, but began to wonder what a middle-class Jewish girl struggling with her social life, sexual mores and a drug culture with no formal religious background, was doing studying John Milton. I began to think the goal of the English Department was to teach me how to think like a Christian man.

I found some relief at the School of Education. The focus was on affective education, the education of the emotions, totally missing from most curriculums and from our culture in general. I signed up for "The Education of the Self." Our assignment was to keep a journal of our inner experience; classroom work included interactive exercises where we did things like stare into each others' eyes. One of my signature memories was of being carried around a field, held aloft by six of my classmates. I felt open, light and free. One of my bearers told me how beautiful my surrender was. It was a revolutionary moment, an emotional/spiritual awakening.

I also listened to a lot of music. While my nervous system couldn't handle political demonstrations, I was deeply moved by Joni Mitchell's song "Woodstock," with its image of bombers turning into butterflies. I had a vision of a world without the sado-macho culture.

My story goes downhill from here. My supposedly future husband tried to rape me. Feeling unsafe in Amherst, and emotionally fragile, I dropped out of school in the spring of 1970. Just before I left I was informed I had accumulated 120 credits at the end of my previous semester and I was, in fact, a graduate.

In normal times, a liberal arts education would give a student new perspectives upon which to build a world view and a life. In my case, in the late '60s, my education helped to dismantle the values with which I arrived, and replaced them with a few moments of self-awareness and a dream for a better world.

THE UMASS BIG HOUSE

Domenic Poli's piece comparing prisons to academic institutions is written with ignorance and absurdity. The author is not entirely clear whether or not he despises life at the University of Massachusetts or if he is outraged by the apparently luxurious treatment in the U.S. prison system.

I get the feeling that the thrust of our author's beef is against UMass. Mr. Poli speciously ignores one fundamental factor in his tirade against public higher education: choice. No one has forced you to attend one of the finest public universities in country; you have chosen to attend UMass among a list of many other potential schools. Criminals may (or may not) choose to commit a crime and face the consequences of imprisonment but, once imprisoned, have no right to choose.

No choice when to eat, where to eat, what to eat, where to live, with whom to live, when to read, when they can come or go, what to learn, what classes to take, with what teacher, at what time, when to see family or friends, when to party, what to do with their future, and they have no choice whether or not to face a whole host of exploitation, violence and mistreatment.

The author insults the faculty, staff, administration, and the ideology of the University by expressing such ignorant claims. Domenic, if prison and UMass are comparable, why not pack your bags, grab your bedroll and head for the penitentiary? Kind Regards, a former UMass Inmate: Class of 2005.

SALVATION IN THE POLICE LOG

I am a 2004 UMass graduate — now doing the whole daily grind 9-5 thing that I absolutely can't stand. My days sitting in a cubicle are miserable, and in the past there was nothing I enjoyed more to brighten up my day for a good laugh than to read the good 'ole UMass Police Logs that you used to post on the Web site.

I have only seen one this year ... and it's looking grim about any more in the near future. Could you please post the police logs on a weekly basis? Do it for me, it would make my day. Thanks.

WHAT WOULD JESUS SAY?

Ben Duffy proudly claims in his article "Church and state: a two-way street" that he won't vote for a politician who supports the decision of Massachusetts state legislature to force Catholic Charities adoption services to allow gay couples to adopt.

Duffy sees this lawful reaction as an infringement on his religious freedoms presented in the constitution as well as a violation of church and state. According to his logic, the state should never interfere with the Catholic Church, but as Duffy obviously needs to be reminded, if this were the case, hundreds of sexually violated people, children and adults, would have been silenced by what he calls "respect for the First Amendment of our Constitution."

Thankfully, however, our justice system handles issues of sex offenses. Indeed, if the Catholic Church handled sex offenders, we would see priests transferred to another parish instead of addressing their emotionally scarring offenses with jail time. I saw this passivity occur at my high school when a Norbertine priest caught sexually harassing a student was moved to another rectory.

To simplify, the Catholic Church might not have to worry about "the stubbornness of the legislature" had it not established itself with a record of corrupt and prevailing pedophilia. The state, fortunately, also handles issues of adoption services as well as issues of blatant discrimination. To quote a book that I've been reading, "Do not judge, lest you too be judged. For in the same way you judge others, you will be judged and with the measure you use, it will be measured to you" (Matthew 7:1-2).

To educate Duffy, "the welfare of our children" translates to giving them to a loving family, whether heterosexual or homosexual partners. Despite this, as well as Jesus' teachings of love, equality, and tolerance, Duffy claims, "As a Catholic, I cannot fully exercise and articulate my beliefs because they may be offensive to homosexuals."

As a Catholic, Ben Duffy, I am offended. As a homosexual, I'm laughing: "homosexuals have been granted first class citizenship, and Catholics have been granted second class citizenship." I laugh at the absurdity in victimizing such an obviously powerful American majority, juxtaposed with such an obviously delicate civil rights issue.

Last I checked, people weren't using the word "Catholic" synonymously with stupid, nor have I seen many American hate crimes against the Catholic religion in recent years. I wholeheartedly disagree that gay rights and religious freedoms are at odds.

What did Jesus say about homosexuality? Nothing. But I'm sure he'd encourage Duffy to actually read the Gospel before making such uninformed comments on behalf of Catholicism in his next article.

Damone to play homecoming

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Saturday's Homecoming concert is not just an activity for students and alumni to celebrate the football team returning home to play against the University of Rhode Island. In fact, it's also a homecoming of sorts for the band Damone, who are performing at the concert. Music fans that come often to shows in eastern Massachusetts might recognize the band from clubs all over Boston and Cambridge during the past few years.

"It's really awesome to be from Boston. Boston has a huge music scene today. Everyone there is a really great musician," said guitarist and singer Noelle Leblanc in an interview with the Daily Collegian.

They're not just any Boston band, they are one of the more unique bands in the scene today, with their '80s metal sound long after it left top 40 radio and female singer.

"At first it was tough to fit in, but as time went on everyone started to treat me like the little sister of the group, which is great," Leblanc said.

Don't let the fact they are not headlining the concert fool you. Damone has had some major success as of late. Recently the band had their song "Now is the Time" appear on the TV show Veronica Mars. Their latest album, "Out Here All Night," was their second album to be released by a major label (Island Records).

Their first album, "From the Attic," was released by RCA records, but after the release, the band was basically ignored by the label and left to fend for themselves. When money ran out to support the band, the band asked to be dropped and RCA cooperated.

However, Damone did not fear signing with Island Records for their next album.

"We were ready, we didn't care that they were a major label. We just wanted a label to push us and Island was willing to do just that," Leblanc said.

After leaving RCA, the band went through a serious transition. Guitarist and songwriter Dave Pino quit the band, and it struggled for a couple of years until Leblanc started writing some of her own songs and sharing them with the band.

Damone's 80's metal sound and woman lead singer are just two of many reasons why they are not the average Boston band.

"Dave Pino wrote some solid songs, but once I warmed up to the idea of writing songs, it wasn't so hard. The rest of the band chimed in to help," Leblanc said.

Damone's latest album 'Out Here All Night' features songs written by guitarist and vocalist Noelle Leblanc. Bassist Vasquez also wrote some of the lyrics on the album.

Pino was replaced with guitarist Mike Wood, who had previously been in a band with drummer Justin Hengst before Damone started. The band's lineup was complete again, and Leblanc and Vasquez were now in charge of the songwriting duties for the band.

Songwriting wasn't the only conflict between albums for the band. A certain amount of time ago, while the band was recording "Out Here All Night," Vasquez suffered a serious injury.

"One day Vasquez and I went to the gym and he fell and hit his head in the right spot, resulting in him being in a coma for a couple days due to a brain aneurism," Leblanc said. "We were expecting much worse but he's fine now. He just stutters once and a while; we tease him about that," Leblanc joked.

With Vasquez fully recovered, the band plans to expand their tour plans. After their stint with the All American Rejects is over, they plan to return Japan for a brief tour with Andrew Wk. This will be the band's second time playing in Japan.

"Japan was the best touring experience we've ever had," Leblanc said.

Following the brief tour of Japan, Damone has no intention of slowing down. The band will hit the road again to play some concerts with Sugarcult and Pink Spiders.

Timberlake starts own clothing line

Pop star Justin Timberlake isn't your typical fashion designer. So the runway debut of his William Rast clothing line wasn't a typical fashion show.

Rather than show the collection at the official Los Angeles Fashion Week site, Culver City's Smash box Studios, Timberlake took over one of Hollywood's hottest nightspots on Tuesday night.

A runway and scores of bleacher seats were added to a section of Social Hollywood on Sunset Boulevard. Another part of the massive club was reserved for the exclusive after-party, including a performance by Timberlake, the 25-year old Grammy-winner whose second solo CD, "FutureSex/LoveSounds," was released in September.

The impressive guest list included Wilmer Valderrama, Eve and Timberlake's girl friend, Cameron Diaz, who gave interviews and posed for pictures before taking their front-row seats. Other A-list attendees included Paris and Nicky Hilton, Maroon 5's Adam Levine and Patrick Dempsey, aka Dr. McDreamy from TV's "Grey's Anatomy."

When the show got started, David Bowie's "Rebel Rebel" blared as models with their hair styled into pompadours and makeshift mohawks previewed the spring 2007 collection dubbed "Street Sexy." Timberlake started William Rast less than a year ago with his childhood friend Trace Ayala. They named the brand after their grandfathers.

On the runway, there were skinny jeans for men and women, topped with tanks or muscle shirts. There were also country-inspired checkered shirts for men decorated with ruffles or leather details. Some were shown with ascots.

Women's styles included cropped cardigans, shrunken sweater dresses and puffy-sleeved blouses with bows at the neck.

Later, dressier attire had a soundtrack of Nine Inch Nails and N.E.R.D. (Timberlake is said to have spent months picking the show's playlist.) Men wore plaid blazers with attached leather vests over slim-fitting slacks. Accessories were key as each outfit was adorned with oversized belt buckles or chunky pendants. One was a skull, another looked like a grenade.

Party dresses for women were funky and flirty. One ice-blue shift was dangerously low cut, with strands of pearls serving as safety straps. Another featured a shredded scoop neck bedazzled with tiny rhinestones. A polka-dotted, 1950s-style dress had a full skirt, puffy sleeves and a black ribbon belt.

Then, suddenly, the fashion show became a dance-off. Six women stylishly street smart in jeans, suspenders, short skirts and torn tank tops turned the runway into a disco, gyrating to a racy Prince tune.

Then the guys took their turn, and they stole the show. To Jay-Z's "99 Problems," four men in jeans, T-shirts and plaid sweater vests demonstrated why break dancing is making a comeback. They were pop-locking and head-spinning like it was 1984. They somersaulted, flipped and struck gravity-defying poses, proving Timberlake's new duds are disco-ready.

Timberlake showcased his fashion line in a Hollywood club show instead of taking part in Fashion Week.

Don't forget to call her or, else

Jasmine Monteiro

Making an effort to call someone should be one of the easiest things about a relationship. Yet, somehow it's one of the biggest issues. I never understood why picking up a phone and calling someone could be so difficult. And as bias as I may sound, I have never heard a guy frustrated about a girl not calling him. Maybe they don't care, or are too proud to say this. So until one of you brave individuals comes out and admits it, I'll have to go with what I know.

One thing that many guys fail to realize is that girls are really not that hard to please. Yet, they claim that we're confusing and difficult. So I'll put it simply. You say you will call, we expect you to, so when you do, we are highly satisfied. All guys need to do is put in the time to ask how our day was or say goodnight. It makes a significant difference.

So there's a reason we get upset when you don't, and it's not confusing at all. We feel as if we put in a lot of effort to cater to your schedule, which you may not recognize. You have to work late? No problem, call me after. You're going to play ball with your friends? That's fine; call me when you're done. You have to put your daughter to bed? That's alright; just call me tomorrow. Okay, maybe I'm getting a little carried away, but you get the idea. It has to be an equal trade. We know that you have other things going on in your life, but guess what? So do we. And as much as we look forward to talking to you, the more you make us wait, the more we feel as if we're wasting our time.

My favorite part of not getting a phone call is the excuses guys give. Of course, there are some situations that we take into consideration; emergencies mostly. However, 99% of the time, there is no emergency, and therefore, no excuse.

A good example of a popular (yet invalid) excuse would be "I was busy." That's great, I know your favorite television show was on or you somehow got sucked into playing video games, but would it kill you to just tell us that?

Another good one: "I forgot, why didn't you just call me?" This is frustrating for two reasons. First of all, thanks for not thinking about it, your negligent behavior is truly refreshing. Second of all, don't make it seem like it's our fault we didn't call, because we remembered, and you didn't. It makes it seem as if you're trying to justify it. And that's just annoying.

My absolute all time favorite excuse: "I fell asleep." This happens to be the most popular of all because guys believe it's valid. They think that because they can't control their sleep there's nothing they can do about it, and they're off the hook. This is overwhelmingly disappointing, not to mention concerning. We try to be reasonable because sometimes we feel bad. We don't want to get angry with you for not calling if there really was an emergency. If you know you're a heavy sleeper, and start snoring the instant your face hits the pillow, take that into consideration. Think about making that call before you lay down in bed. We may be a little disappointed that we can't talk long, but we'll appreciate it all the same.

It's as simple as this, if we're expecting you to call but you can't talk at that moment, let us know. I can guarantee that any girl would be happy just to know you're thinking about her. This is a lot better than the reprimand you'll get when you decide to conveniently call three hours later, or not at all. Especially for long distance relationships or situations where you don't see each other often, every bit helps. You're doing yourself, and your relationship, a favor when you put in a little work.

So what are you waiting for? Call her already.

Colbert celebrates one year

By Jake Coyle
Associated Press

"The Colbert Report" celebrated its one-year anniversary Tuesday by offering the show's devoted audience the "Colbert Nation" a piece of its leader.

Colbert announced that he will auction the portrait that hangs above the fireplace on the set of his Comedy Central show. The painting depicts Colbert standing in front of the very same portrait of himself.

The portrait will be auctioned on eBay until Oct. 30, with proceeds to benefit Save the Children.

"I've already saved the world. How hard could saving the children be?" Colbert said in a statement.

The effect of the painting is that of a hall of mirrors not unlike the strange reflections of Colbert's comedy, which bounces back and forth between reality and truthiness. A spinoff of "The Daily Show," "The Colbert Report" has built a following of its own since debuting last year, when it famously coined "truthiness" as truth that comes from the gut, not books.

The "Colbert Report," a parody of combative, conservative talk shows, also recently wrapped up its "Green Screen Challenge," in which viewers were urged to supply new video background to footage of Colbert fighting with a lightsaber.

A video by a viewer identified as Bernie R. trumped a late entry from as Colbert introduced George L. It turned out to be the work of "Star Wars" director George Lucas, who appeared on the program last week.

McMurphy's features Guitar Dudes

By Owen Boss
Collegian Correspondent

Wednesday night has never been the biggest night of the week for uptown Amherst, but thanks to a couple of "Guitar Dudes," it is rapidly becoming one the most popular nights to go out. The streets of downtown Amherst had always been relatively dormant on Wednesdays, and at a first glance the bars still remain empty, but if you walk down "club sidewalk" on a Wednesday, the only bar with a line out the door is McMurphy's Uptown Tavern on North Pleasant St.

Every Wednesday night at McMurphy's, Keith Kruser and Gerry LaFluer play their guitars to a packed house. While other bars lie for the most part empty, McMurphy's is packed arm to arm in the small confides of the tavern, students spill beer and sing along with every classic song that comes out of the dueling guitars. The anxious students who make up the line outside extend almost all the way to Antonio's, while inside the sounds of such classics as "Sweet Caroline" and "Sweet Home Alabama" pour into the street.

Brent Mauran, a junior management major at the University of Massachusetts, quickly became a fan of the "Guitar Dudes" three weeks ago when he saw the two play for the first time. He has been coming back every Wednesday ever since.

"Wednesday night is the new Saturday," said Mauran.

"[The Guitar Dudes] are more popular [than other acts that play in the Amherst area] because they are willing to play songs that the crowd wants to hear, they aren't worried about selling CDs or pushing their own music, they're just there to have a good time, and the crowd loves it," he said.

Happily taking requests and getting most of their song ideas from the screaming crowd, the two guitarists play songs stretching from Journey to The Rolling Stones; and, unlike other live entertainment in the Amherst area, they have no problem playing primarily covers for the audience.

Although they have a seemingly unlimited arsenal of songs in their repertoire, they both played in original bands before and have written original music.

Kruser, an UMass alumnus, is no stranger to playing in the Amherst area. He and LaFluer have played in the Amherst area for years, including at The Pub and Michael's Billiards.

LaFluer graduated from Westfield State University and has been playing guitar with Kruser for 15 years. Their experience playing together has created chemistry between the two, and it is evident after watching them play that they thrive off of each other.

The two have become local legends around Amherst because they not only know what songs are popular today, but also what songs really get a bar going at 1 a.m.

Set up with guitar amps and microphones against the main window right near the front door, the two are left very little room between themselves and the rowdy crowd. On a good night, by 12:30, the bar is so packed that the mob envelopes them, and by the end of the night the duo are high fiving and getting involved with every other person in the bar. Besides the infrequent break, the two play non-stop from about 9 to last call.

Both local guys, Kruser and LaFleur could easily pass for UMass students. Wearing tee shirts and jeans, the two drink and interact with the crowd just as if they are part of the party.

Two Wednesdays ago, when asking what the crowd wanted to hear next, a member of the crowd yelled out "play some Skynard." Without much argument, they smiled and nodded. Kruser began playing the song with only one hand. His other hand was holding a beer. After several chords from "Free Bird" the two guitarists looked at one another and began to play "Sweet Home Alabama," a move that sent the crowd into a frenzy.

After playing a couple more fan favorites, the duo took a break to grab some fresh air and to finish the last the last interview. Fans followed them outside to request some more songs, and some even asked if they could sit in during a jam session with the two.

Students from all over come to McMurphy's to hear some of their old favorite songs performed by 'The Guitar Dudes' every Wednesday.

The Philadelphia Inquirer

PHILADELPHIA — He'd like you to call him Diddy because, as the self-described "friendly neighborhood rap mogul superstar" would explain on "Diddy Day," to students at Benjamin Franklin High School in Philadelphia, "the P was getting between me and my fans."

But if the entrepreneur formerly known as Sean "Puffy" Combs were totally into truth-in-titling, he'd have a different middle name: "Self-Promotion."

That, after all, is where genius lies in this Sean-John-clothing-empire-founding, Bad-Boy-Entertainment-leading, Notorious B.I.G.-discovering, New York-marathon-running, and formerly J.-Lo-dating hip-hop businessman, whose album "Press Play" came out Tuesday.

And that was why, despite suffering from a cold that would require a doctor in lab coat to high-tail it over to the Four Seasons with antibiotics, Diddy would rise early on a bright September morning for the first stop in a 30-date promotional tour.

First there was an appearance at radio station Power 99, where Diddy, a onetime Uptown Records intern, told would-be music buzzers to never be shy because "a closed mouth don't get fed." Then the producer-rapper sat still long enough for an interview as a small army of minions looked on, and two police officers guarded the hotel suite door.

After he was done answering questions or those that pertained to "Press Play," which were the only ones allowed he would scoot up a short stretch of Broad Street, lined with "Press Play" placards, to Franklin High. Among his themes: How to "Press Play on Your Life."

"When I'm just doing music, I love doing whatever it takes to make it successful," said Diddy, taking off his shades and relaxing briefly in a beige Sean John jacket with epaulettes, and an oversized gold medallion. "When you're doing some reinventing and reconnecting with your fan base, it's the work you have to do."

"Press Play" is his first album since 2001's "I Forever," when the P was still part of the package. And he knows that when it comes to connecting with fans, he has his work cut out for him.

That's partly because the album, with contributions from Christina Aguilera, Nas, Big Boi of OutKast, and Nicole Scherzinger of the Pussycat Dolls, among others, arrives so long since Diddy was a dominant force in the music industry.

After he got his start producing hits for Jodeci and Mary J. Blige in the early '90s, he founded Bad Boy and rode high, first with Biggie and then, after the gangsta rapper's '97 murder (still unsolved), as a solo artist.

His 1997 debut "No Way Out" credited to Puff Daddy & the Family sold 7 million copies and made the Harlem-born rapper whose street-hustler father died when he was 3 a "ghetto fabulous" household name who was fond of calling himself "the black Sinatra."

Since then, Diddy has gone on to expand and diversify. Sean John is a $400-million-a-year business, marked by Combs' trademark attention to detail. Unsurprisingly, he's a successful perfume salesman, too, with the men's cologne Unforgivable.

But musically, he hasn't been so foolproof. In 1999, while dating Jennifer Lopez and while on hiatus from his longtime girlfriend, Kim Porter, who's now pregnant with their twin daughters he was charged with gun possession and bribing a witness.

He was acquitted in 2001 and has remained famous for being famous and being followed around St. Tropez by an umbrella-toting valet, Farnsworth Bentley, among other things. But he's been eclipsed by other more credible hip-hop acts, from 50 Cent (who mockingly rapped "I don't dance around like Diddy") to Kanye West.

Diddy admits he hasn't been as focused on music in recent years. "It took me a while to figure out how to balance music and business," he says.

The evidence that he's now got it right, he says, can be found in the triumphs of Bad Boy up-and-comers such as Yung Joc, Cassie, and Dainty Kane, the product of Diddy's VH1 reality show "Making the Band."

Further proof, he insists, is to be found on "Press Play" (Bad Boy), an overstuffed, autobiographical album that finds Diddy fully back in "artist mode."

Madonna adopts son, David, from an orphanage in Malawi

Madonna and the birth father of her newly adopted son released statements saying the adoption was done correctly.

The father of the 13-month-old boy Madonna wants to make part of her family criticized human rights groups who have challenged how the adoption is being handled and said his child should stay with the pop star.

Yohane Banda told The Associated Press on Wednesday he had entrusted his son to a Malawian orphanage after his wife died of childbirth complications, saying he was too poor to raise him alone. Now, he says, Madonna has given the boy a chance to have a family.

"Where were these people when David was struggling in the orphanage? These so-called human rights groups should leave my baby alone," he said. "As father I have OKed this, I have no problem. The village has no problem. Who are they to cause trouble? Please let them stop."

The Human Rights Consultative Committee, a coalition of 67 organizations, launched a legal challenge Tuesday, noting that Malawian regulations require prospective parents to stay with a child in Malawi for 18 to 24 months for assessment before the adoption is formalized. Madonna, though, was allowed to take the boy to England, where she has a home, and Malawian officials have said the family would be monitored there.

Children's advocates in Malawi have stressed they are not opposed to Madonna adopting David, but want to ensure rules meant to protect children aren't ignored.

Madonna and British film director husband Guy Ritchie spent eight days in Malawi and last Thursday signed adoption papers for David Banda. The boy's father countersigned the papers and High Court Justice Andrew Nyirenda issued the couple an "interim order" allowing them custody, a step toward adoption. The boy was flown to London on Monday.

Dsiddy admits he hasn't been as focused on music in recent years. "It took me a while to figure out how to balance music and business," he says.

O'Brien reflects on her mom

By Kristin Tillotson
McClatchy Newspapers

LONDON — For the young Edna O'Brien, mother didn't always know best; in fact, she almost never did. But at 74, O'Brien, one of Ireland's best-known writers and a mother and grandmother herself, has spent some time reflecting on her mother's life beyond how it affected her.

"As women, our mothers remain not just with us, but in us," O'Brien said. "Our connection with mothers is stronger than memory, a kind of permeation that goes beyond anything verbal."

O'Brien, whose oeuvre includes dozens of novels, story collections and plays, has written a highly personal novel that echoes her complicated, strained relationship with her mother.

"The Light of Evening" (the title is the opening phrase of a Yeats poem) is the story of Dilly, an old Irishwoman who recalls her life from a hospital bed as her estranged daughter Eleanora, a successful novelist living in London, does the same on the way to visit her. The novel is written with O'Brien's usual rich detail and sense of story, but its most memorable achievement is the quietly epic, ingeniously limned struggle between a mother and daughter whose fierce mutual love is obscured by decades of resentment and disappointment.

"Throughout life, your mother is always a guest at your table, in some form or another; you can't untie the knot," O'Brien said. "When I was young, I wanted to escape not only my mother, but Mother Church, Mother Ireland, and a few other mothers. When I was young, I did not see my mother in her own light. With this book, I hope I've achieved that."

One of the book's most powerful sections is the collection of letters Dilly has written to Eleanora over the years. They are adapted from letters O'Brien's mother wrote to her nearly every day.

From one sentence to the next, the letters thrust finger-wagging critiques between household chatter to startling, tragicomic effect.

"Yesterday a chimney pot fell down and the breakfast room chimney is blocked with crows' nests so we're upside down and downside up as the fella says. I saw your photograph in the paper but may I say the outfit you wore didn't do you justice, it exaggerated your figure by twice your size, the gathers and belt made you fatter. You have many ill-wishers here. Poor Dunny died alone in the gate lodge, the rats nearly got him before he was found."

The letters are masterpieces in their own right, O'Brien said. "My mother had great distaste for the written word. She was angry I became a writer especially of fiction, which she saw as sinful, a contamination of the mind. But life being full of paradoxes, these letters reveal her to be quite a writer herself."

"She only asked me once in her life to look for a book for her in London. It was called 'Mother Knows Best.' I couldn't find it."

For many years, O'Brien may as well have painted a scarlet "O" on her forehead every time she stepped foot on the Emerald Isle. Her first novel, "The Country Girls," was banned in Ireland 46 years ago because it laid bare the patriarchal tyranny of both home life and the Catholic Church for rural Irish girls. More recently, a novel she wrote based on the real-life case of a deranged young man who killed a family in an Irish woods rekindled resentment toward her as someone who insists on putting her homeland in a bad light.

In the aftermath of outrage over "The Country Girls," O'Brien was lured onto a popular television chat show. When she walked onstage, the host looked not at her, but at the audience, saying, "Who here is ashamed of this woman?" At least half raised their hands. But by the end of the program, she had charmed many of them into changing their minds.

O'Brien lives in a 19th-century Victorian rowhouse in Chelsea the oldest one on the block, to judge by the weathered-gray stone exterior.

Irish author Edna O'Brien's latest novel shares details about her estranged relationship with her mother.

When she opens the door, the face that greets a visitor must be the same one that won over that audience: Not the beautifully aloof face from her publicity shots, it is rather wise, open and observant, remarkably well-maintained and framed with a still-thick mane of upswept, faded-red hair.

She spends most of her time in the library, a lofty but homey room designed by her son Sasha Gebler, a London architect. The antique furniture is accented with lace inherited from her mother. Eight-tiered bookshelves line the walls, holding titles by Joyce, Yeats, Proust, Beckett and Faulkner as well as Jane Fonda.

"My mother is very funny," said Gebler. "What's kept her young is that she's interested in the rest of the world, in what other people think, and with such humor."

O'Brien's own mothering of Sasha and his older brother, Carlo, was bitterly criticized as both neglectful and indulgent by her ex-husband, the Czech-Irish writer Ernest Gebler especially after she became a much bigger literary success than he was.

"Mothers are constantly judging daughters in a way they don't their sons," O'Brien said. "I am devoted to my sons and we're very good friends. But I don't think I was a normal mother."

"I think she means she wasn't a boring mother," said Sasha Uebler. "In some ways she treated us as both children and adults."

O'Brien writes her books in longhand (in purple ink, with the ZIG-brand pens she adores). It took her nearly four years to write "The Light of Evening." By contrast, "The Country Girls," her breakout 1960 novel, wrote itself in three weeks, she said.

Couric gets primetime special

By Wyatt Buchanan
Associated Press

Katie Couric and Charles Gibson will make their prime-time debuts as chief anchors for CBS and ABC next month during hour-long specials reporting midterm election results. Brian Williams is likely to do the same at NBC, but that network hasn't announced its Election Night plans.

Meanwhile, a study released by the Center for Media and Public Affairs on Wednesday found that the network evening-news programs are covering this year's midterm election campaign three times as heavily as they did in 2002.

The last network election-night coverage, in 2004, was anchored by Tom Brokaw at NBC, Dan Rather at CBS and Peter Jennings at ABC. Brokaw retired from the evening news a month later, Rather left his CBS job under pressure and Jennings got sick and died from lung cancer.

Couric will host a one-hour elections special at 10 p.m. ET, updated at 10 p.m. on the West Coast, CBS said Wednesday. Bob Schieffer and a host of correspondents will join her, along with newly hired analysts Mike McCurry, former Clinton press secretary, and Nicolle Wallace, former White House communications director for President George W. Bush.

Couric will also deliver brief updates on the hour beginning at 8 p.m. ET.

Gibson will be joined in ABC's studio by "This Week" host George Stephanopoulos. Analysts include George Will, Donna Brazile, Cokie Roberts and Mark Halperin. They will do another hour-long live show for 11 p.m. on the West Coast, which will be made available to other affiliates across the country if they want it.

Both networks also did one-hour specials in 2002. One difference this year: Gibson will do network updates every half hour, instead of hourly, ABC said.

Politicians are awaiting Nov. 7 eagerly, given polls showing Democrats may be within striking range of taking control of Congress from Republicans.

Between Sept. 5 and Oct. 3, the three network newscasts ran 83 campaign stories, compared to the 20 they did during a similar time period four years ago, the Center for Media and Public Affairs said.

Since the scandal of Rep. Mark Foley's e-mail messages to congressional pages broke, 23 of 27 stories have been about how that might affect the elections. Even talking that away, the 60 campaign stories triple what was done four years earlier, the center said.

"It may be that a long-term decline in the media's interest in elections has reversed," said Robert Lichter, the Washington-based center's president, also noting the heavy coverage of the 2004 presidential election.

Still, the coverage tends to focus too heavily on scandal, gaffes and race handicapping, he said.

Katie Couric (above) has plans to a host a one hour election special with former evening news anchor Bob Schieffer.

Theme songs are getting scarce

Theme songs like the one performed by Will Smith for the show 'Fresh Prince of Bel-Air' are being replaced by hit songs.

Don't remember much about high school biology or physics. Couldn't tell ya how to compute a calculus problem. But, for the love of Will Smith, the theme song to "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" remains fresh in the mind.

Smith's catchy rap opened each episode of his hit '90s sitcom, in which he starred as a street-smart teen from Philly who moves in with wealthy relatives. A whole generation knows it by heart that, and the "Saved by the Bell" song.

TV themes, from "The Beverly Hillbillies" to "The Brady Bunch" to "Cheers" to "Friends," conjure up memories of cozy nights, childhood bliss and a universal nostalgia for bygone days. But, today, show themes are doing a fast fade as the networks crunch their programming budgets.

Are they about to join the variety hour in the TV graveyard?

"It's a rarity today," TV historian Tim Brooks said of the catchy, tuneful opening. "It's kind of like the Broadway musical producing hit songs it just doesn't do that anymore."

Back in the day, even into the '90s, shows usually had a "main title," a 40-to-60 second opening montage that introduced the cast and was often set to music written by a composer, said Jon Burlingame, author of "TV's Biggest Hits," a history of themes. Songs summed up what a show was all about, whether spinning the tale of how a group of wacky castaways ended up on "Gilligan's Island," telling how a spunky single career woman was "going to make it after all," or describing why six touchy-feely Manhattan singles were there for each other.

But now many sitcoms and one-hour dramas are dropping that device. They dive straight into the action, sometimes flashing the show's title or logo at various points throughout an episode.

ABC's "Lost" does it. The twisty drama begins after a teaser, which touches on what happened in previous installments, and cuts to a black screen at a crucial plot point. A white "Lost" logo swirls into view. Eerie music plays. The whole thing lasts about five seconds.

"That's not a theme" nor an artistic statement, lamented Burlingame, longing for the urgency of the "Mission: Impossible" score.

Other title-flashers include ABC's "Grey's Anatomy," which threw out its 26-second theme last year, and "Desperate Housewives" and NBC's "My Name Is Earl," which both switch off between showing the full credits and the logo. New shows ABC's "Brothers & Sisters" and "Ugly Betty" and NBC's "Heroes" and "Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip" display only the logo.

"Almost all shows have music, but it's generic, it's scene-setting, it's short," said Brooks, who estimated that fewer than 10 percent have "traditional" themes that set up the show.

Clearly, brevity is key. No drawn-out intro or hokey theme. Networks don't have time for that and neither, prevailing TV thinking goes, do the country's couch potatoes.

"Producers feel, rightly or wrongly, that that interruption, if you will, is going to lose viewers," Brooks said.

"I think one of the things that has squeezed themes out is this relentless kind of move toward tightening everything, making it go right from joke to joke, from action to action, from shootout to shootout, so that you won't press the dreaded remote control."

Thanks to the elimination of commercials between the end of one show and the beginning of another, shows overlap before fickle viewers have a chance to channel-surf to Another Network. More commercials air within a show, making episodes shorter. Main titles and well-rounded theme songs and scores? Sorry, no time, no money.

Tara Ariano, co-founder of the blog Television Without Pity, isn't sweating it. She thinks a "full-on opening credit [and] theme song is kind of a waste, from a business perspective.

"The networks sort of assume we watch the show, so we don't need to have the premise explained to us each week. In the era of the DVR, half the people watching the show are just fast-forwarding that anyway," she said.

Another trend, which harks back to the late '80s-early '90s fave "The Wonder Years" and the more recent "Dawson's Creek" and "Laguna Beach," is the use of music by established and new artists as both a theme in the main title and a device within the show.

"Increasingly, it's not music scored for the show, it's pop songs pasted into the show," Brooks said.

CBS' "CSI" opens with the Who's "Who Are You?" Gavin DeGraw's star rose after his radio-friendly single "I Don't Want to Be," debuted as the theme to the CW's "One Tree Hill." And the Fray was, well, just a band on the fringe until "Grey's Anatomy" and others played their songs to underscore dramatic scenes and montages.

All of this makes Jessi Frederick-Conaway, who composed the music to G-rated sitcoms such as ABC's "Full House" and "Family Matters," a little sad. There is, he thinks, "this desire to be super hip."

"Now, the music director is sort of the composer," he said. "It's a different kind of deal."

Burlingame, citing the great intros of award winners such as NBC's "The West Wing" and HBO's "Six Feet Under," is confident the theme lyrical, instrumental, whatever will make a comeback. He'd rather see more original music, but he'll take licensed material if it's good.

"Some producers, I think, want to make a statement, in terms of imagery and music," he said. "It depends on who you get."

Will Smith, back in the '90s, made a hip-hop statement of his own while advising fans to "just sit right there I'll tell you how I became the prince of a town called Bel-Air."

But, in this fast-forward TV world, would they still listen?

Murray parties with college kids

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

Bill Murray created a small sensation in the Scottish town of St. Andrews, joining Scandinavian students at a late-night party and even helping to wash the dishes, a newspaper reported Sunday.

In the movie "Lost in Translation," Murray plays a lonely middle-aged actor in Japan who befriends a young American woman and goes partying with her.

And in what The Sunday Telegraph said was life imitating art, the 56-year-old Murray joined up with 22-year-old Norwegian student Lykke Stavnef, who took him to a house where a student party was in full swing.

"Nobody could believe it when I arrived at the party with Bill Murray," Stavnef, a social anthropology student, was quoted as saying. "He was just like the character in 'Lost in Translation.'"

The newspaper reported that Murray met Stavnef at a bar where he was drinking with fellow golfers after playing in the Oct. 5-8 Alfred Dunhill Links Championship in St. Andrews with other actors.

To Stavnef's surprise, Murray accepted her invitation to a party and accompanied her and her friend to a party, the newspaper said.

She said she was first concerned when the apartment had no clean glasses left, but that Murray was happy to drink vodka from a coffee cup and also helped wash dishes in the cramped kitchen.

The Sunday Telegraph article was accompanied by a photograph that appears to show Murray, dressed in a checkered shirt and a brown vest, washing a metal pot at the sink.

As news spread around the city that Murray had turned up at the student party, the house became crowded with people wanting to meet the star of "Ghostbusters," the article said.

"He was joking with me about reheating some leftover pasta and how drunk everyone was," said participant Agnes Huttfeldt, 22.

Tom Wright, 22, another college student, said "the party was overflowing with stunning Scandinavian blondes." He seemed to be in his element, cracking lots of jokes, Wright said. "It was the talk of the town the next day."

Shortly after doing the dishes, Murray left the party, the students said.

Stony Brook, William and Mary, Towson — by a combined score of 131-14. The UMass defense is averaging a slim 10.5 points per game, the nation's third-best scoring defense, and will face URI's option offense this weekend.

"We've been really working hard, striving for balance, and taking care of the ball on offense," Brown said. "Defensively, I think the first quarter is the big challenge. If we can have a good first quarter, we should be in good shape for the football game."

The last time UMass faced an option offense was at Navy, when the Minutemen allowed 21 points against a high-powered running attack.

"[URI is] very similar in structure to Navy," Brown said. "[Rhode Island] tends to get a little creative with their sets and they throw the ball with more frequency. So you really have to pay attention to the pass time and spend a little more time getting your guys ready for the play-action pass."

Going on the road to face a Division 1-A with one of the best running games in the country is a potent test for any defense. But Brown, true to form, isn't relying on experience to get his team through this week.

"You still have to go out and have a great week of preparation," Brown said. "[URI] can utilize that Navy tape as well to see what they perceive as weaknesses. You have to be ready to adjust from their scenario as well."

UMass leads the Atlantic 10 in six categories. The Minutemen lead in total offense and total defense, and they rank in the Top 10 in the nation in several categories. Coen leads the nation's seventh-best scoring offense. Coen also leads the nation in pass-efficiency rating at 184.78.

The Minutemen also lead the nation in kickoff returns — averaging 29.23 yards per return — and net punting with a 37.33 average. Although punter Christian Koegel leads the nation in net punting, he does not have enough punts to qualify for the statistical leaderboard. The UMass offense has simply been too good.

Junior Charles Walker and the UMass defense have flown under the radar this season because of a strong offensive core.

son, 131 points in three games, but its still there. In fact, this season the defense has been just as impressive at keeping points off the board as the offense is at putting them up.

Once again the Minutemen lead the Atlantic 10 in scoring defense. They've allowed an anemic 10.5 points per game this season, including just 14 in the past three contests.

Widely known as a defensive specialist, Brown says he doesn't care who performs well, just as long as his team keeps winning.

"It's really not a [big deal]," Brown said of his defense being overshadowed by the offense. "I just hope we keep putting the points up. I'm really happy with the way we're playing as a football team. The reality is we really don't care who gets the credit."

It's difficult to spotlight one particular star on the defensive side of the ball. Almost all 11 are having stellar years for the Minutemen. UMass has eight players with at least 20 tackles this season — and two more with 19. Linebackers Jason Hatchell and Charles Walker are at the top of that list with 47 total tackles apiece — Hatchell leads the team in solo tackles (25).

On Wednesday, Brown brought up the fact that one criticism he's heard is that the Minutemen don't intercept that many passes.

"Everybody has been throwing the ball so short against us, trying to stay away from sacks and getting under pressure," he said.

Opponents are averaging just 5.5 yards per pass play when matching up against the Maroon and White. Towson was no different on Saturday. With their backup quarterback in the game, the Tigers averaged just 6.1 yards per completion.

Although they only have four interceptions as a team, the Minutemen cause a lot of fumbles. They've forced the opponent to put the ball on the ground 11 times this season, recovering eight of them. That — coupled with the four interceptions — gives UMass a plus-4 in the giveaway/takeaway department.

"The one thing we've been really stressing is getting around the football and when you get there, trying to get it out," Brown said. "That's just one of the basic ingredients in [our] style of defense — find a way to get it out any way that you can."

That could come in handy this Saturday against Rhode Island. The Rams feature a potent option offense — much like Navy's — where they run the ball a lot.

"You have to be smart. You're not attacking pass protections," Brown said. "You're attacking a style of play that has three phases."

This Saturday should give the Minutemen another shot at proving they're up to the challenge against the option.

King named A-10 Rookie of the Week

By Joe Mallozzi
Collegian Staff

UMass F. Hockey

The Massachusetts field hockey team (4-12, 1-3 Atlantic 10) just can't find its stride.

Since winning two consecutive games against Harvard and Fairfield in early September, the Maroon and White posted a paltry 1-9 record while its opponents held a 29-18 scoring advantage.

"We really need to improve on both sides of the ball," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "We just haven't executed consistently."

The Minutewomen offense is something of an enigma. At times, they've been brilliant, scoring four goals on five separate occasions. However, they just can't muster a consistent offensive attack — opponents held them scoreless four times and to one goal three times.

King crowned A-10 Rookie of the Week

One bright spot for the Minutewomen offense is freshman midfielder Cher King.

The Barbados native wasted no time establishing herself as one of UMass' most reliable offensive weapons. On Monday, King received her first accolade — the A-10 named her, along with Richmond forward Lindsey Conrad, its Co-Rookie of the Week.

King notched one goal and handed out an assist as the Minutewomen defeated Saint Louis and lost to No. 18 Richmond last weekend. Shea uses King almost exclusively in an offensive capacity. She spends a large portion of the game at midfield or in the team's offensive zone.

She is a member of Barbados' national team and represented her country this past March in the Commonwealth Games in Melbourne, Australia.

King's aggressive play and devastating slap shot make her quite the headache for opposing defenses. Shea hasn't hesitated to give the talented newcomer a great deal of playing time since she arrived in Amherst.

DoRosario getting it done

Junior defender Kristina DoRosario has emerged as a key cog in the team's backfield. Her steady play during the last two weeks garnered praise from Shea.

"[DoRosario] has really been playing within herself," Shea said. "She's been executing at a really high rate and that has made us that much better."

The junior's improving performance is huge for the Minutewomen at the moment.

The Maroon and White lost three players to season-ending injuries since the campaign started. Sophomore forward Erin Parker broke her leg in the loss at Dartmouth, while freshman forward Amy Novak and senior defender Kwylin Jaggassar both went down with season-ending injuries against Saint Louis.

Freshman's Season Over Before it Started

Ann DeSanctis committed to UMass as a highly-touted recruit, and was looked upon to bolster the team's depth and may be even crack the starting lineup as a freshman.

This was not to be for the Kentucky native.

"[DeSanctis] actually hurt her knee during her senior year in high school in her state's lacrosse championships," Shea said.

DeSanctis' athletic ability had Shea smitten instantly, but her knowledge of the game intrigued the coach as well.

The Minutewomen had a paucity of defenders to begin with. But when DeSanctis went down, Shea was left with only three defenders left on her roster.

"She would have given us more depth at defense," Shea said. "But also, her competitiveness and knowledge of the game are very high."

There have been no complications in her rehabilitation. Her knee responded well and Shea hopes to see her in the UMass backfield next season.

The Minutewomen defense projects to be strong next season, as they will have three senior starters and a healthy DeSanctis as well.

Junior Kristina DoRosario has emerged as a key part of the Minutewomen defense in 2006. She has two assists on the year.

No road trip woes for UMass

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

Just call the Massachusetts field hockey team willing road warriors this weekend.

UMass coach Patty Shea said Wednesday that the Maroon and White is welcoming the challenge of playing two games against Atlantic 10 foes on the road this weekend, over 500 miles away from the friendly confines of Garber Field in Philadelphia. The Maroon and White will play its final two road games of the season against the West Chester Golden Rams and the La Salle Golden Explorers.

Road games can be a prescription for disaster, but the Minutewomen are no stranger to the road this year, having begun their season with a season-long eight-game road trip. The Minutewomen would finish a disappointing 2-6 after the dust settled on their season-long road trip, but posted an identical record at Garber Field in their next eight games.

"They learned from the early games on the road that each surface is a little different and there definitely is a home-field advantage," Shea said. "We have to get acquainted with that surface and that facility as quickly as we can."

Optimism may be the magic word this weekend throughout the Minutewomen squad, but road trips will always present the usual challenges.

"Going down to Philly can be either four hours or eight hours, depending on the traffic," Shea said. "And with the NLCS [National League Championship Series] coming back to New York, going through New York could take a long time. The bus also takes a lot out of your legs."

That bus, however, will be taking off on Thursday at noon and arrives in Philadelphia by 7 p.m., a fact Shea explained would give the Minutewomen a good night sleep in their hotel rooms rather than sleeping through the usual distractions of a dorm room.

Junior forward Rachael Mervine is tied for second on UMass in points with 13. Her and the Minutewomen are happy to be on the road this weekend.

UMass coach Patty Shea is glad that her team is on the road for Homecoming Weekend. UMass is 2-6 on the road and at home this year.

"One good thing about road games is that when we're on the road on Fridays, they're not attending classes, so we have longer to go through prep and walk through more game plans," Shea said. "Whereas when we're home on Fridays, they're actually attending classes and it's a pretty normal day for them, so it actually gives us a little keener focus and they're just afforded a little more time to get prepared for the game and go out and do what they need to do."

While The Maroon and White is battling this weekend in "The City of Brotherly Love," it won't be able to take in the sights and sounds of Homecoming Weekend. Bonfires, concerts, and proud alumni will converge on the UMass campus, but Shea is more than happy her team won't be participating in the weekend extravaganza.

"It's Homecoming Weekend up here, so believe it or not, it's nicer to be playing these two games on the road because there will not be as many families around and there will be a lot of distractions going on this weekend," Shea said.

Garber Field may go by many nicknames, but homefield advantage for Shea and company has not been one of them. On the road this year, the Minutewomen are being outscored 24-17 by opponents. UMass has been on the losing end of two shutouts at Garber Field and is being outscored 23-14 in front of the home faithful.

Working as a group, passing the ball into the open spaces instead of forcing one-on-one matchups, keeping the game simple but at the same time being creative — it's been the mantra of the church of Shea and her disciples all season. Now that mantra will be echoing throughout Philadelphia over the weekend as the Minutewomen try to win pivotal games away from home.

"It's not going to be easy for us and we have to really perform well, but I know that we have the athletes and I know that we have the tactics, the skills, and the knowledge to get it done," Shea said.

"He hit me in the back. It was just a poor decision by me in terms of our protection. I wasn't as aware on the first play of the season as I would have liked to have been."

He's been sacked just four times since then, but coach Bill Belichick said the Bills present a variety of defensive looks.

"They have all of the different blitz zone combinations pretty much that you could possibly run," he said. "a lot of stunting up front with their defensive line. They're very quick."

Brady has had a lot more time to study a lot more video than before the first game. He said the blitz that fooled him on the first play hadn't been used by the Bills during their exhibition games.

But New England had a bye last week and now can watch video of all six Buffalo games.

"We've got a little bit more to watch now," Light said. "I'm sure that they'll dial up something special for us in this game. It's just a matter of how well we react to it."

Quarterbacks performances often are judged on their statistics. Brady is just 16th in passer rating and 30th in completion percentage in the NFL. But they're also responsible for setting up their protection when they get to the line of scrimmage and see the defensive alignment.

"One of my biggest responsibilities here is always getting us in the right protection," Brady said. "I hate it when it doesn't go the right way. It doesn't happen very often that we don't pick up exactly who we want to pick up so it is challenging.

"But I've been around a long time so I can feel like I can get us in the right protection probably 99 percent of the time."

After Spikes' sack, Brady was wrong 100 percent of the time this season.

"Being down seven like five seconds into the year was not really what I was dreaming of the night before the game," he said. "We actually put together a nice touchdown drive after that strip sack."

But it's no fun seeing it again and again and again even though viewing the video is designed to avoid a repeat.

"They had done something they hadn't done the entire preseason, so they kind of got me on it," Brady said. "I learned a lesson."

Bill Belichick and the New England Patriots have been preparing during the bye week for a rematch against a tough Bulfalo defense.

Logos to be placed on caskets and urns

By Patrick Walters
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA—Many crazed baseball fans have said they would die for a championship. But are they willing to take that devotion to the grave? Major League Baseball and a company that makes funeral products will soon find out just how many fans want to be decked out for all eternity in tribute to their team.

Starting next season, fans of the New York Yankees, Boston Red Sox, Detroit Tigers, Philadelphia Phillies, Chicago Cubs and Los Angeles Dodgers will be able to have their ashes put in an urn or head six feet under in a casket emblazoned with their team colors and insignia.

MLB has entered a licensing agreement with Eternal Image, which hopes to eventually make urns and caskets for all 30 teams. The company also hopes to have similar agreements with NASCAR, the NHL and the NFL, but baseball was the first to sign on.

The $11 billion-a-year funeral industry is adding more personal touches, from Harley Davidson-themed caskets to ones featuring the cartoon character Betty Boop.

Kurt Soffe, a spokesman for the National Funeral Directors Association, said the baseball products are part of a trend of trying to capture "the life and the passions of the person that has passed away."

"More and more families are wanting to have something that respects the personalities," Soffe said.

Eternal Image, based in Farmington Hills, Mich., also makes a line of Vatican-themed products. Chief executive Clint Mytych said the company "wanted to break into a sports venue of some kind," and baseball is "the all-American sport."

He said he has received at least 1,000 inquiries since June.

Susan Goodenow, an MLB spokeswoman, said the league and clubs have received requests for several years for urns and caskets with team logos.

"Passionate fans express their love of their team in a number of different ways," Goodenow said.

The National Funeral Directors Association is meeting in Philadelphia this week and giving its members a sneak peak of what the baseball urns will look like. Eternal Image says urns for the six teams should be available by opening day 2007, and caskets for those teams should be ready later in the year.

Major League Baseball has entered a licensing agreement that will put the logo of all 30 teams on urns and caskets.

Peterson anticipates return for bowl game

BY MURRAY EVANS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORMAN, Okla. — Adrian Peterson plans to play at least one more game for Oklahoma.

The star tailback, speaking publicly for the first time since breaking his collarbone on Saturday, said he intends to play in a bowl game if the Sooners reach the postseason.

"I'm praying each night for a speedy recovery," Peterson said Wednesday at a news conference. "I love to play the game. I would enjoy going out there and playing with the guys and getting back on the field."

The junior was injured after falling into the end zone and landing awkwardly on his left shoulder at the end of a spectacular 53-yard touchdown run in the fourth quarter of Oklahoma's 34-9 win over Iowa State.

Peterson, whose left arm is in a sling, said he could be back in four to six weeks, but Oklahoma trainer Scott Anderson offered a six-week timeframe for Peterson's return. The injury is being treated without surgery, Anderson said.

Peterson, with coach Bob Stoops standing nearby, didn't take questions about whether he plans to return to school next year or enter the NFL draft.

Oklahoma is 4-2 and 1-1 in the Big 12 entering Saturday's home game against Colorado. The 20th-ranked Sooners need two more wins to become bowl-eligible.

If Peterson makes it back in four weeks, he could conceivably play in Oklahoma's final two regular-season games, at Baylor on Nov. 18 and at Oklahoma State on Nov. 25.

The Big 12 title game is Dec. 2.

"It depends on how things heal," Peterson said. "I've got to take my time and let it heal correctly."

Peterson said he immediately knew something was "seriously wrong" when he hit the turf on his final play. He said he's still in "a lot of pain" but that he plans to maintain his conditioning while the injury heals and attend Oklahoma football practices.

"It's crazy, taking the pounding I take ... to fall like that and unfortunately break a collarbone," he said.

Peterson's injury came while playing for the first time in years with his father, Nelson Peterson, in the stands. Nelson Peterson had spent about eight years in federal prison for money laundering. Oddly, after the game, Adrian Peterson's mother, Bonita Jackson, broke her ankle while playing basketball during a family get-together.

"I told her this is a day we're never going to forget," he said. "It was a crazy weekend."

Peterson ran for 183 yards and two touchdowns against Iowa State. He has 935 yards and 10 touchdowns this season and is the second-leading rusher in country.

Peterson set an NCAA Division I-A freshman record with 1,925 rushing yards in 2004 as he helped lead Oklahoma to the Bowl Championship Series title game and finished second in the Heisman Trophy voting. He's rushed for at least 100 yards in 22 of his 30 games at Oklahoma, including nine straight to start his career.

His performance Saturday moved him into fourth place on Oklahoma's all-time rushing list. He would need only 150 to match 1978 Heisman Trophy winner Billy Sims' total of 4,118 yards.

"That's something that's pretty cool," Peterson said. "Actually, I didn't really know about it until after the game. It's not something that I've been focusing on."

Despite all his success, Peterson has been fairly injury-prone in his Oklahoma career. He dislocated his left shoulder in fall practice in 2004, reaggravated it during the regular season and then had surgery in the offseason.

He missed one game last season and was severely limited in three others with a sprained right ankle.

"Adrian has always had a great capacity for recovery, and certainly he's motivated," Anderson said.

Two Hurricanes apologize

BY TIM REYNOLDS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — Miami president Donna Shalala offered no apologies for the disciplinary action taken by her university in the days following a sideline-clearing brawl that sparked widespread outrage, saying the punishments handed out were strong enough.

And two of the sanctioned Miami players remorsefully agreed.

Sophomore Anthony Reddick and senior captain Brandon Meriweather issued apologies — on their own, without university urging — Tuesday for their roles in the brawl with Florida International, the first act in the long road the Hurricanes will travel in an effort to rebuild the program's damaged reputation.

Reddick swung his helmet as a weapon and struck an FIU player with it during Saturday night's fight at the Orange Bowl, while Meriweather was seen stomping on some Golden Panthers in apparent retaliation after they hit one of his teammates.

"You'll never see that behavior out of me again," Reddick said. "My behavior was a disgrace to my school, my family and my friends, especially the young kids who look up to me as their role model. I do understand that what I did was wrong."

Meriweather's mea culpa came in the form of a letter, which Hurricanes coach Larry Coker wasn't made aware of until moments before its distribution.

"I was not part of the initial fight that broke out," Meriweather wrote. "However, I did see that my teammates and, more specifically, the placeholder were being attacked by the FIU players. At that point I went over the pile so that I could control my teammates and prevent the fight from becoming worse. When I arrived at the pile, I did not use my better judgment."

The brawl started with 9 minutes left in the third quarter of a game Miami went on to win 35-0. As the fighting started, two FIU players — Chris Smith and Marshall McDuffie Jr. — attacked Miami holder Matt Perrelli.

Moments after Perrelli was hit, Reddick ran across the field, holding his helmet high, then swung it wildly and smashed it into at least one FIU player.

Smith and McDuffie were kicked off FIU's team on Monday; Reddick was given an indefinite suspension by the Hurricanes. The 16 other FIU players sanctioned for their roles in the brawl were suspended indefinitely, while 12 more Miami players will sit out this Saturday's game at Duke.

Miami head coach Larry Coker smiles and laughs with players on Tuesday. He said the sanctions ordered against his players were fair.

Shalala — who has apologized repeatedly to FIU officials and her own university community for the fight — said that sanctions levied against 13 players for their role in the sideline-clearing brawl were fair, justified and strong enough to satisfy the university.

All that, though, came with one big caveat: Miami athletes simply can never fight again, she said.

"This university will be firm and punish people who do bad things," Shalala said. "But we will not throw any student under the bus for instant restoration of our image or our reputation. I will not hang them in a public square. I will not eliminate their participation at the university. I will not take away their scholarships."

Miami officials have enacted a new rule that any athlete who fights will be dismissed from that team, a "new standard ... zero tolerance" policy. That, along with 12 one-game suspensions, one indefinite suspension and orders that all players involved in the brawl do community service, is sufficient punishment, Shalala said.

"It's time for the feeding frenzy to stop," Shalala said. "These young men made a stupid, terrible, horrible mistake and they are being punished."

Shalala will meet with FIU president Mitch Maidique on Thursday to determine if next season's game between the teams will be played. An announcement will be made by the weekend, Shalala said.

Echoing Shalala's sentiments, Coker said he found the sanctions ordered by his school and the Atlantic Coast Conference to be fair.

"We are accountable and we need to take care of our athletes and do everything we can to make sure these things don't occur," Coker said. "When you have a terrible incident like this, it really brings home the consequences."

Suspended Miami players continued to practice with the team, most will have scout-team duty this week.

"Let's move forward," Coker said. "Let's don't look back."

Miami Hurricanes sophomore safety Anthony Reddick issued an apology on Tuesday for his role in the brawl with Florida International.

Oklahoma running back Adrian Peterson intends to play in a bowl game if the Sooners advance to the postseason. He broke his collarbone last Saturday.

Rested Patriots ready for rematch with Bills

BY HOWARD ULMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — Tom Brady's season got off to a terrible start — a touchdown by his opponents on his very first play.

On Sunday he gets to face them again.

Buffalo's Takeo Spikes, unblocked on a blitz, smacked Brady as the Patriots quarterback drew his arm back to pass on Sept. 10. Brady and the ball tumbled to the ground. London Fletcher scooped the ball up and rambled 11 yards for a touchdown.

Twelve seconds into the game and the score was Buffalo 7, New England 0.

Brady headed for the sideline. The home crowd sat stunned.

"I remember right after it happened I ran off the field and I said, 'that's a hell of a way to start the season,'" Brady said Wednesday. "We were watching it today so I'm sick of seeing that play. I've seen it probably 30 times in the last six weeks. I'm trying to put that one out of my mind."

When the Patriots got the ball back, they marched 80 yards to Brady's 9-yard touchdown pass to Troy Brown. But it took a fourth quarter safety for them to win 19-17.

They've turned the ball over just five times since Brady's opening fumble and lead the AFC East with a 4-1 record. The Bills are third in the division at 2-4 with two straight losses and have recovered just one fumble since Brady's.

But they do have 17 sacks — the Patriots have only 12 — and are at home for Sunday's rematch.

"You never know what's going to happen in the first game and we especially didn't know but we just had to move on from that, put that out of our minds," center Dan Koppen said. "But, going up there, we can't do that. We have to execute better from the start."

They couldn't do much worse.

That left a huge gap for Spikes to hit at full speed.

"I knew what went wrong the second I felt the guy hit me," Brady said.

UMass to collide with Rams

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It's Homecoming Weekend — alumni from all over the country will make their way to the University of Massachusetts campus for a nostalgic trip through Amherst.

They'll grab some Antonio's pizza, some wings from The Hangar, visit the bars in town, and stop by the Massachusetts football game on Saturday against URI.

Marching bands, cheerleaders, old friends, parents — all will be in attendance for Saturday's festivities. There's also a football game in the mix. Distractions are paired with the perks of Homecoming Weekend, but UMass coach Don Brown isn't concerned with the circus surrounding the game.

"We get isolated on Friday so I'm not worried about people being around," Brown said. "It'll be a good crowd on Saturday and to this point our guys have reacted any time we've been in front of a big crowd."

The Minutemen (5-1, 3-0 Atlantic 10) lost a 21-20 heartbreaker in front of a 30,000-plus crowd at Navy on Sept. 9. Quarterback Liam Coen came out of the gate firing and led UMass down the field for a touchdown on the first drive of the game.

So the weekend's potential distractions, Brown said, shouldn't be an issue, and the coach is looking forward to seeing some of his graduated players.

"All the guys that have worked for you over the years, it's good to see them," Brown said. "We will share some memories, and shoot the breeze a little bit. That's certainly a positive."

The Minutemen have not faced a stiff test in a while. Back-to-back 48-7 wins and a 35-0 blowout precede this weekend's matchup. UMass has outscored its last three opponents —

Senior defensive back James Ihedigbo is second on UMass in solo tackles with 21. The captain leads the team in sacks with three on the year. Opponents are averaging just 5.5 yards per pass play against the UMass defense.

Minutemen defense flies under the radar

By Jon Pelland

Early in the third quarter of last weekend's game between the Massachusetts football team and Towson, the Tigers marched the ball into UMass territory, threatening to shorten the Minutemen's 14-0 lead.

Starting from their own 20-yard line, the Tigers brought the ball to the UMass 38-yard line seven plays later. They drove 42 yards on five runs and two short passes. Then it happened: the Minutemen dug in their heels and halted the drive.

Having just gained nine yards on a Rasheed McClaude draw play, Tigers coach Gordy Combs did the sensible thing — he gave the ball back to McClaude. Only this time the results were much different. Just as McClaude received the handoff, defensive linemen Justin Leonard and John Hatchell met him in the hole. The ball squirted out of McClaude's grasp and fell to the turf.

UMass' Brandon Collier fell on the ball for the turnover. After the game, UMass coach Don Brown called it the pivotal play in the blowout victory. The Minutemen then marched down the field and scored on Brandon London's second touchdown reception of the game.

The situation was typical of the UMass defense this season — it will let you think you have the momentum, then take it away in the blink of an eye.

"The nice thing for us is that it all starts with [us having] good players that believe in the system," Brown said. "When their opportunity comes they're taking the most advantage of it. That's kind of been the formula."

It may be easy to overlook the UMass defense with the numbers being put up by the offense this sea-

Athletic suspensions stir many questions

Rob Greenfield

Why is this happening?

There have been 15 suspensions of UMass athletes so far this year due to "team rules violations" and run-ins with the law. The Amherst campus seems to be getting the better of the Minutemen and Minutewomen right now.

This athletic department has to be feeling like Dennis Green's PR guy. Every suspension just adds to the 'Not again' or the 'Just don't do anything stupid' feeling that Athletic Director John McCutcheon has to have right now.

What do you do if you're the administration? How much disciplining does it take before you soften the restrictions or have to sit people down for good? Is there something wrong with the athletes that the coaches are recruiting?

There are a lot of questions when it comes to team suspensions. Obviously, a coach doesn't want to throw his or her player under the bus and broadcast the violation to the whole campus.

But the uncertainty leads to speculation. These suspension mysteries can be blown out of proportion at times, but don't you wonder? These situations — involving athletes that students watch and beat writers cover on a daily basis — invite the most random of thoughts.

Did the player do drugs? Get into a fight? Miss a team meeting? Talk back to the coach? Flunk out?

All of these questions arise. Whether the violation is showing up late to a practice or getting busted at a kegger on the weekend, we still wouldn't know.

The point is that this looks bad. There have been 15 — count 'em, 15 — team suspensions so far this year. Five came from the field hockey team, four from ice hockey, two from football, two from men's soccer and two from men's basketball.

The men's basketball violations extended beyond the team's authority. Point guard Chris Lowe and reserve Nana Ampim were arrested on Oct. 6 shortly after 1 a.m. outside of the Amherst Starbucks.

This made national news. The Associated Press and Sports Illustrated both ran the story and it appeared on the front page of this newspaper.

Even if Lowe and Ampim weren't at fault, the athletic department still suffers. How are the athletic directors supposed to promote their own program and draw recruits if basketball players are getting arrested, and UMass has suspended 15 athletes in just over a month and a half?

It's getting ridiculous now. No one knows the team rules that are in place, but there are consequences for messing up, just like there are for everyone else on campus.

Is having players follow team rules really too much to ask? It's becoming a tall order for UMass athletes, who hurt their teams and create more work for the people around them when they force coaches to act.

Many insist that college athletes are held to a higher standard than regular students, that there is added pressure to perform, and all of these other stupid excuses.

The fact is that these athletes, while being held to their higher standard, also receive perks that most students who go through the regular channels do not.

It's time for these athletes to stop breaking the rules. It is insulting to think that some of these scholarship athletes — who get a free tuition, which includes free meals and housing — can't follow some simple regulations.

Yes, sometimes we don't know the full story and an athlete might not be at fault, or the violation that led to the suspension might have been out of character.

But for the rest of them, it is just arrogance. The 'I kind of do whatever I want whenever I want' mentality drips from these players, who think that the rules are for someone else.

If the violations keep coming, then there is something wrong with the type of athletes that UMass is recruiting.

There are disciplinary measures in every phase of life — teachers do it to students, parents do it to kids, coaches do it to players — and there wouldn't be success without discipline.

So suspensions are a necessary part of a coaches' job and help maintain team discipline and work ethic. But the rate at which these current suspensions are coming is out of control.

Nobody knows what happens behind closed doors, but if you were part of the UMass athletic department right now, would you be pleased with how things have gone?

My answer is no. It doesn't matter how much success you have on the field if you don't have success off of it. It is the coaches' job to maintain order and make sure that the team has the right mentality.

But in this situation, the blame falls solely upon the men and women who got suspended.

Get your act together.

Walker stands on her head

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

UMass W. Soccer

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (10-4, 4-2 A-10) won both of its games last weekend, blanking the Saint Joseph's Hawks, 2-0, on Friday and the Temple Owls, 1-0, on Sunday.

The sweep included goalkeeper Kristin Walker's second and third consecutive shutouts, and the fifth and sixth she has registered this season. It was the first time the redshirt junior has recorded back-to-back shutouts in her collegiate career.

After sitting out her freshman year in 2003, Walker started the first game of the following season and has pioneered the Minutewomen between the posts — starting in 48 of UMass' 50 contests since. In that span of time she has goose-egged her opponents 19 times.

Aside from her 10 wins and eight shutouts this season, she has racked up more impressive statistics in other categories.

Despite tearing her ACL in the final game of last year's season, Walker has remained as solid and stable as the medical brace she had been forced to wear on her injured left knee.

Since the season-opener on Aug. 26, the psychology major has accumulated a 0.95 goals-against average and has blocked 67 of the 137 shots she's seen.

UMass' leading scorer, junior forward Britt Canfield, says all of Walker's teammates recognize and appreciate her consistent dominance in goal, calling her the "backbone" of the team.

However, this dependable leadership is all that UMass coach Jim Rudy expected from the New Jersey native when he first bumped her up to starter at the beginning of the 2004 season.

"[Walker is] a very solid keeper who has a calming influence of defense," Rudy commented.

Walker, along with Massachusetts football player Brandon London, was recently named Co-Athlete of the Week. Both athletes were the guests of honor yesterday at the UMass Sports Luncheon.

Villarroel and Barrett: Old Reliables

Last weekend's heroics were provided by junior midfielder Jenny Roehrig and senior co-captains Nadia Villarroel and Stephanie Barrett.

In the 39th minute of an exciting defensive dual, Temple committed a hand-ball, setting up a UMass free kick about nine yards outside the penalty area. Barrett, a defender, stepped up and booted a 27-yard shot that went over a wall of Owl defenders and glided in just under the crossbar. It proved to be all that the Minutewomen would need, as Temple couldn't get anything going, giving the Maroon and White the win.

The previous game was just as dominating for the UMass defense, blanking St. Joe's. In the game's seventh minute, sophomore defender Melissa Toulouse launched a 50-yard pass downfield that was headed into the net by Villarroel. The goal (her fourth) ties her for second on the team with sophomore forward Vanessa Patry.

Sophomore forward Vanessa Patry is tied for second on UMass in goals (4) and points (10). She has started in all 14 games for the Minutewomen.

UMass didn't have to wait long for an insurance goal, as Roehrig punched in a goal in the 20th minute. Freshman Sydney Stoll, playing as a withdrawn center-forward, took a pass from Canfield and moved it along to Roehrig. "J-Ro" — as she is known to coaches and teammates — launched a 37-yard bomb into the upper left-hand corner.

A First Since 2001

The Minutewomen's current record gives them the most wins they've accumulated in a season since going 10-6 in 2001. Freshman Stephanie Santos, who was tragically killed in a car accident on June 9 of that year, was the team's leading scorer with seven goals and five assists for a total of 15 points.

Stoll Still to Start

Stoll is seeing a lot more action due to the season-ending injury to senior midfielder/defender Tina Rodriquez. "T-Rod" — adding to the list of UMass nicknames —tore her ACL in a 3-1 loss to La Salle.

Stoll, who has a goal and an assist on the year, has become a regular starter after Rudy made some strategic maneuvering to the positioning of his other players on the field.

Canfield Can't go Wrong

Canfield is the team's leading scorer, having recorded six goals and three assists for 15 total points. She was neutralized on Sunday by a relentless Temple defensive scheme that sent her to the grass on numerous occasions, but will be looking to rebound in next Sunday's game against Rhode Island (9-8, 5-1 A-10).

Next Sunday will also be Senior Day for the Minutewomen. The team's seniors — Barrett, Villarroel and midfielder Elizabeth Weinstein will all be honored prior to the season's home finale and thanked for their priceless contributions to UMass soccer.

Freshman forward Sydney Stoll is getting more playing time in order to fill the injury void left by Tina Rodriguez. She has one goal and one assist.

Sports Fact of the Day

Martin Brodeur became the third goaltender in NHL history to reach the 450-win mark in the Devils' 2-1 win over the Penguins last night. The 34-year-old joins Patrick Roy (551) and Ed Belfour (457).

Engineering students hope to vend seatbelt

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

The group of engineering students at the University of Massachusetts who designed and constructed a portable seatbelt as part of a required engineering course last semester, are planning to eventually market the device as a finished product.

Clint Walton and Josh Doolittle, both juniors and mechanical engineering students, plan to continue refining the device as part of an independent study in the spring semester, and both see a final product as a very real goal.

"Everyday it looks like a [more] realistic goal that we will have a product on the market," said Sundar Krishnamurty, a professor in the Mechanical and Industrial Engineering Department.

Krishnamurty teaches the Assistive Technologies course, where students are expected to work on projects that are aimed towards helping people and society. Doolittle and Walton, along with fellow student Ronald Leung, created the device as one of seven groups in the class last semester competing to see which could come up with the best design for a portable seatbelt.

The project began as part of a collaboration between Krishnamurty and the Sara's Wish Foundation, a philanthropic organization founded by Anne Schewe and Charles Schewe, a business professor at the Isenberg School of Management at UMass. The foundation, created after the death of Charles and Anne's daughter, Sara, in a bus accident in India, is aimed at making overseas travel safer for students by raising awareness, according to the foundation's Web site.

"There will be more work on this and other students will be involved," Krishnamurty said. "We will possibly be working with Charles Schewe's management students. We will be recruiting people as we need as we go along."

Improvements upon the design of the device and analyzing the marketing needs are both areas that must be first addressed before any final product can be finished, according to Krishnamurty.

"We are definitely going to improve upon this design. It is going to be the main theme of our future work," Doolittle said.

"We've already come up on ideas for making it more light weight for starters," said Walton.

Both plan on applying a higher level of engineering to the design to improve the safety and performance of the device. Making any product cost-effective and reflective of customer needs is high on their priority list.

"We do not want it to be a luxury, we want it to be a commodity," Walton said.

Any final product would have to be under $25, according to both Doolittle and Walton.

The target group of the product would be students traveling abroad are the, according to Krishnamurty, meaning that the device would have to be affordable and convenient to students.

Walton said that it would take at least another year of work before they would be anywhere close to a final product, but could not say when for sure it would be finished.

"It is a pretty open time frame," Doolittle said. "We are still going through school, and there is more involved. It is bigger than just us."

"We are not looking at time," Krishnamurty said. "We are looking for perfection."

Assistive Technologies is offered every semester for mechanical and industrial engineering students and aims at preparing students for real life work. Using the success of the device to attract prospective engineering schools is just one possible positive effect of the project, according to Krishnamurty.

"I am sure that this will become a signature project to illustrate what students can do and how far they can go," he said.

UM Boston turns tennis courts into parking lot

By Jesse Solomon
(UMass Boston)
Collegian Guest Writer

BOSTON—UMass Boston's eight tennis courts were sacrificed over the summer to meet the campus's urgent need for parking.

In place of where the 1.3 acre courts have stood for over two decades is a parking lot that sports roughly 170 spaces and is ironically named Beacons Lot A, in tribute to the campus's sports teams and mascot.

The events that led to the tennis court's termination and the resignation of the men's and women's tennis coach, unfolded after the main garage was ordered closed on July 19th. Several emergency parking meetings, attended by high ranking administrators, took place this past July through September to address strategies for parking relocation. None of the six campus officials who were contacted for this story responded.

One athletics official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said his department didn't have much of a say on the matter. He did recall how the "Administration & Finance Office basically drew up a map of possible [recreational] sites that could be turned into parking and advised Athletics to choose which site they could best handle losing."

The decision to turn the tennis courts into parking lots lacked student feedback, even though university governing policies exist to afford them "opportunities to express input in major infrastructure matters."

One such policy is the UMass Board of Trustees document — T 73-098 — that states, "Students have the right, and privilege of advising on policies affecting the University [and] students will have primary responsibility for services and activities that are designed primarily to serve students or are primarily financed by students."

Tennis, like other on-campus recreational activities, is partly student-funded by a mandatory Athletics Fee of $88.50.

Athletics & Recreation Vice Chancellor Charlie Titus stated, "Students were not involved in the decision about the tennis courts."

"There simply wasn't enough time at that point in the summer to get input from student leaders," said Titus.

According to Titus, an arrangement has since been made with neighboring Boston College High School that would enable the women's tennis team to play their fall season on the high school's five courts.

BC High Athletics director John Bartlett confirmed that arrangement. It is still uncertain where exactly the UMB men's tennis team will play, since their season will conflict with BC High's tennis season in the spring.

Student Senator and Trustee, Alex Kulenovic, who attended the last two emergency parking meetings, indicated that the decision to gut the courts occurred in earlier meetings that he did not attend.

"It was also a temporary measure that will hopefully be reversed soon," Kulenovic asserted. Such sentiments may be wishful thinking, however, a revised Parking & Transportation pamphlet, listing the locations and types of parking, does not classify Beacons Lot A as a temporary lot as it does with others.

While Kulenovic was unaware of the BC High arrangement, he said it would be nice of BC High to allow local residents to use their too, like UMB had done. As to whether the $88.50 mandatory Athletics Fee should be lowered to reflect the loss of an on-campus recreational activity, Kulenovic replied, "If students want to pursue this matter, than their student government should hear them out."

Student Senate President Mike Metzger stated by email that his main concern about the parking relocation was to see as many students park on campus as possible." While not commenting on the loss of the tennis courts, Metzger did commend the efforts of the Administration & Finance Office's team for responding to the parking shortage in such a short time frame.

The embattled Beacons tennis teams have struggled in recent Court: groups must offer contraceptives

By Michael Gormley
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y.—New York's highest court ruled Thursday that social service agencies run by the Roman Catholic Church and other faiths must provide birth-control coverage to their employees, even if they consider contraception a sin.

The 6-0 decision by the Court of Appeals hinged on whether Catholic Charities and the nine other groups are essentially social service agencies, not churches.

At issue was a 2002 state law that requires employers to provide health insurance coverage for mammograms, bone density screening and other preventive services for women, including prescription contraceptives. The law exempts churches, seminaries and other institutions with a mainly religious mission.

Catholic Charities and the other groups sued the state for an exemption but lost in the lower courts.

The organizations "believe contraception to be sinful," the Court of Appeals said. "We must weigh against (their) interests in adhering to the tenets of their faith the state's substantial interest in fostering equality between the sexes, and in providing women with better health care."

The New York Catholic Conference said it may appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We think this has never really been about contraception. We think it was to target the church and open the door for coverage of abortion," said Dennis Poust, spokesman for the Catholic conference.

Kelli Conlin, president of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, said the ruling "shows that no one is above the law, including the Catholic bishops."

The New York court said the fact that the organizations hire employees outside their faith was a critical factor and that they deserve the rights sought under the law.

Seven plead guilty in corpse plundering case

By Tom Hays
Associated Press

NEW YORK—Seven funeral home directors linked to a scheme to plunder corpses and sell the body parts for transplants pleaded guilty to undisclosed charges and have agreed to cooperate with investigators, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

The unidentified directors secretly pleaded guilty in the probe of what investigators say was a plot to harvest bone and tissue and sell it to biomedical supply companies, Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said.

"It is clear that many more funeral home directors were involved in this enterprise," Hynes said at a news conference.

The seven entered their pleas in closed courtrooms and their names were withheld, but defense attorneys said that among those cooperating was the director of a funeral home that took parts from the body of "Masterpiece Theatre" host Alistair Cooke, who died in 2004.

The four original defendants in the case pleaded not guilty on Wednesday to enterprise corruption, body stealing and other charges in the new indictment. If convicted, they face up to 25 years in prison. All remain free on bail.

Prosecutors allege Michael Mastromarino, owner of Biomedical Tissue Services of Fort Lee, N.J., and three other men secretly removed skin, bone and other parts from up to 1,000 bodies from funeral homes, without the permission of families. They have accused the former oral surgeon of making millions of dollars by selling the stolen tissue to biomedical companies that supply material for common procedures including dental implants and hip replacements.

They were charged in February with counts including body stealing, unlawful dissection and forgery in a case a district attorney called "something out of a cheap horror movie."

All the defendants pleaded not guilty before being released on bail.

At the time, prosecutors said they had unearthed evidence that death certificates and other paperwork were falsified. In Cooke's case, his age was recorded as 85 rather than 95 and the cause of death was listed as heart attack instead of lung cancer that had spread to his bones.

Other evidence includes X-rays and photos of exhumed cadavers show that where leg bones should have been, someone had inserted white plastic pipes — the kind used for home plumbing projects, available at any hardware store. The pipes were crudely reconnected to hip and ankle bones with screws before the legs were sewn back up.

Assistant District Attorney Josh Hanshaft holds a photograph of an X-ray showing the pelvic area of a deceased person with PVC plumbing pipe inserted where bones should have been, at a news conference in New York.

California law stops renting to illegal immigrants

Day laborers wait for prospective employers to arrive at a day labor hiring area in southern California. Authorities in a California city are set to vote on a bill to prohibit landlords from renting to illegal immigrants.

ESCONDIDO, Calif.—City leaders have approved an ordinance prohibiting landlords from renting to illegal immigrants, the latest in one of many efforts by local governments across the country to crack down on undocumented workers.

More than 100 police officers and sheriff's deputies in riot gear were on hand for the 3-2 vote Wednesday. After the measure was approved, one person ran outside the council chamber and yelled, "The USA wins!" prompting opponents and supporters gathered on the lawn to shout at each other for 30 minutes. Police said no arrests were made.

The American Civil Liberties Union has indicated it will go to court to block implementation of the ordinance, set to take effect Nov. 18.

Councilman Sam Abed, who supported the measure, said it will improve the city's image and reputation, "and certainly our quality of life."

Mayor Lori Holt Pfeiler and Councilman Ron Newman, the two no votes, said the ordinance would create new problems for Escondido, a city 30 miles northwest of San Diego. Hispanics make up 42 percent of Escondido's 142,000 residents.

Pfeiler said everyone agrees illegal immigration is a problem, but the ordinance "is going to have neighbor against neighbor."

Under the law, landlords will be required to submit documentation of their tenants' immigration status to the city, which will then submit the information to the federal government for verification.

If tenants are found to be illegal immigrants, landlords would be given 10 days to evict them or face suspension of their business license. Repeat offenders could face misdemeanor charges and fines.

Mystery surrounds dismemberment case

BY BECKY BOHRER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS—After one last drink on the roof of the classy Omni Royal Orleans hotel, Zackery Bowen was ready to reveal the secret he had apparently been hiding in his French Quarter flat for nearly two weeks.

In his pocket, he had a note with directions to the one-bedroom apartment where he said police would find the remains of his dismembered girlfriend. Drink in hand, after the Caribbean music had died down for the night, Bowen disappeared from view of the rooftop surveillance camera, according to a hotel spokesman, Don Zimmer. Then he leapt to his death, leaving more questions than he'd answered.

Police spokesman Anthony Cannatella said the note indicated Bowen had killed his girlfriend after a fight Oct. 5 by strangling her and cutting up her body. After discovering Bowen's body Tuesday night, police said they found a woman's remains — a charred head, legs and arms, and a torso — in a bag in the apartment's refrigerator.

While police haven't identified the woman, Det. Ronald Ruiz confirmed authorities were looking for Bowen's girlfriend, Adriane Hall.

Bowen apparently lived it up in the days before committing suicide, according to a report in The Times-Picayune newspaper. Quoting a second note found in the apartment, the newspaper said Bowen wrote, "I scared myself not by the action of calmly strangling the woman I've loved for one and a half years ... but by my entire lack of remorse."

Bowen wrote he had $1,500 in cash and spent it lavishly before killing himself, according to the newspaper. "So that's what I did: good food, good drugs, good strippers, good friends and any loose ends I may have had."

Police Capt. Joseph Waguespack wouldn't confirm the existence of a second note, and police refused to confirm excerpts from the suicide note, citing an ongoing investigation.

Some of those who knew Bowen, 28, remembered him as an outgoing bartender who'd had an on-again, off-again relationship with Hall. Police say Bowen also had an estranged wife, for whom he left a contact number.

Hall and Bowen were often profiled in media stories following Hurricane Katrina as die-hard residents who stubbornly refused to leave their adopted home in the French Quarter. Friends said that they occasionally fought, but that it seemed as if they were in love.

"I'd seen them have little arguments at the bar before, but the last times I'd seen them, it was totally different," said Eura Jones, who worked with Hall at the Spotted Cat. "He came in here, brought her a dozen roses and kissed her and loved her."

Jones said she remembers Hall last showing up for work at the bar Sept. 27, the Wednesday after the Saints' Monday night football game. She said that while it was strange for Hall not to show up for work, Jones wasn't worried: She said Hall was reachable by cell but sometimes would forget to buy extra talk time.

Leo Watermeier, the owner of the apartment where the couple lived, said his first impression was that Hall was "the boss." He said he last saw her Oct. 5, four days after the couple put down a deposit on the $750-a-month, recently renovated apartment above a voodoo shop. Later that day, Watermeier said Bowen called him, upset, saying the woman was kicking him out.

Watermeier said Hall told him Bowen was cheating on her.

"Whether that's true, she seemed to believe it, for sure," he said.

Holly Jacker, a bartender at Buffa's, said Bowen was at the dimly lit joint Sunday, two days before he leapt from the roof of the luxury hotel where he once tended bar. A regular said she saw him there, eating and drinking.

On Tuesday, police found his body and the remains in the apartment, leaving them to piece together what happened and acquaintances with dozens of questions.

"I'm having a hard time reconciling the person I remember with the person who did this," said Tim Eskew, manager of a bike shop frequented by Bowen, who delivered groceries by bicycle.

Miriam Chamani sits in her spiritual room in the French Quarter of New Orleans, where a suicide jumper led police to the body of his murdered girlfriend.

Texas death row inmate commits suicide before execution

Michael Johnson, who was scheduled for execution at the Texas prison in Huntsville, yesterday, was found dead in a pool of blood in his jail cell.

LIVINGSTON, Texas—A convicted killer facing lethal injection beat the executioner to it Thursday, committing suicide by slitting his throat and arm with a blade in his Texas death row cell 15 hours before he was supposed to die.

Michael Dewayne Johnson, 29, was found in a pool of blood by officers making routine checks on him every 15 minutes, authorities said. He was pronounced dead at a hospital.

Johnson apparently scrawled words in blood on the wall of his cell, but prison officials would not say what he wrote.

He is at least the seventh condemned man in Texas to take his own life since death row reopened in 1974.

No other prisoner has killed himself so close to his scheduled execution time. In 1999, a death row inmate took an overdose of prescription drugs. He was hospitalized, and then executed two days later.

Johnson had been set to die for the 1995 slaying of Jeff Wetterman, 27, gunned down at his family-run gasoline station and convenience store near Waco.

Prison system spokeswoman Michelle Lyons said that 15 minutes before Johnson was discovered, he was talking to the staff and awaiting breakfast, and gave no indication he was contemplating suicide.

He used a sharp piece of metal attached to what looked like a wooden Popsicle stick, Lyons said.

It was unclear if the cutting edge was a razor blade or a sharpened piece of metal, or where he got it, authorities said. Some inmates are allowed to check out a razor blade to shave but must return it to a guard when they are finished, Lyons said.

Besides the routine 15-minute checks that begin for inmates 36 hours before their execution, officers on death row in Texas routinely search the prisoner's cell every 72 hours for contraband.

Johnson would have been the 22nd Texas inmate executed this year. The state has 390 people on death row.

Johnson's appeal was before the U.S. Supreme Court, which rejected a plea from him last week.

His lawyer, Greg White, said he had seen no indication that the condemned man was despondent.

"I've never seen him not in good spirits," White said. "I'm not trained in those things, but just from a common person's standpoint, we just never had conversation that he was near the end and 'I'm doomed' and any of that kind of stuff."

Scientists create cloak of invisibility

BY RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—Scientists are boldly going where only fiction has gone before — to develop a Cloak of Invisibility. It isn't quite ready to hide a Romulan space ship from Capt. James T. Kirk or to disguise Harry Potter, but it is a significant start and could show the way to more sophisticated designs.

In this first successful experiment, researchers from the United States and England were able to cloak a copper cylinder.

It's like a mirage, where heat causes the bending of light rays and cloaks the road ahead behind an image of the sky.

"We have built an artificial mirage that can hide something from would-be observers in any direction," said cloak designer David Schurig, a research associate in Duke University's electrical and computer engineering department.

For their first attempt, the researchers designed a cloak that prevents microwaves from detecting objects. Like light and radar waves, microwaves usually bounce off objects, making them visible to instruments and creating a shadow that can be detected.

Cloaking used special materials to deflect radar or light or other waves around an object, like water flowing around a smooth rock in a stream. It differs from stealth technology, which does not make an aircraft invisible but reduces the cross-section available to radar, making it hard to track.

The cloaking of a cylinder from microwaves comes just five months after Schurig and colleagues published their theory that it should be possible. Their work is reported in a paper in Friday's issue of the journal Science.

"We did this work very quickly... and that led to a cloak that is not optimal," said co-author David R. Smith, also of Duke. "We know how to make a much better one."

The first working cloak was in only two dimensions and did cast a small shadow, Smith said. The next step is to go for three dimensions and to eliminate any shadow.

Viewers can see things because objects scatter the light that strikes them, reflecting some of it back to the eye.

"The cloak reduces both an object's reflection and its shadow, either of which would enable its detection," Smith said.

The cloak is made of metamaterials, which are mixtures of metal and circuit board materials such as ceramic, Teflon or fiber composite.

In an ideal situation, the cloak and the item it is hiding would be invisible. An observer would see whatever is beyond them, with no evidence the cloaked item exists.

"Since we do not have a perfect cloak at this point, there is some reflection and some shadow, meaning that the background would still be visible just darkened somewhat... we now just need to improve the performance of cloaking structures."

The research was supported by the Intelligence Community Postdoctoral Research Fellowship Program and the United Kingdom Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council.

A cloak of invisibility, shown above, deflects microwave beams so they flow around a 'hidden' object inside with little distortion, making it appear almost as if nothing were there at all.

Study: some preschoolers can use Ritalin

BY LINDSEY TANNER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO—The first long-term government study of preschoolers who take Ritalin, the popular attention deficit disorder drug, warns of side effects but also found benefits in children with severe problems.

The drug isn't approved for use in children under age 6, and the researchers said those youngsters need close monitoring. Preschoolers are more likely than older children to develop side effects, experts said.

The research was done because of concerns over reports that soaring numbers of very young children are being given psychiatric drugs, including Ritalin.

The study's message is, proceed with caution, said Dr. Thomas Insel, director of the National Institute of Mental Health.

"We're not talking about fidgety 3-year-olds," said Insel, whose agency funded the study.

The research involved children with severe cases of attention deficit hyperactivity disorder — cases that included banging from ceiling fans, jumping off slides or playing with fire. The researchers say the benefits of low-dose treatment outweigh the risks for these youngsters. But critics disputed that.

"I hope publication of this does not lead to more overprescribing," said Dr. Sidney Wolfe of the watchdog group Public Citizen. "The safety isn't adequately established, the efficacy even less."

About 40 percent of children developed side effects and roughly 11 percent dropped out because of problems including irritability, weight loss, insomnia and slowed growth.

Preschoolers on methylphenidate, or generic Ritalin, grew about half an inch less and gained about 2 pounds less than expected during the 70-week study.

"This is a catastrophe. It just opens up the way for drugging the younger kids," said Dr. Peter Breggin, a New York psychiatrist and longtime critic of psychiatric drug use in children.

Breggin said the research is part of a marketing push by the drug industry to expand drug use to the youngest children.

Roughly 8 percent of U.S. children have ADHD, including around 3 percent of preschoolers.

Previous research found that about 1 in 100 preschoolers had been prescribed Ritalin, which has only been approved for use in children aged 6 and older. Use in younger children is considered "off-label" but is not illegal.

Dr. David Fassler, a psychiatry professor at the University of Vermont, said the study does a good job of outlining pros and cons of Ritalin treatment in preschoolers.

"This is exactly the kind of information we need to help parents make informed decisions about treatment options for young children with ADHD," Fassler said.

The study included 10 weeks of behavioral treatment along with parent training and about one year of drug treatment. Nearly 300 families were enrolled, but many dropped out after the first phase, either because the behavior treatment worked or because they didn't want to put their children on drugs.

years for competitive wins in the Little East Conference and even for the survival of the teams themselves. In 2004 Athletics cut the entire women's team season because it lacked the players required for their first five games. As with other on-campus extracurricular activities, UMB's sports teams have struggled with maintaining student involvement at UMass's sole commuter campus.

Former men's and women's tennis coach Jim McBurnie relayed his frustrations over trying to recruit and maintain student players in the past.

"Not enough women turned out at the start of the [fall] season, and the lack of a team resulted in my decision to step away," said the coach Kristin Cirbus, who has over 12 years of instructional experience in ice hockey, is currently serving as the women's tennis coach.

Studies show that collegiate tennis has declined nationwide. In one national study, the Intercollegiate Tennis Association found that a whopping 546 men's and women's tennis teams had been eliminated throughout the U.S. over the past 10 years. Some factors the ITA found that contributed to the extinction of college tennis were "escalating costs, shrinking budgets, and tennis court's usage of valuable real estate."

When UMass Dartmouth recently experienced a need for more real estate space to build dorms, tennis courts were still given a priority. UMD Director of Athletic Facilities Jim Filippo explained that when plans commenced to build new dorms on the site of their two tennis courts, an arrangement was made to construct ten new tennis courts at a different location.

While the original costs of UMB's tennis courts was not readily available, a past Mass Media story from January 1983 cited a related price tag of $582,000 for new outdoor athletic facilities, including a track, soccer and softball fields, and the tennis courts.

According to several official campus Web sites and informational maps, the legacy of UMass Boston's tennis courts lives on, as the non-existence of the eight courts has not been updated.

Human remains found at WTC site

NEW YORK—Human remains from the World Trade Center site have been found by utility workers, a city official said Thursday.

Consolidated Edison workers found remains at the downtown Manhattan site, took them to a natural gas vehicle fueling station more than a mile to the north and then called the medical examiner's office to have them identified, office spokeswoman Ellen Borakove said.

"The remains came from down there," Borakove said, referring to the trade center site. "How they got to 29th Street and 11th Avenue, I don't know."

She said she didn't know when the remains were found. It was unclear what condition the remains were in or how complete they were.

The area was roped off Thursday, and investigators were sifting through dirt under a white tarp.

Five years after 2,749 people died in the Sept. 11 World Trade Center attacks, families of about 1,150 victims still do not know whether their loved ones' remains were recovered.

During the excavation of the 110-story twin towers, which began the evening of the attacks and lasted for nine months, about 20,000 pieces of human remains were found. The DNA in thousands of those pieces, many small enough to slip into a test tube, was too damaged by heat, humidity and time to yield matches in the many tests forensic scientists have tried over the years.

How recreational drugs affect the UMass campus

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Although the use of recreational drugs by college students has fluctuated throughout the past, more common in certain decades than others, recreational drug use has remained a problem on most college campuses.

Recreational drugs are psychoactive drugs which people use for leisure and entertainment purposes rather than for medical, work, or spiritual reasons. These drugs can range from marijuana, to cocaine, to Lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD), to valium, and can lead to addiction, severe health problems, and even death.

According to the 2004 National Household Survey on Drug Use and Health (NSDUH), 110 million Americans age 12 or older (46 percent of the population) reported illicit drug use at least once in their lifetime. NSDUH also reported that 15 percent reported drug use within the past year, and 8 percent reported drug use in the past month.

"Drugs are so common that there are bags of weed found around campus," says sophomore Sarah Froberg. She was referring to an incident that happened recently when a friend of hers found a bag of pot on the ground outside of the Franklin Dining Commons.

"They're unavoidable," added sophomore Emma Einhorn.

Marijuana is not the only drug found around campus, although it is definitely the most common. The use of drugs such as cocaine and heroine has become increasingly more common throughout college campuses. "It's mostly pot and cocaine," says junior Andrea Hoey.

The NSDUH reported in 2004 that 16.1 percent of respondents, ages 18-25, used marijuana within the last month, and 27.8 percent used marijuana within the last year. This survey also reported that 2.1 percent of respondents, ages 18-25, used cocaine within the last month, and 6.6 percent used cocaine within the last year.

The use of drugs can lead to a variety of physical and psychological problems. In July 2003 the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services reported the upward trend of emergency hospital visits from 1999 to 2002. The report stated that nationwide from 1999 to 2003, cocaine related hospital visits increased from 168, 751 to 199,198, heroine-related emergency visits increased from 82, 192 to 93,519, and marijuana related-emergency visits increased from 87, 068 to 119, 472.

Some students believe that the UMass administration does not seem to care, nor believes they are doing anything to stop the drug use on campus. "They turn a blind eye unless it becomes an excessive problem," said Hoey.

Other students disagree, saying that the administration adequately handles situations involving drugs on campus. "I think that they are trying to crack down on it more," said sophomore Karen Plevock.

The number of students who are arrested on and off campus for drug related violations has increased within the past few years. According to the UMass Police Department crime statistics, there were 104 arrests made around campus for drug violations in 2005. Of these arrests, 48 arrests were made in residence halls.

The number of arrests for drug related violations had increased 5.7 percent from 2004, when there were 98 arrests made. More noticeably there has been approximately a 64 percent increase in arrests since 2003, when 37 arrests were made.

"We have been very successful in reducing the drug traffic in and around campus. The State Police and municipal police, as well as the Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms (ATF), routinely make arrests in the community," said Mike Gargano, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Several arrests for drug related violations have already been made within the past few months of this school year. The most recent arrests reported occurred this past Sunday, and there were two.

The school has been making more arrests now than in the past because of their policy.

"At the University we have a zero tolerance policy relative to drugs," said Gargano.

There are strict punishments enforced at UMass if caught or arrested for drug related violations.

"Students who are caught using drugs or distributing drugs face suspension or expulsion. They also face criminal charges," said Gargano.

Some students have other things to say about this policy. "The punishment doesn't fit the crime," says Justin Sawyer, co-president of the Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC).

A number of students who are being caught with drugs and arrested for their use are being caught by police who perform searches within dorm rooms. One student group that is against these searches is the CRC.

The Cannabis Reform Coalition is a Registered Student Organization that was created to promote the legalization of marijuana in Massachusetts. It is already legal for medical use in 11 states, and four others have made it a misdemeanor instead of a felony.

"The government shouldn't tell people what they can put in their body," said Sawyer.

The CRC is also against the police randomly searching dorms and arresting people when in the past they would have had no right to. They actively support the cause by holding "Extravaganja" every April in the Amherst Common, which is a rally to legalize marijuana. In the past, their efforts have worked. In 2000, the CRC got enough signatures to create a ballot question in Amherst for citizens to decide whether or not possessing the drug would still be considered a criminal offense. They are hoping to do the same again in two years.

"I think that it could do well in Amherst," said Sawyer.

The CRC is not just a club for 'potheads', as it may stereotypically be perceived. On the bulletin board outside of their office in the Student Union are newspaper articles and clippings, which not only promote their organization from events that they have held in the past, but also discuss health issues which relate to cannabis research.

According to some health reports that are posted on their bulletin board, mice with tumors that are injected with cannabis drugs are able to fight off tumors.

"Marijuana is less harmful than cigarettes or alcohol. It isn't proven to cause any deaths," said Sawyer.

Even though many students here at UMass may say stereotypically that Central residence area is were you go to find drugs, it is not the only place on campus where recreational drugs can be found. Drug users can be found everywhere on campus from Sylvan residence area to Southwest residence area.

In 1999 a survey was done here at UMass by Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems (SARIS). It was reported that while 47.4 percent of respondents living in Central had used drugs within the last year, this was also reported by 40.5 percent of Southwest residents and 30 percent of Northeast residents. Approximately 21.8 percent of those living in Sylvan and 23.3 percent of those living in Orchard Hill said they used drugs within the last year.

Within this same survey, it was reported that 29.5 percent of students had used marijuana within the last month, 5.5 percent had used club drugs such as ecstasy, and 1.4 percent had used cocaine.

With the establishment of random drug testing it has become increasingly more difficult for student-athletes to participate in recreational drug activity. The National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) has banned many drugs, and has instituted random drug testing for all athletes at UMass. Although this is done mainly to check for performance enhancing drugs, it is also used to detect recreational drug use. However, despite attempts by NCAA to end athlete drug use, some athletes are able to slip through the cracks.

"If people are drinking or using to the point that it affects the team, then it is looked poorly upon by their fellow teammates," said Hoey.

Of course, not all athletes use drugs, although some teams are stereotyped to seem that way. In fact, most student athletes would not even think about using drugs because doing so may consequently get them kicked off of the team and lose any scholarship money they receive from playing the sport.

"Some athletes choose not to drink or do drugs," said Hoey.

Although only drugs are banned, many athletes choose to give up alcohol as well when they are in season. They do not want anything taking away from their performance on the field.

Many students may feel as though their use of drugs now, while they are still young, may have minimal affects on their lives as they get older. Chronic use of drugs can lead to addiction and severe medical problems. These problems include, but are not limited to, destruction of the esophagus and lungs, heart failure, hallucinations, paralysis, and death. If you would like to find out more information about drug use, and how to get treatment for drug addiction, help and resources are available through University Health Services.

Kevin Pascucci

As I walk around campus each day, going to classes and what not, I find that I am amused by observing the people around me. Whether it is someone simply walking by or someone not realizing how loud they are being while talking to their friends about personal issues, the things you see and hear throughout the day can range from hilarious to infuriating.

There seems to be one overlapping trend that I've noticed in people though, not only here on campus, but everywhere in our society that has really struck me. Everywhere you go throughout life, and no matter who you meet, it's impossible to avoid pride.

As far back as anyone can remember mankind has been plagued by this inherent character trait we all suffer from to some degree. Some of us allow it to control us more than others, but it is still sadly evident in everyone. In our day-to-day lives, the consequences of pride range from the minute to the irreparable.

Now, going back to the consequences I was talking about before, when one holds themselves above everyone else around them, that person tends to only hang out with people who hold a similar outlook on life. This segregation of hierarchy results in the formation of cliques. Anyone who survived high school knows cliques are the worst thing to ever happen to society. These cliques carry on into adulthood, whether it is at work or in our communal circles.

Some of you may be wondering what the big deal is when it comes to social niches. For starters, they cause people to miss out on meeting some great people in their lifetimes, purely because some choose to view themselves as higher beings. Then there are consequences that bare a little more weight.

According to official U.S. suicide rates compiled by the American Association of Suicidology (AAS) studies, suicide claims the lives of nearly 32,000 people per year in this country. People commit suicide for many different reasons, but often it is because nobody talked or listened to them, making that individual feel like a lesser person.

The AAS has also found that the number of people committing suicide in this country in a year's time is greater than the number of murders committed within the same period of time. That should say something to us as a society.

Throughout our past, we find pride leading not only to events such as Columbine, but also to war, racisim and many things that have plagued us as a race.

On April 20th, 1999, two students entered Columbine High School armed with guns and proceeded to kill 13 people. The discussion in the aftermath of the massacre revolved around what could have possibly caused these two social outcasts to commit such a horrible act.

In the end, the general consensus seemed to be that these two students were lonely and depressed, and in turn lashed out at the people whom they felt had rejected them. Over seven years later, we are still struggling as a society with the attitudes and hubris that ultimately led to that dark day in American history.

Throughout our past, we find pride leading not only to events such as Columbine, but also to war, racism and many other things that have plagued us as a race. Look at groups like the Ku Klux Klan and Neo-Nazis, both still alive and well in our culture. Both groups are fueled not only by hate, but by pride as well.

When I speak of pride, I am not referring to self-confidence, for I recognize the vast difference between the two. In fact, one could make an argument saying a person's lack of self-confidence is a direct result of the pride of others. Believing in one's self is important, but remembering that no one is better than anyone else is even more important.

Today, we live in a society that is all about image, and we are taught from an early age this is where we should find our worth. Whether it is the clothes we wear, the car we drive or the house we live in, we are constantly taught to judge others' worth based upon material belongings.

One would merely need to turn on the TV or the radio to see or hear this about our culture. In my generation, I see materialism at an all-time high, with the importance of societal standing becoming the highest priority in people's lives.

Humility isn't at the forefront of people's minds, but yet, it's one of the most important things people need to practice in their lives. Many of our societal problems could be solved if people just stopped to look at life from another person's perspective every once in a while. The next time you catch yourself looking down on someone, no matter what the reason may be, just remember, someone is probably looking down on you too.

Things I hate about UMass

Monica Gleberman

Everyone is always excited when they get their acceptance letter to a college. However, over time you begin to notice a pattern of things that could use some improvement on campus.

HEALTH SERVICES

It seems more like a disservice. Most students will admit they are really glad we have a health facility on campus. Nevertheless, waiting in long lines has become unavoidable.

There is usually one poor doctor working at a time. Imagine having to deal with hundreds of students constantly coming in and out all day. There just isn't enough time for these doctors, and the students suffer the consequences.

The only sensible solution would be to increase the staff, which would also eliminate the lengthy wait. The University could also assign more doctors for each shift to ease the responsibility.

PARKING SERVICES

They should allow students to park wherever they desire. Using this process makes it completely fair to everyone on campus.

TICKETS

Avoiding a ticket is hard when you can't find a parking spot. Lower Central doesn't even have its own parking lot.

Ticketing on campus is endless. A lot of times students will have their car parked somewhere on campus they shouldn't and get four tickets in the same day. What is the point of that?

Construction should be worked on throughout the summer and on weekends. It will take longer, but will accomodate the students, allowing them to walk their normal route to their classes.

Crystalyn Kasa, a junior, received a ticket because her permit peeled off her car. She taped the permit back on and got a ticket for illegal taping of the permit and was told to buy a new one. This is outrageous. Students shouldn't be required to buy a new permit because their old one fell off their car. How much money does this school need?

If there is a ticket on someone's car, they should not receive a ticket for the same thing within the same day. The police should be told if there is a ticket already on the car to leave it and come back the next day (thus allowing time for students to go to their cars). The police should then contact the student, and if nothing is done within 24 hours, then ticket them again. This would eliminate the numerous tickets given, and allow for students to have ample time to take care of the situation.

CONSTRUCTION

Does it ever stop here on campus? The school clearly doesn't realize how inconvenient the construction makes it for students. Kasa said it has made her late to class.

Shane Burke, a sophomore, agrees with Kasa adding "they are taking away all of my shortcuts."

Timothy Wu, a junior, said the construction is "going to make the campus better, so it's probably necessary."

Construction should be worked on throughout the summer and on weekends. It will take longer, but will accommodate the students, allowing them to walk their normal route to their classes.

OIT

Does it ever seem like OIT never fixes anything? Students are always buying a CD that doesn't work, downloading a program that doesn't fix anything, having their Internet turned off and even bringing it down to them and paying them to try and unsuccessfully fix it.

Angela Oais, sophomore, had numerous problems with her Internet. This isn't uncommon, some students go to OIT numerous times to get their problems fixed, and some haven't even ventured over there after hearing all the rumors.

OIT needs to hire more professionals to help take care of more serious computer problems. Hiring more professionals and fewer students will do away with numerous computer problems. Students will have to make fewer trips to OIT and will get their computers fixed a lot quicker.

THE TEXTBOOK ANNEX

The University thinks it is a good idea to have every student on campus use the Annex to buy textbooks, thus causing extremely long lines and pricey textbooks.

Mary Kociuba, a sophomore, was extremely mad this year because she paid $800 for books this semester and she could not have been the only one. Spending this kind of money on textbooks is completely ridiculous.

Amanda Peterson, a junior, said the "lines are long, and buy-back could be better. I don't like the Annex, but it is helpful to have a place on campus."

Students should get back about 90 percent of what the book cost versus the 10 percent they receive now. Once buy-back is changed, more students would opt to purchase their textbooks at the Annex knowing they aren't getting cheated out of their money.

The Textbook Annex should add even more hours during the first two weeks of school, which would give students more time to pack up their books and, hopefully, do away with long lines. All books being purchased at the Annex should also be found at all the local book stores for the same deal, that way, students have some options, and aren't all forced to go to the same place.

Students, of course, have many other complaints, like the quality of the food at the Dining Commons, the inconsistencies of the bus system, the lack of financial aid on campus and the long lines in Whitmore. UMass needs to address these issues and not just ignore the student body.

What you don't have to do in your lifetime

Brad Leibowitz

"Man, I went running with the bulls in Pamplona last year…it was an exhilarating rush, you have to do it next year." No, no I don't.

For years, through various, different, friendly conversations, I have been told about an assortment of activities I must partake in before I croak. From running away from bulls in Pamplona, to swimming with the sharks in the Caribbean, to riding across Russia on a chopper, I am quite sure before I die there are some activates which I, nor you, have to partake in.

So, here it is: the anti-life to do list. All the activities you've been told which sound incredible yet, are anything but. From partaking in a threesome, to bungee jumping, to backpacking across Europe, to reading the Bible, here are a list of a few minor events in life, which take it from me, you should steer clear of.

#1: Partake in a threesome. I did this once, and let me tell you, it was a bad idea. Being honest, most men and women in college do not claim the corner on sexual prowess. For the most part, both sexes are still in the informative years when it comes to sheet activities (and you thought you were only sent to school to learn Complex Algorithm's).

For women, think about it this way: if you girls get grossed out at the idea of being five feet away from another naked girl in a communal shower, believe me, a threesome isn't your cup of tea (if you choose to indulge, the same rules apply to the communal shower which apply to the threesome: don't drop the soap).

For men, I offer you this to ponder over: when you're in bed with one woman and you can't satisfy her fully, she gets angry. Why would you ever want to be in bed with two angry women while you're naked? I have two words for you: Lorena Bobbit. Case closed.

#2: Build your own house. It sounds romantic in an Old World, middle of the forest, lumberjack sense, but seriously, there is a reason why we have electricians and carpenters. We have those professionals to keep you from putting a nail into your hand while electrocuting yourself trying to install a circuit breaker. You're not Bob Villa building 'this old house.'

This sounds all good and dandy until you hit the far eastern block of Europe accompanied by week-old Borscht, soggy boots and enought David Hasselhoff music to make you hate Baywatch.

#3: Backpack through Europe. I know what you're saying, "but Brad, the Alps, Amsterdam and ole' Pari'." For years, American college graduates, under the guiding lights of the night sky, have trekked across the European country side with their friends as a last hoorah.

This sounds all good and dandy until you hit the far eastern block of Europe accompanied by week-old Borscht, soggy boots and enough David Hasselhoff music to make you hate Baywatch. You have two words for me, "Euro trip," and I have one for you, "Hostel."

#4: Watch "Dirty Dancing" or "Titanic" (this is for the men) with your girlfriend. Every woman I have ever met thinks "Dirty Dancing" and "Titanic" exemplify passionate romanticism. There is nothing romantic about Patrick Swayze performing an elongated dip in tight pants and a goofy dress shirt while his hair performs a triple twist.

On the note of "Titanic," any woman who loves this movie is obsessed with the notion of a man dying for her. Fellas, Jack let go because, in the end, he chose freezing to death rather than spending the rest of his life with a woman who seemingly couldn't blow a whistle to save her life. Let go fellas, skip the flicks.

#5: Read and take the Bible seriously. Yeah, I said it (someone has to). Now I know what you're saying out there, "but Brad, how can this be so? For thousands of years it has been a beacon of moral light for lost souls to follow into the loving embrace of Jesus' hug."

Alright, let me lay this out for you my interesting Christian-Judeo friends. In the course of human history more blood has been spilt, and more lives have been lost as a result of wars being fought in the name of God, than any other reason. If you look at it, God is historically the leading cause of death.

I will say that I agree with two commandments. "Thou shall not 'steal'," and, "Thou shall not kill." To me, these seem moral and just. The rest of it, man lying with man, thou shall not covet thy neighbors goods (the economy would collapse if we obeyed it), and fasting for 40 days (not to mention all the miracles) are a bunch of metaphorical gibberish. If you still don't believe me, I have two final parting words for you: Mel Gibson.

So the next time a confidant alerts you that you must run down a mountain with a giant 700 lb. boulder hot on your steps, you tell them no thanks. Tell your friend you already have a comfy house without "Dirty Dancing" or "Titanic" in its movie library, a country not to trek across and a historical religious book to laugh at.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

ELECT HEALY

Most people will agree that they believe in the American two-party political system. It keeps any one party from gaining too much power, and keeps the politicians on their toes. I recently saw a bumper sticker that read "Politicians and diapers should be changed often!" Crude, but it shows how some people have come to feel. Seriously, the two-party system is important, and needs to be protected.

In Massachusetts, the Democrats are working to put the personable Deval Patrick into governorship. Since the legislature is heavily Democratic, his election would in fact give us one-party government for a long time to come.

We need a Republican governor to balance the Democratic legislature. I have nothing against Mr. Patrick as a person, but believe that his election would hurt the two-party system. To me, electing a Republican governor therefore seems to be the primary issue in the coming election.

The Republicans' idea of how to promote themselves seems to be to have wine-and-cheese parties in the posh homes of the local elites. Voters in ordinary circumstances feel out of place at such events. For a long time the Democrats have wooed them by having ham-and-bean suppers in modest neighborhood function rooms.

It seems that both parties have not kept up with demographic changes. Descendants of immigrants are now mostly middle-class citizens living in nice suburban towns.

Many voters are unhappy with both parties. Once she is governor, Healey should give strong attention to diminishing the party's elitist image. [Christy] Mihos should be urged to lend his considerable energy to pumping new life into the GOP.

Many people vote Democratic out of family tradition. They should remember that the privacy of the voting booth allows them to cross party lines and nobody will know. But the state would benefit.

By Christina Fong

Most horror movies' downfalls result from their delving too far into explaining the big question: Why? Writers never seem to realize that the real fun comes from being scared to the point of peeing in your pants (maybe not but I wanted to make an allusion to a some- what humorous scene in the movie) with as simple an explanation as possible. The "Grudge 2" does seek to answer that same question but not enough to bore us and turn the movie into complete trash. Sometimes the unexplained makes it all the more fun.

This sequel introduces new characters, including Karen's sister, Aubrey, played by Amber Tamblyn ("Sisterhood of the Traveling Pants.") Instead of being a dragged-on continuation of Karen's story, the movie's new group of victims becomes the main focus. As if it weren't bad enough that all who so much as entered that house were doomed, the curse has now spread, terrorizing its poor victims across seas. It spreads so far as Chicago, IL, by an International High School student who's the butt of a cruel joke played by two ignorant school girls that are found in many horror movies.

Having some scenes shot in the U.S took away the original J-horror feel of "The Grudge" that added to its freshness. Watching a family being terrorized in an old Chicago apartment didn't feel quite the same as watching a family being terrorized in a modern Tokyo apartment. It felt like a morph of American-style and Japanese-style horror. It's great how Japanese directors can amp up your fear in complete daylight rather than the usual American-style haunting in the dead of night. After watching movie after movie with a bunch of mindless screaming girls (maybe I say this movie didn't have its share of those) it's good to breakaway from the shriek-induced headaches, sharp appliances, and mind-numbing amounts of gore we're all so used to.

The little blue meowing boy, and the revenge-seeking woman, which were trademark images from the original, still conduct much of the major haunting of the sequel. Takako Fuji, who plays Kayako, gives the same chilling performance as a ghost with a grudge. The snaps of Kayako's neck every time she moves and her crackling voice are creepy, but in a deliciously enjoyable way. She's becoming pretty representative of most ghosts in J-horror films. "The Grudge 2" includes some classic American horror film scenes that leave you asking, "How stupid can one person be?" Honestly, how long does it take a girl being chased by a vengeful ghost to realize running through poorly lit empty rooms isn't the best idea? Scenes like these added to some of the humor in the film. It's usually the characters' ignorance that keeps the story going for as long as it does until it finally results in their demise.

In terms of the scare factor, it wasn't bone-chilling, hair-raising, mind-boggling scary. There were the occasional twitches from scenes that built up tension and released it whenever Kayako popped out of nowhere, which were still more or less anticipated. Her face has the ability to generate slight chills that pulsate throughout your entire body. Toshio's meowing is never all too frightening, just unusual. With decades of movies that have conditioned us to be less afraid, it does become more of a challenge for writers and directors to try and get us jumping out of our seats or cause us to turn away from the screen from a scene too horrifying to watch.

I'll admit I was somewhat disappointed that there was no extremely exciting/freakish display of Kayako's revenge, although there is a scene in the dark room which is particularly well done. The climax culminates in a series of fast-paced scenes of disappearing, dying, and dead characters, but it lacks any real element of horror. Maybe I was expecting too much. The gratifying scene in the original was the climax when Kayako crawled her way, in that wonderfully grotesque way she moves, to Karen attempting to kill her.

With the end of the final scene and the rolling credits, I was left pretty satisfied, surprised even at how much I enjoyed the movie. Most horror sequels have me wishing they had just ended it with the first movie. They usually kill an already good thing. Continuing this movie complimented the first movie well. In terms of sequels, The Grudge 2 ranks high up there. If you're looking for a good scare, I doubt this will really please you. If you're looking for a movie that makes sense or has any hint of logic, you'll find yourself at a loss. If you're looking for something fun and somewhat different than the usual takes on ghosts, buy yourself a ticket soon. It looks like the string of J-horror remakes and their affects on audiences is wearing down.

Nintendo goes outside the box

By Alex Silber
Collegian Correspondent

Get ready to share the next generation gaming love. Xbox 360 fans, because the Nintendo Wii is coming to rock the world of gaming on November 19, and yes, Wii will, Wii will, rock you.

The House that Mario built isn't just releasing another gaming console that harnesses the power of the latest graphic and computing technologies — it's a revolution within the video gaming industry.

"Wii will break down that wall that separates videogame players from everybody else. Wii will put people more in touch with their games... and each other." Nintendo stated in an announcement back in April on IGN.com.

The Wii doesn't herald the most advanced graphic and processing technology — in fact it is not much more advanced technically than their current system, the Nintendo Gamecube. But don't let that stop you from looking into Nintendo's new system, because it is revolutionary in other ways. The Wii features a brand new controller that, oddly enough, resembles an ordinary remote control. The "Wii-mote" controller acts very similarly to a remote control, but with added motion detection hardware to judge movement, tilt, pitch, and depth. Such a controller can actually allow players to be in the game, much like Dance Dance Revolution with its dance pad. The possibilities with this controller are endless.

The Wii also features online capability, with what Nintendo calls WiiConnect 24. WiiConnect 24 allows the Wii to connect to the Internet via a Wi-Fi connection, much like the Nintendo DS. The online capability allows users to not only connect to games online, but power features such as a News, Weather and Wii Shop "Channels." The Opera Web browser is also available for use on Nintendo's Wii, allowing for Web surfing.

One of the most touted reasons for the Nintendo Wii to go online is for the Virtual Console Channel, a way to download retro Nintendo games from the Nintendo 64 era back down to the NES and play them all on one system. Not only does the Virtual Console Channel house retro Nintendo games, but SEGA has announced its support allowing for Genesis games to be available for download. Prices of games range from $5 to $19.99 depending on the system the game is found on.

That's enough about the features of the Wii — time to get down to the games! Nintendo definitely hasn't skimped on the software, having announced over twenty new games that will be released on launch day. Anticipated first person shooter "Red Steel," motion controlled racing game "Excite Truck," the strange but amusing "Rayman: Raving Rabbids," and a redesigned "Madden '07" will all be available on November 19 alongside games such as "Call of Duty 3" and "Super Monkey Ball: Banana Blitz." Even with those outstanding titles, the sure-fire hit of the launch will undoubtedly be "The Legend of Zelda: Twilight Princess," which has already been hailed as the "best Zelda ever" by industry insiders.

The price point of the Wii, at $249.99, makes it the least expensive next-gen console available this holiday season. Included in the Wii package is the Wii console, a single "Wii-mote" controller, and a copy of the "Wii Sports" game.

Local Randazzo Group performs

By Stephanie McPherson
Collegian Correspondent

In spring of 2005, the Leah Randazzo Group, sort of fell together. The jazz/R&B/funk band, consisting of the strong vocals of Leah Randazzo and the sextet of rhythm and horns behind her, has created driving funk melodies such as "My Weapon" and soft jazz ballads like "Turns to Grey" (both of which can be found on the group's debut record "At the Root").

At age 22, Leah Randazzo, an Amherst local, is the vocalist of the group. Having been classically trained in voice and piano, she later moved into a more "jazz oriented approach", as she puts it. She wrote her first song when she was 13, and has continued with writing her own music. For the group, Leah writes the lyrics, the melodies, and the basic chord progression, collaborating with the bassist, David Picchi, on the horn arrangements.

Playing along side Leah and David are many talented local musicians. The rhythm section consists of guitarist Andy Taylor, David Picchi on bass, and drummer Justin Annis. The horn section is made up of trumpeter Andy Smicker, Frank Newton and Joe Mayo on tenor saxophone, and trombonist Jared Johnson.

The Group released "At the Root" in late May of 2006, followed by a tour in June of 2006 that took them down to South Carolina, over to Chicago, and back to Massachusetts, playing about fifteen shows in all. The Group sold their CDs before and on the tour, and it can be found now on iTunes and CD Baby. Soon, it will be in Turn It Up stores, located in Northampton, MA, Brattleboro, VT, Keene, NH, and Easthampton, MA as a result of the group winning The Valley Advocate's Best Jazz award. CDs are also sold at the Leah Randazzo Group shows.

I was able to talk with Leah about her music and the Group.

Stephanie McPherson: Exactly what kind of music would you consider your genre?

Leah Randazzo: I'm, that's a little bit of a hard question because I think it draws from a lot of different kinds of music. I would say it's influenced by jazz but it's also soul, R&B funk kind of music. So, it has elements of jazz in it, we use a lot of jazz harmonies, but it also uses popular song form, so, it's got like verse and a chorus, and that kind of thing. But there are still little sections where there are instrumental solos which are played by jazz musicians, so we just sort of integrate a lot of that.

SM: Do you have any influences or inspirations of artists?

LR: Sure! I listen to a lot of

Kaki King headlines Sunday

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

If Kaki King wants to make one thing clear on her latest album, "...Until We Felt Red", it seems that she wants people to know she's more then just a guitar virtuoso. After two albums, including her breathtaking, original debut "Everybody Loves You", which showcased the young musician's unique percussive-based guitar work, King has finally taken the next step. While few people would hesitate to compliment King's first two albums, "...Until We Felt Red" is the first thing that truly shows her to be more then a one-dimensional player, with lush arrangements and gorgeous vocals, King has proven to be a fantastic songwriter. On Sunday she will come to the Iron Horse on her first ever full-band tour.

King's music has always had the feeling of walking-on-air. The light, dreamy qualities in her previous work relied more on her head-spinning guitar playing, which was impressive — to say the least — but never seemed like a show-off. Indeed the stripped-down approach to her early recordings made King come off as humble, and even on her latest album she appears confident, but masks it coyly. For years King was known for an incredibly expressive guitar; she never had to say a word to create colorful impressions. Her second album, "Legs To Make Us Longer" found her adding more instruments, and even an electric guitar, to the mix but it was still her two-handed, slap-and-pick guitar playing that gave the songs their identity.

But, seamlessly, one of the most talented young voices on instrumental rock made something of a pop album. This is not a 21st-century Liz Phair remodeling; King's album "...Until We Felt Red" is one of the best examples of shoegaze dream-pop in years. King and her collaborators, which include producer and Tortoise/The Sea and Cake member John McEntire, have thrown together a small army of musicians and instruments, combining acoustic, electric and electronic sounds to create a wash of sound.

And while King hasn't lost any luster on the guitar, she often prefers to let chords glide under her shimmering voice, which previous to the new album, had only made a brief cameo as an unlisted track on "Legs To Make Us Longer."

Her performance at the Iron Horse is sure to focus on the new material, although it is likely that her one-woman acoustic tracks will make an appearance. While fans of King's older material may feel left out in the cold by new latest endeavor, she certainly hasn't sold herself short; taking a big, and bold, step into new artistic terrain and succeeding with grace. Audiences looking for a unique and talented musician will find themselves welcoming King with open arms Sunday night.

Kaki King will feature The Yellow Umbrella Tour as an opener. Tickets for Sunday's performance are $15 in advance and $17 at the door.

Homecoming's Ima Robot speaks of history, influences

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Ima Robot's story is more a rock 'n' roll fairy tale than a biography. Founding members Timmy Anderson and Alex Ebert met by chance in a Hollywood night club.

"About nine years ago I moved to Hollywood hoping to start a band. Then one day at a show, I met Alex. We talked for a while and hit it off right away," Anderson said in an interview with the Daily Collegian.

The two started performing hip hop in area clubs and partying a lot. Eventually they started mixing up some punk rock into their sound and playing more shows. In the meantime, the two were still partying as much as they could.

After playing around Los Angeles and Hollywood for the next five years, the two decided it was time to straighten up their act by not partying as much and started making their sound more pop-like. But not much more.

"After five years of just playing and partying we decided to try and get signed. So we played for all the record labels we could and we decided that we should sign with Virgin," Anderson said.

After signing to Virgin Records the duo started playing with former members of Beck's backup band, Justin Meldal-Johnsen and Joey Waronker. With the band now a four piece one, their line up was complete. They started touring the country with bands such as Hot Hot Heat. Touring the country excited Anderson and Ebert.

"We love touring, getting to go out and see the country. Playing clubs every night and partying with your friends, it's great. Obviously we miss our loved ones, but touring is awesome," Anderson said.

According to Anderson, touring and performing gives him one of the biggest thrills possible. He compares it to being artists and showcasing art every night.

"Being a musician is almost the same thing as being an artist. So I use the stage name Timmy with no last name. It's very theatrical that way," Anderson said.

Last month the band released their second album "Monument to the Masses" with a new line up consisting of drummer Scott Devours and guitarist Andy Marlow. Since the release the band has been playing around the country.

To mix things up a bit this time around, the band decided to rent an RV and trailer instead of a tour bus. Anderson is driving the RV himself and also playing the role of tour manager for this tour.

"Typically when we come through here [the Northeast] we are asleep or playing video games in the back of the tour bus so this is all new sights for us. I'm driving the RV so this time I get to see all the colorful leaves. We don't get that in L.A. so it's cool to see it," Anderson said.

Anderson commented on upcoming Halloween events.

"We've never played on Halloween, but we've played The House of Blues close to Halloween. We didn't dress up, but the show was very Halloween-like. If we are playing a show on Halloween this year, we'll definitely dress this year," Anderson said.

Following their performance at homecoming Ima Robot plans to continue to tour to support their album, but as of right now their plans are still up in the air.

soul vocalists like Stevie Wonder, Aretha Franklin, Sly and the Family Stone, Al Green...more recently I've been listening to Jill Scott, Fiona Apple. I think there are a lot of good contemporary people. Earth Wind and Fire is a great band that we kind of like to emulate with our horn arrangements and stuff...what else, I mean, Carole King, Joni Mitchell...Both my parents are musicians—my father played for many years doing sort of rock/pop kind of music with Jonathon Edwards who was pretty successful in the 70s and my dad was playing bass and fiddle for him, and he was also classically trained violinist, and my mother was a classical cellist, so there's that element and the other part of it is that my dad just listened to a ton of jazz. So, I grew up with all the, you know, Miles Davis, John Coltrane, Nina Simone...she's an amazing, amazing singer—so I've been listening to jazz since a very early age.

SM: How did you get your band together?

LR: I first met the guitar player, Andy Taylor, who's an Amherst college graduate, through a bass player at Hampshire College. He asked us both to do this pickup gig at the A.B.T. playing jazz standards for Valentine's Day. It didn't end up happening because it was double booked and we didn't end up playing that night, but I actually met my guitar player through that, so it worked out quite well.

After I met Andy (Andy was playing with our drummer Justin Annis, who's a former UMass graduate) and David Picchi, the bass player, and also a couple of horn players from Amherst college in this like funk party band, and I really liked their playing, so I was like "I have some original material" and he introduced me to the bass player first, then everybody just filtered in. I found out that they had this funk band that played parties and I thought they were compatible musicians with what I was trying to do musically. I introduced them to my material and they were excited by it. It was spring of 2005, and I had this gig opening up for Judy Collins, who's a folk singer who was big in the 70s. She was playing in the park in my hometown as part of the 300th anniversary, and they wanted a local person to open for her, and so, I enticed these guys to rehearse with me and do this gig so they knew that I was taking this seriously, because I had a gig. So we got together because of that. At first it was just Andy and David and Justin and I so it was just drums guitars and vocal and then we later added horns too. Right now our horn section is great, we have Andy Smicker, he's a UMass graduate student, on trumpet, we have two tenor sax players, who we rotate with because they're both grad students and don't have a lot of time. So now we have, including myself, seven people in the band, so it's a pretty large group, with a three part rhythm section, and a three part horn section, and vocals.

SM: What are your thoughts on your record "At the Root"?

LR: Yeah, well I mean, it's a lot of work! At this point, I'm an independent artist so I'm not tied to a record label right now, so I'm currently in the process of trying to filter the record out and see if I can get it some wider distribution. But, yeah, it was big deal! I worked with a producer, Michael Gregory, so he for the most part has songs worked out so it wasn't like a band in a studio. We want ed to have a really organic, real band sound rather than, having a lot of technology and synthetics. It's just very raw. Michael was really great helping us to produce the best sound that we could. We recorded it at Northfire Recording Studios, which is actually right here in Amherst. They have an amazing facility. Yeah it was a lot of work! I mean, we spent so much time and so much money at the studio!

SM: How long exactly, did it take?

LR: The process of recording took about five days, and then there was at least another five days of mixing but, you're talking very long days in the studio at a very high cost. If you have a record label that's funding that for you, then you can take a lot more time, to have everything perfect, but for us, time is money.

We have to get it right, and get it right now so we can move on. It seems like it took a really long time because we'd go over something a hundred times trying to get it just right. But it was a really good experience. I think that was in January of 2006 and then by May I had it fully mixed and mastered, which is another whole process beyond even mixing, and duplicated, so between January and May it all got done.

SM: What are your plans for the future?

LR: Well, we have a lot of plans. The first plan is to keep gigging as much as possible. We're with a booking agent right now who is with a company called "In the Pocket Artists". We'll continue to work with him and I'm working to get us as many gigs as possible and to sell the CDs. And then beyond that, the ultimate plan is to quit my job and get this particular CD out there to get it to as many people as I possibly can, including the general public and whoever in the music industry who might be interested in helping me on my next project.

SM: Is this what you want to do with the rest of your life?

LR: Yeah! People are always asking "What's your goal." And I'm like, "My goal is to be able to survive without having any other job, just doing music." So I don't need to be super famous and rich and like, Britney Spears. I don't care. I would love to be able to just do this, and make enough money to survive. That'd really be it. That would be all that I want. To stop being a waitress someday, that'd be good.

The Leah Randazzo Group will be playing on Saturday, October 21 at the Elevens. Also playing is Ray Hendricks Revival and Tim McArthy. Doors open at 10:00 PM and the show starts at 10:30 p.m. Tickets are $7.00 and you must be 21 years or older for admission.

Minutemen must beat Rams

take his space away, he's not that dangerous. The key thing is, whoever is covering him, has to give him good coverage. We need to do everything we can to prevent him from getting the ball."

The Rams are coming off of a 3-3 draw to Brown on Wednesday. They have won six of their last eight games, and are riding a four-game unbeaten streak.

Gonsalves is no stranger to beating the Minutemen. The offensive stud scored the game-winning goal in the 86th minute of last year's A-10 opener, giving Rhode Island a 2-1 victory over UMass.

Koch thinks he has an answer.

"We must prevent them from getting into a rhythm," Koch said. "If they get into a rhythm, and are able to one-touch it and find each other, they can fool on anybody. Offensively, they can be very dangerous. Defensively, they're big, ad they're strong in the back. But they have some weaknesses that I think we can attack, and that's what we're going to go after."

UMass is coming off a 2-0 win over Temple on Sunday at Rudd Field. It was only the third game all season that the Minutemen produced more than one goal. Sophomores Prince Ofosu and Tony Bassett stepped up and gave their team some confidence heading into the stretch run.

And the timing couldn't be better.

"It certainly was a lift," Koch said on scoring two goals on Sunday. "Goals are hard to come by for us this year, so to score two was definitely rewarding, and it took a lot of pressure off us.

"The thing that's sort of funny this year is that we've had unbelievable opportunities to score goals, and we missed them," he added. "I don't think we can keep creating missed opportunities. I think they're going to go in now. It's just the law of averages. And it couldn't be a better time of the season for that to happen."

Sophomore midfielder Tony Bassett is second on the team in points with seven. He scored his third goal of the season in Sunday's 2-0 win.

UMass will need extra energy and excitement from its players, even if it means using Cirillo's homecoming as a spark.

"[Greg] is from Rhode Island, so it's homecoming for him," Koch said. "It was his birthday the other day, so it's all about timing. He's the smallest guy on the team, so it will make him feel at home. Homecoming is going to Greg's house."

And UMass will literally be going to his house. The night before they hit the field, the Minutemen will receive a home-cooked meal, thanks to one Mrs. Cirillo.

"We're having a team dinner at my house," Cirillo said. "My mom is cooking for everyone. So we're going to make the drive after we practice [tomorrow]."

The Maroon and White control its own destiny for the remainder of the regular season. It returns home next weekend to face two of the top teams in the Atlantic 10.

As for looking back on what went wrong in the second half of the year, UMass knows it must move forward, and concentrate on the tough schedule ahead.

"We need to just stay focused," Cirillo said. "We need to continue to do everything we've worked on throughout the season. That's it. We just have to stay focused and have fun.

"Our defense is the number one concern," he added. "We just have to play defense and the goals will come. We'll get our chances, but the defense comes first. And with that it gives us opportunities to score."

The Minutemen have had plenty of opportunities to score this season, and will need a lot more if they want to defeat a high-scoring Rhode Island offense on Sunday.

Stony Brook to face UM men and women

ing into tomorrow's meet. Their overall depth should be enough to propel them to victory.

"We have a lot more depth than they do," Yarworth said. "So we should be all right."

The men's diving team also looks sharp for Saturday. It was inactive at last weekend's invitational and is excited for its season debut.

"They've been sick of practice all week," UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon said. "They just want to be [at the meet]."

Junior Reuben Rappe swept the men's diving events at least year's matchup with Stony Brook, and this trend should continue because he has progressed from last year.

Hixon hopes sophomore Matt Hall will also make an impact at the meet. Like the swim team, these meets are more of a tune-up for February.

"We're not really good divers right now," Hixon said. "And I really don't want them to be until January so they don't peak too soon."

The UMass women's diving team also looks fit. Sophomore Karen Upperco won both the one and three-meter diving events at Stony Brook last season.

The UMass women's swimming team faired well against the Seawolves in last year's meet.

Sophomore Taryn Prout spearheaded the Minutewomen's assault on Stony Brook. She won the 1,000-yard freestyle and the 500-yard freestyle. She also contributed to the 200-yard team relay, swimming the freestyle leg.

UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb sees the Stony Brook meet as the team's first real test and was happy with what he saw in Connecticut.

"The biggest thing is that a lot of the first-meet jitters are out of the way," Newcomb said. "Everybody showed me something in some way. I was pleased."

Cecelia Jenkins' performance went a long way to impress Newcomb. She didn't win an individual event at UConn, but her second-place finish in the 50-yard freestyle – with a time of 25.37 – proves to be a great place for her to start.

Senior Liz Lovejoy had a great day as well. The captain competed in four events, winning the 100-yard freestyle – coming in at :59.16. She didn't finish worse than third in any of her other events.

The UMass swim teams hope to open their season properly this weekend. Stony Brook is certainly not a program of the same caliber, but UMass knows not to take them lightly.

"I don't make predictions," Yarworth said. "But am I confident? Yeah. I'm confident. That's why all those numbers are up there."

Lawsuit filed against Penguins' Malkin

By Larry Neumeister
Associated Press

NEW YORK – A Russian hockey club filed an antitrust lawsuit Thursday against the NHL and the Pittsburgh Penguins, saying rookie Evgeni Malkin shouldn't be allowed to play in the league because he remains under contract in his native country.

The Metallurg Magnitogorsk hockey club, which filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, also demanded unspecified damages from the NHL and the Penguins over Malkin's deal to jump teams this summer.

NHL spokesman Frank Brown said he hadn't seen a copy of the complaint and couldn't comment. Penguins spokesman Tom McMillan said the team hadn't received the lawsuit and doesn't comment on litigation.

The 20-year-old Malkin left the Russian Super League team during August's training camp in Helsinki, Finland, slipping quietly into the United States to begin his NHL career. In his debut Wednesday night, Malkin scored his team's lone goal in a 2-1 loss to the New Jersey Devils.

Malkin was under contract for another year in Russia. The NHL had previously said the league believes any player should have the right to choose where he wants to play as long as he is legally free to do so.

After Malkin left his Russian team, he cited a Russian labor law that permits an employee to leave a job by giving two weeks notice.

The lawsuit, filed after a Russian arbitration panel ruled that Malkin is still under contract to Magnitogorsk, said the signing of Malkin to an NHL contract was a "blatant and deliberate tampering and interference" with the Russian team's existing agreement.

In the lawsuit, the team said the Penguins knew or should have known that Malkin was under contract to a Russian team when they signed him. The lawsuit said the NHL and the Penguins violated antitrust laws by conspiring in a group boycott and refusing to deal with Russian hockey clubs regarding player transfers.

Malkin and Magnitogorsk signed a one-year contract on Aug. 7, calling for Malkin to receive $3.45 million, according to the lawsuit.

It said the contract was negotiated and signed in the presence of Malkin's Russian agent and his parents, and provided favorable terms allowing him to become a free agent a year sooner than an earlier contract.

Malkin, the No. 2 pick in the 2006 NHL draft, missed the early part of the NHL season after dislocating a shoulder in his first preseason game.

The lawsuit said the NHL and its clubs have "decided to play hardball" with Russian hockey clubs to punish them for the Russian Ice Hockey Federation's rejection of a new general agreement governing the transfer of foreign players to the NHL.

A Russian hockey club filed a lawsuit against Pittsburgh Penguins' rookie Evgeni Malkin. Malkin left his Russian team for the NHL in August.

Minutemen face must-win scenario

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There is no way the Massachusetts men's soccer team could have imagined this. After a 6-0-1 start to the season, the Minutemen find themselves out of the playoff scenario for the time being.

UMass (8-5-3, 2-3-1 Atlantic 10) is now in a must-win situation for the remainder of the season. With three games left, the Minutemen control their own destiny against three of the top four teams in the conference.

"We're in seventh place, so we have to move up to sixth," UMass coach Sam Koch said on his team's postseason chances. "We can't rely on other teams to beat other teams. We have to win our games. If we win our three games, then I think we're in. There's no guarantee of that, but I would be very surprised.

"If we don't win all three, then we have to rely on other people to do some work for us, and I don't want to do that."

The Maroon and White travels to Rhode Island to take on the Rams (8-4-4, 5-1 A-10) at 1 p.m. on Sunday, escaping what usually is a hectic Homecoming Weekend at UMass.

"It's a traditional rivalry," Koch said. "It's a game that we look forward to every year in the Atlantic 10. And no matter what, it's going to be a great game. [Rhode Island] is talented. They are, man-for-man, very good. We know that, and now we have to do what we have to do."

Rhode Island is in first place in the A-10, and leads the conference in shots (236), points (86), and goals (29). The Rams are led by their senior goal-scorer Jeffrey Gonsalves. Gonsalves is one of the top goal scorers in the country, and is the A-10's leading scorer. He has scored 14 goals in 16 games this season, which is eight more than the next closest player on the league leaderboard.

And how do you stop such a player from taking over a game?

"We were thinking of maybe taking our goal away before the game so he doesn't have a goal to shoot at," Koch said jokingly. "But I'm not sure they'll let us do that since we're on the road.

"We're going to be aware of him," he said. "We just have to take his space away because when he has space to play, he's very dangerous. But when you

Junior Greg Cirillo returns to his home state of Rhode Island this weekend when the Minutemen face the Rams on Sunday. He leads the team in assists with four.

Cirillo gets his own personal homecoming

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While Homecoming Weekend takes place at UMass, the Massachusetts men's soccer team travels to the Ocean State for a must-win game against Rhode Island. Minutemen junior forward Greg Cirillo doesn't care. It is his own personal homecoming.

The speedy playmaker for UMass hails from Rhode Island, where he and his team are fighting to survive what has been a roller coaster ride of a season. He resides in the town of Warren, which is approximately 45 minutes away from URI. And needless to say, he's pumped up.

"It feels great [to play at Rhode Island]," Cirillo said. "It's always fun to go down there and play in front of my family and friends. I'll definitely be more energized. I'll be excited and ready to go. It's just going to be an exciting day."

And he's been a Ram before. Prior to UMass, Cirillo played four seasons for LaSalle Academy in Providence, R.I., where he led his Rams to four consecutive state championships (2000-03).

Cirillo admits he looked at going to URI when preparing for college, but coach Sam Koch and the UMass soccer program were able to reel him in.

Cirillo leads the team in assists with four on the year. While he has yet to put one in the net this season, his two career goals are both game winners.

Home finale for Minutewomen

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (10-4, 4-2 A-10) looks to extend its three-game winning streak when it hosts Rhode Island (9-8, 5-1 A-10) on Sunday in the home finale.

The Minutewomen have lost their last two contests against the Rams and are anxious to put a stop to the trend. To do so, however, they will need to neutralize some URI players that have carried its team to first place in the Atlantic 10 standings.

Junior forward Deb Nelson is Rhode Island's leading scorer with nine goals, including two in a loss to Brown University on Wednesday. The Ponaganset, R.I. native has also added four assists for a total of 22 points this season.

The runner-up in the point category is a graduate student. Her name is Amy Cochran, but anyone associated with UMass soccer will forever refer to her as the one that got away. Cochran had appeared as if she would transfer to UMass from Vermont, but opted for URI at the last minute, much to the shock and disappointment of UMass coach Jim Rudy.

"She has played some up front and sometimes she plays as a very deep midfielder – something we call a holding midfielder," Rudy said. "She can score goals. If you let her open, she's going to score."

Two of the team's better players happen to both come from Iceland. The two midfielders, Thorunn Jonsdottir and Dora Larusdottir, hail from Reykjavik, the capital of their native country.

Jonsdottir is a junior and has registered two goals and six assists for a combined 10 points on the year, while Larusdottir – a sophomore – has three goals for six points.

"They play in the European style," Rudy said of the two Icelandic players. "They're very creative, technical as heck, and they're a real package to deal with out of the midfield."

Freshman Amanda Brown has been starting between the posts for the Rams since their game on Sept. 8 – a 1-0 loss versus Wisconsin-Milwaukee, leaving classmates Jackie Fede and Danielle vanVicrssen on the bench.

"She has done admirably for them," Rudy said.

Brown has seen just over 1,100 minutes during which she has a 7-5 record with 72 saves allowed, 58 saves and a .773 saves percentage.

Putting one past the freshman netminder will be a tall order, but Rudy is confident that his players are up to the task, with junior Britt Canfield being first in line.

Canfield is the Maroon and White's leading scorer, having tallied six goals and three assists for a total of 15 points.

She has been very quiet in the last two games, but Rudy thinks that is all about to change.

"I think she'll come around," Rudy said. "Britt's been a little beat up and we've played on some unusual surfaces, and she's just had a string of bad luck, which often can happen."

Rudy compared it to a baseball player who falls into a hitting slump – even though the batter hits the ball hard, it fails to find any holes.

Another primetime player who has been silenced by the opposition lately is sophomore Vanessa Patry.

But, once again, Rudy is not worried.

"I think she's going to have to do a lot of 'grafting'," Rudy mentioned. "Which means just hard work and winning balls. We changed her from mostly being a creative attacker to a full-fledged midfielder, with all the responsibilities that go with it."

Junior midfielder Jenny Roehrig and senior co-captains Nadia Villarroel and Stephanie Barrett provided the dramatics last week.

In Friday's 2-0 win over Saint Joseph's, Villarroel and Roehrig scored the game's go-ahead and insurance goals in the game's eighth and 20th minutes, respectively.

Two days later against Temple, Barrett pocketed the matchup's lone goal in the 39th minute.

Rudy is expecting big contributions from last weekend's heroines, as well as every other member of his Minutewomen roster – all of whom he says could contribute to a win on Sunday.

"I'm just expecting [Rhode Island] is going to come here and really give it their best shot to stay in first place in the conference," Rudy said. "Right now they're in the driver's seat, and that's where we want to be. So it's going to be a matchup of two really good, equal sides. It's going to be a spectator's delight."

KASIA ZACA/COLLEGIAN

Junior midfielder Jenny Roehrig is fourth on UMass in points with six. She has two goals and two assists in 14 games for the Minutewomen.

Shea's squad has its sights set on Philly

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts field hockey team (4-12, 1-3 Atlantic 10) sets its sights on Philadelphia, where the Minutewomen look to steal two pivotal games on the road that will go a long way in deciding if UMass advances to its third consecutive Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Awaiting UMass' arrival will be two teams in the same predicament UMass finds itself in: lose one more conference game and it's more than likely you'll be sitting at home come tournament time.

The Minutewomen square off against the West Chester Golden Rams (2-13, 0-4 A-10) on Friday and will have a day off before meeting the La Salle Explorers (5-10, 1-3 A-10). The Explorers are 3-3 at home this season, while the Rams are just 1-8 at its home field.

"We're right where we figured we'd be," UMass coach Patty Shea said on the team's position in the A-10 standings. "In regards to the similarities between this season and last season, it's identical. We're in the exact same position as we were last season."

The Minutewomen are currently tied for sixth in the A-10 standings.

Shea's squad is coming off a 5-2 loss to the Richmond Spiders last Sunday, but was able to split last weekend's homestand by winning a hard fought contest over Saint Louis in a 1-0 shutout just two days before for its first conference win of the season.

"I thought in the Saint Louis game we persevered through some tough injuries," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "In the Richmond game they came out and we did a really good job of stepping up and intercepting their passes, so there are definitely a lot of positives to take out of those two games."

The first order of business will be taking care of a struggling Golden Rams squad that is desperate for a conference victory to salvage its season. West Chester has taken a dismal 88 shots and has found the back of the cage 17 times entering this weekend.

West Chester is coming off of a 5-1 loss to the Temple Owls and a shutout defeat to the St. Joseph's Hawks by a score of 5-0. The Golden Rams had eight shots combined in those two games.

UMass will not be taking the basement dwellers of A-10 field hockey lightly.

"If you don't take care of Friday there is no tomorrow," Shea said. "For you to play another day you have to win and survive. Its kind of a tournament mentality you have to have right now. There is no game you can look over. You have to win and execute right there and then and you have to remember what's important at that instant."

"They're a very young team and they're a team right now that is only in their second year of playing on a synthetic surface, so they're kind of in a transition that way," Shea said about West Chester.

Sunday's opponent has not been a defensive juggernaut this season, to say the least.

Despite a crucial 1-0 win over St. Joe's on Sunday, the Explorers overall have surrendered 226 shots on net, but remarkably, goaltender Ellen Axelsen has allowed only 31 of those shots to light up the scoreboard.

"The real challenge against La Salle will be one, emotionally, it will be one of their last home games, and second, they've played very well at home and love playing on their campus," Shea said.

"But the most difficult thing is they just converted over to a field surface so even though they now no longer play on grass, it's still a very difficult field to play on and it definitely slows the game down, which will give them home-field advantage."

UMass is 2-6 on the road this season, and has been outscored 24-17 away from Garber Field.

First official head-to-head meet for UMass

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams head south this weekend to take on the Stony Brook Seawolves.

The Minutemen and Minutewomen started the 2006-2007 campaign last Friday in Storrs, Conn. at the Connecticut Invitational. The swimmers performed very well. The divers, however, were not in action.

The Minutemen took top honors in three events. However, there was no aggregate team score for the event.

Senior Evan Swisher won both the 100-yard breaststroke and the 200-yard backstroke with times of 1:02.70 and 1:54.94, respectively.

"[Swisher] had a great preseason," UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "He's been one of the best backstrokers in the conference since he got here and he's doing a great job this year."

Sophomore Nate Bromage won the 200-yard freestyle in a time of 1:46.47. Yarworth expects Bromage to establish himself as one of the top swimmers in the conference this year.

"Nate's one of our strongest swimmers," Yarworth said. "He's going to be tough to beat in the [butterfly]."

The UMass swimmers and divers defeated Stony Brook 165-135 last October. Early season meets, like the UConn Invitational, are a chance for the coaches to test their swimmers and see exactly what they are capable of before the Atlantic 10 Championships in February.

"That's what you have to do this time of year," Yarworth said. "It's not like a ball sport where you try to win each individual game. We'd like to win the meets, we try to win the meets but we don't prepare physically to be rested for every meet. We're focused on February and the A-10 Championships."

The Stony Brook men's team is something of a mystery to Yarworth. The Seawolves' website does not have their rosters listed and some of their better swimmers were absent from the UConn invitational.

"[Stony Brook] doesn't have their new rosters posted on the Web site," Yarworth said. "I knew they had a good sprinter, but he wasn't at the Invitational."

The PGA Tour record for a single round is 59. That record is shared by Al Geiberger (1977), Chip Beck (1991), and David Duval (1999). Justin Rose missed a put yesterday that would have tied that mark. He shot a 60 in the Funai Classic at Disney.

UM prepared for majors fair

BY NATE GEIER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Faculty, staff and student representatives are preparing for the annual Majors Fair to be held Wednesday, Oct. 25 in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium and first floor area.

The different departments will man their respective booths from 5:30-7:30 p.m. with the goal of providing supplemental information to undeclared students. Current and prospective students are welcome at the event.

Students with a declared major could benefit as well. The department representatives will be prepared to tell these students about options they may not know exist at the University, according to Undergraduate Academic advisor, Regina Middleton.

"UMass is such a large University that it's hard to find out where all the resources are," said Melissa Beesley, Associate Director of Student Programming for Commonwealth College. "It's nice to have everything under one roof."

A greater deal of effort is being put toward giving the fair a more fun and festive atmosphere this year. Snacks will be available, and several drawings will be held to give away prizes to people in attendance, giving the event a more fair-like atmosphere.

"I'm going to the Majors Fair to get a better idea of everything there is to choose from," sophomore Nash Brodsky said. "I should be able to find out which major I'll be happy with."

To allow students to be more prepared, there will be different workshops held in the days prior to the fair. All workshops will take place in various rooms of the Campus Center.

The "Making Career Connections" workshops will be held Oct. 23, 24 and 25. These sessions will use computer software tools to assess differences in personalities to match these with career options. Skills, preferences and career paths are examples of things that will be addressed in these workshops to maximize students' opportunities.

There will be one workshop Oct. 25 for "Choosing a Major" held by Undergraduate Advising. Steps in choosing a major will be the main area covered in this session.

"Our main goal is to help students commit to a major," Middleton said. "By giving them these tools, we are giving them a way to explore their options further."

Although the pre-fair workshops are available to help students prepare, many of the tools are available on the Majors Fair Web site as well. By visiting www.umass.edu/advising/majorsfair.htm students can find links to several software tools for major and career assessment. Time and place information for the workshops is also available on the Web site.

The Majors Fair has been held on campus for approximately 15 years. One of the major changes this year is that the event is being held in the Campus Center instead of the Student Union Ballroom. The location of the event was changed due to too much crowding in the Ballroom.

It is understood that while the Majors Fair is an excellent chance for students to receive help in choosing a direction, it is also an important opportunity for the different departments to recruit students to their fields.

Fire causes evacuation of dorm

The fire in Van Meter residence hall at 5:20 a.m. Oct. 22, 2006 flooded the north end of the basement and left damage to the kitchen area.

BY FRANK VITALE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

At about 5:20 Sunday morning, the fire alarm went off in Van Meter, much to the displeasure of the 450 or so residents of the all-freshman dorm at the top of Central Residential Area.

According to witnesses, the fire started in the kitchen when someone left brownies in an oven. There is extensive damage in the kitchen around the area of the oven and flood damage throughout the north end of the basement.

Outside the dorm, residents endured freezing temperatures for about half an hour or so before being moved to Butterfield's basement.

There, students slept on tables, floors, chairs, heaters, even against the vending machines. Most had nothing more on than their pajamas and a sweatshirt. Those who couldn't sleep sat around and talked for about 45 minutes, at which time they were told they could return to Van Meter. The exception was the basement residents on the north end of the building.

After waiting in Butterfield for another 15 minutes, the basement residents returned to their dorms to find an inch of water in the hall and the kitchen scorched by the fire in the oven. Water damage in the dorm rooms was limited, for the most part, to wet carpets and laundry near the door.

Student responses range from annoyance to amusement. One joke likens the Van Meter residents to the Jews in the Exodus of the Old Testament, with Butterfield as the "promised land." The event even prompted the creation of a Facebook group, "I Survived the Van Meter Fire Drill From Hell."

The person responsible for leaving the brownies, (or any other food) in the oven has not been identified as of yet.

Officials from the Amherst Fire Department involved in the handling of the incident were not available for comment at press time.

North Apartments dead-zone for cell service

BY HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The four newly constructed North Apartment buildings at the University of Massachusetts have a lot to offer. Central air conditioning, two bathrooms and polished kitchen appliances are just a few features, but when the 800 North Hall residents are lounging on their new furniture, there is something they are missing out on – cell phone service.

Many students have shown signs of frustration since day one of living in the buildings. When asked how their current service was, only five of 20 interviewed students said they have very good service. These five residents all happen to live on the fifth floors of the buildings. Any student who lives on the fourth floor or lower has no more than two bars of service, whether their provider is Cingular Wireless, Verizon Wireless, Sprint Nextel or T-Mobile.

In all four buildings, students noted on the first, second, third and fourth floors, their cell phone service is nearly lost once they're in their rooms. Most phones, the students said, have about one bar of service, which often causes missed calls or dropped conversations.

"I constantly lose my calls when I am on the phone with my boyfriend," said junior Corey Ledoux. "It's very frustrating."

Other students said they can make or receive calls when they are next to a window, but otherwise need to step out into the hallway or head outside.

"If I'm not careful, just walking across my room will cause me to drop calls. In the hallways, forget it; there is usually less than one bar of reception," said Terry Fontaine, a junior. "Though sometimes I find that if I run really, really fast, I can get outside from my room (on the third floor) without losing my calls...sometimes."

The problems with cell phone service in the buildings may be due to the "location on a hill or valley," or the "building material used," a customer service representative at Verizon Wireless said.

"If it is a new building," said the representative, "the materials used may be interfering with the service, and there is really nothing that we can do about that."

Unlike the dorm rooms on campus, the North Hall buildings have drywall instead of concrete walls. This may very well be a cause of the poor cell phone service throughout the area.

FRANK VITALE/COLLEGIAN

Junior Joseph Della Malva stands on his windowsill in North Building C in order to place a phone call.

"Unfortunately, we cannot guarantee service indoors," said the Verizon representative. "However, if as long as you are outdoors, nothing should be wrong with the reception."

It looks like there isn't much anyone can do to better the situation. North Hall residents who don't live on the fifth floor will just have to get used to keeping their cell phone by a window, or take a walk outside for long, private calls.

"I have contacted both my service provider and school administrators, and nothing is yet to be done," said Pete Lomuscio, a junior. "It is extremely inconvenient."

OIT promotes cyber security on campus

BY JAMIE MASON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Security clinics have been offered throughout the month of October in the W.E.B. Du Bois Library Learning Commons for Cyber Security Awareness Month at the University of Massachusetts. Students have been able to get help with software updates, removing viruses from their computers and uploading anti-virus software onto their computers.

Dozens of computers become infected with viruses every week on the UMass campus, said the OIT help desk manager, Andrew Vernon.

This is the first year OIT and UMass have participated in the National Cyber Security Awareness Month, a national initiative to promote the public's awareness of computer security.

"OIT wanted to make sure that cyber security would come into the spotlight on campus" said Vernon.

Kerry Shaw, the Web Communications Manager said, "Computer security is not as complex as it seems and can be prevented by doing very simple things. The clinics are provided to teach people how to do it."

There are two main ways to keep your computer secure.

"The first is running operating system updates and the second is installing virus software" said Vernon.

Elliott McClinton, a staff member of OIT software support said, "It is important to know how to keep your computer secure while on a wireless network. If your Windows operating system isn't up-to-date and someone on the network has a virus, you can get it just by connecting to the network."

On Oct. 30 OIT is having a panel discussion about Cyber Security. This discussion is open to the entire UMass community, and will feature speakers from a range of services. Student Legal Services will speak about copyright violations and lawsuits, which have been brought against students for violating copyright regulations.

Dunkin' Donuts to expand in South

BY BETH RUCKER

FRANKLIN, Tenn. When asked how he got his own Dunkin' Donut store, Joe Rando holds up the afternoon cup of coffee he's just poured for himself.

"Lifelong Dunkin' fanatic," he said.

When the Maine native moved South with his former company to the Nashville area a couple years ago, he found he had to do without his favorite treat.

"I sort of woke up one morning and said, 'There aren't any Dunkin' Donuts here. Why is that?' So I made a phone call," Rando said.

From its first store in Quincy, Mass., Dunkin' Donuts has become the quintessential Northeastern doughnut shop, with working-class

Department will be speaking about physical security and the importance of laptop locks and students locking their dorm rooms. There will also be a speaker from OIT and the library who will talk about plagiarism, Vernon explained.

There is also a lecture for faculty on Oct. 31 about copywriting.

"OIT is expecting a good turnout to this event. There is a really nice cross section from faculty planning on attending so far," said Vernon.

All faculty members interested in attending must pre-register on the OIT Web site.

During the last two weeks of October, OIT will also have a table set up in the Campus Center. When students stop by, they can sign up for a raffle of security cables for laptops, USB sticks and prizes, and people from the UMass community will be discussing computer security and viruses.

Presentations are also available to have in classes or in residence halls about illegal file distribution; the presentation explains the different aspects involved in copyright violations and how it affects the UMass community. The presentations are put on through OIT and Student Legal Services.

Young Min Kim, the Technical Consultant from the OIT helpdesk who is doing the presentations, said, "We would hope that through awareness, people will not take personal computer security for granted, but rather safeguard themselves from issues such as identity theft, denial of service attacks, viruses, internet fraud, copyrighted file-sharing, and other issues."

Southerners react to coffee chain expansion

Dunkin' Donuts currently has approximately 4,400 stores in 36 U.S. states, but the majority are in the Northeast and mid-Atlantic region. In Massachusetts, there are 1,042 stores, while neighboring Rhode Island has 159 shops.

But now the Canton, Mass.-based chain plans to expand south and west across the country, and that begs the question: Will Southerners, with their long-standing love of Krispy Kreme's sugar-glaze, find room for another doughnut?

Rando is in charge of 12 Nashville-area stores that will serve as a prototype for the company's expansion, testing everything from new products to store appearance.

Dunkin' Donuts currently has about 4,400 stores in 36 U.S. states, but the majority are in the Northeast and mid-Atlantic region. In Massachusetts, there are 1,042 stores, while neighboring Rhode Island has 159 shops.

There are another 1,700 international Dunkin' Donuts stores in 29 countries.

Company executives hope to triple the total number of U.S. stores by 2020.

"Our objective is to take the brand national," Dunkin' Donuts brand officer Robert Rodriguez said. "We have been a very successful super-regional chain."

But parent Dunkin' Brands Inc. is invading the South with a different sort of doughnut—thicker and cakier than the traditional Southern treat from Krispy Kreme, which is lighter, sugar-glazed and served hot.

Executives at both companies say their doughnuts have a universal appeal, but Rando says there's no middle ground.

"It's like the Red Sox and the Yankees—you like one or the other," he said.

Stan Parker, senior vice president of marketing for North Carolina-based Krispy Kreme, said many Southerners have grown up with their doughnuts and think of a trip to Krispy Kreme as more than just breakfast or a snack.

"For many people, Krispy Kreme has been part of their lives for a long time," he said.

Rosemary Evans was clearly in the Krispy Kreme camp as she shared a dozen doughnuts with her children on a recent Saturday morning.

"Dunkin' Donuts just don't have much flavor," said Evans, who grew up in Alabama. "These are just more moist. You can fold them up and stuff a whole one in your mouth."

Dunkin' Donuts fan Jack Lehnhart disagrees. "Wax doughnuts," he says about Krispy Kremes.

Lehnhart, an Ohio native, and his wife Nancy brought their out-of-town guests, Jo-Ann and Bob Ruel, to the Dunkin' Donuts store in Franklin before the Ruels started driving home to Chatham, Mass.

"When we're on the highway, we're always looking for the DD sign," Jo-Ann Ruel said.

Josh Owens, an equity analyst who follows the restaurant industry for Morningstar in Chicago, said Krispy Kreme is still a relatively-small chain compared to Dunkin'.

"Dunkin' Donuts has a reasonably strong brand. It's a brand a lot of people are familiar with. It's not necessarily going to have the fad element that Krispy Kreme had with its expansion," he said.

Krispy Kreme went public in 2000 and became a national sensation as it expanded across the country. Its stock price and profits climbed rapidly, but then crashed in 2004.

Krispy Kreme executives at the time blamed the low-carb craze for declining sales, but the company had serious problems. It faces shareholder lawsuits and investigations alleging it engaged in faulty accounting, and analysts said it grew too fast. Krispy Kreme Doughnuts Inc. recently hired two former tobacco executives who are expected to help the company clear some of its problems.

Dunkin' Donuts executives say that won't happen to them because they plan to expand slowly and with a broader line of products.

"We're very different," Rodriguez said. "Our brand and our model is very different. We're a full line of baked goods. We're renowned for our coffee, which is a major, major player."

In fact, Dunkin's coffee may be more important to its business prospects than its cakey doughnuts. While Starbucks Corp. leads the growing $11 billion industry, there's still plenty of room, Owens said.

Dunkin' Donuts' blue-collar customer base varies so much from the more upscale patrons at Starbucks that the two companies practically operate in separate markets, he said.

Dunkin' Donuts believes some of its other products—bagels, breakfast sandwiches, cookies, flavored coffee—will attract Southern customers, even if they stay loyal to Krispy Kremes.

"We have Starbucks employees that come from across the street," Rando said. "They aren't shy about why they're there. They'll say, 'Hey, we like our coffee better, but you've got an awesome menu.'"

Gay men banned from blood drive donation

By Colin Schultz
Daily Texan (U. Texas)

AUSTIN, Texas—University of Texas student Jake Holbrook was one of 108 gay men who donated signatures instead of blood on campus this week because of their ineligibility to donate in the biannual Alpha Phi Omega blood drive due to federal regulations.

StandOut, a student organization dedicated to promoting LGBT issues on campus, gathered the signatures Monday through Thursday and then calculated the number of lives that could have been saved from the donations of gay men on campus.

The 108 prospective donors turned away equates to 216 lives that could have been saved through blood donations, said junior Jason Orne, director of StandOut. This would amount to nearly 1,300 lives saved annually if they gave regularly six times per year.

Because of Food and Drug Administration regulations, sexually active, healthy, gay males, like Holbrook, a senior, are ineligible to donate blood. The regulation states that a male who has had sexual contact with another male since 1977, cannot donate.

Holbrook said it's "dehumanizing" to be asked to give blood and have to respond that he can't.

"Heterosexual people are just as likely to be infected [with HIV/AIDS] as me, and all the blood is tested anyways," he said. "The ban is discriminatory."

StandOut's efforts have brought the issue to the attention of other organizations, such as OutLaw, the gay, lesbian and bisexual alliance at the UT School of Law.

"I think that if they are going to create some type of ban, it needs to be not sexual-orientation specific. It needs to be applied to heterosexual, homosexual and bisexual people," said Mary Heard, president of OutLaw and a third-year law student.

While StandOut's operation is working to bring gay discrimination issues to local attention, the issues have started to be recognized on a national level, said Heather Parsons, director of development and community relations at the Blood Center of Central Texas. When the policy was installed in 1983, it was necessary in the eyes of the FDA, because at the time AIDS was thought to be most prevalent in that community, she said.

"America's Blood Centers, The Red Cross and The American Association of Blood Banks have lobbied on a national level to change the ban from permanently to 12 months [of prior sexual activity], which is in place for other risks of diseases," she said. "Those three major blood collectors are looking to change the deferral time. They don't think it is medically or scientifically justified."

Those who have been incarcerated for more than 72 consecutive hours, have had sexual contact with someone infected with hepatitis, have been treated for syphilis or gonorrhea or have received a tattoo in a state that does not regulate tattoo facilities, must wait 12 months before giving blood, according to the American Red Cross Web site.

Bush urged to put pressure on Iraqi militias

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press

Republicans and Democrats urged the White House on Sunday to increase the pressure on Iraq's prime minister to crush militias blamed for the rising bloodshed.

President Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Nouri al-Maliki's ability to come to grips with the sectarian violence. Yet continued instability and rising casualties have led to calls, growing louder as the Nov. 7 elections near, for Bush to overhaul his war plan.

"I don't believe that a shift in tactics ought to wait until after the election," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "There are too many casualties there. If we have a better course, we ought to adopt it sooner rather than later."

Two U.S. troops were killed in fighting, the military said Sunday, raising the death toll in October to 80, the highest of any month this year. The overall U.S. death toll has surpassed 2,700.

Senator Jack Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the Bush administration's Iraq policy was failure. "What we have is a situation where this government over the last few months is deteriorating," said Reed, D-R.I.

While agreeing al-Maliki is the best leader to support in Iraq right now, lawmakers from both parties said he must do more to find a political solution between warring Shiite and Sunni sects, or peace will remain out of reach.

Bush said in his judgment, "Maliki has got what it takes to lead a unity government." But the president noted the urgency the new government faces to stop the killing. "I'm patient. I'm not patient forever, and I'm not patient with dawdling," Bush said. "But I recognize the degree of difficulty of the task, and therefore, say to the American people, we won't cut and run."

He added it would be a sign of surrender "if you pull the troops out before the job is done. Absolutely."

Senator John Kerry, Bush's opponent in the 2004 presidential race, said a political rather than military solution is needed.

"Either they resolve the political differences within this year because they want to or they don't want to. If they don't want to, there's nothing American troops can do," said Kerry, D-Mass.

Senator John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said setting a withdrawal timetable could leave a security vacuum that terrorists would fill. But Warner, R-Va., has said a change in course may be necessary if the security situation does not improve soon.

He urged the Iraqi prime minister to give the Iraqi army more authority to improve security. "It is their job, not the U.S. coalition forces', to subdue and get rid of these private militias," Warner said.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the administration must pressure the Iraqis to make political compromises on power and oil resources.

"If they don't want to do that, if they're going to have a civil war, we have to tell them. You're going to do that without us," said Levin, who wants to see U.S. troops begin to leave Iraq by the end of the year.

The White House took issue with a report in Sunday's New York Times that said the head of the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq were working on a plan that probably would for the first time outline milestones for disarming sectarian militias and meeting other political and economic goals. The newspaper said the blueprint to be presented to al-Maliki by the end of this year would not threaten Iraq with a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Bush expressed faith in Iraqi Prime Minister, Nouri al-Maliki, to appropriately address sectarian violence in Iraq.

Of all the president's men

Melissa Garber

If anyone happened to come across an episode of "The O'Reilly Factor," this past week you might have noticed something different. I know the FOX News channel isn't the most popular among New England residents, but if you tuned in, you could have seen Bill O'Reilly score a coveted interview with our president.

I understandably. President George Bush seeks out interviews with talk show hosts and journalists who will coddle him. It's part of being the president: if you're not at a press conference, you don't have to call on The New York Times.

What doesn't make sense to me is how a man like Bill O'Reilly was afforded a three-part interview with the most powerful public figure. In case you weren't aware, O'Reilly isn't exactly the most respectable political pundit.

True, O'Reilly is a registered Republican. Although he insists it was a mistake, and he meant to register as an Independent, it still doesn't justify an interview with our president. Maybe Bush agreed to this interview on something other than the basis of merit.

President Bush had to have known a little something about Bill O'Reilly before he agreed to an interview with the self-proclaimed advocate of "no spin zones." It makes me wonder what exactly attracted Bush to "The O'Reilly Factor."

Perhaps it was the way O'Reilly shouts at guests to shut up over and over again. Who doesn't enjoy watching O'Reilly try to intimidate guests who don't agree with his opinion?

Or maybe it was after reading O'Reilly's alleged phone sex transcript with FOX producer Andrea Mackris that sealed the deal. There's nothing better than a good lawsuit when it comes to Bill O'Reilly. When he isn't fighting lawsuits he's filing them under the guise of FOX against his archrival Al Franken.

It had to have been O'Reilly's insightful commentary that drew Bush toward the no spin zone.

It had to have been O'Reilly's insightful commentary that drew Bush toward the No Spin Zone. All he had to do was Google Bill O'Reilly, and he would come up with hundreds of gems straight from the horse's mouth. What isn't appealing about a man who compares the ACLU, Michael Moore and Media Matters to the Nazis?

I'm getting ahead of myself though. Bill O'Reilly actually calls the American Civil Liberties Union Nazis. According to O'Reilly, "Hitler would be a card-carrying ACLU member. So would Stalin. Castro probably is. And so would Mao Zedong." O'Reilly claims the ACLU is the second most dangerous organization in America right now, apparently, they are only second to Al Queda.

It's only natural the man who made a hobby out of taking away Americans' civil liberties would enjoy the company of the man who calls the biggest safeguard of our rights Nazis. O'Reilly's delightful commentary only gets better from there. Comparing the ACLU to the Nazis is pretty mild in retrospect.

Our president, the man who raged a war in Iraq over ideologies, actually conceded to an interview with a man who was quoted as saying, "I don't have any respect by and large for the Iraqi people at all. I have no respect for them. I think that they're a prehistoric group."

Bill O'Reilly's own personal political strategy in the Middle East is simple. "We cannot intervene in the Muslim world ever again. What we can do is bomb the living daylights out of them, just like we did in the Balkans." He is not a man to fight a war over abstractions.

Granted, Bush doesn't, and shouldn't, agree with every interviewer's opinion. Yet, it seems just a bit ridiculous to me that he would find O'Reilly's commentary acceptable. Referring to a nation's people as prehistoric is reprehensible; our president agreeing to an interview with such a person is irresponsible. O'Reilly is not a reputable journalist or even an upright media figure. He does not deserve an interview with the president.

Is Bill O'Reilly really capable of conducting a worthy interview with George W. Bush?

O'Reilly's claim to fame is firing cheap shots at people of all races, creeds and sexual orientations. He has been quoted numerous times stereotyping all African Americans as immoral drug addicts and alcoholics. He asks, "Will African-Americans break away from the pack thinking and reject immorality ... because that's the reason the family's breaking apart – alcohol, drugs, infidelity. You have to reject that, and it doesn't seem — and I'm broadly speaking here, but a lot of African-Americans won't reject it."

One column couldn't possibly reprint all the atrocious things O'Reilly has said in his career. He is militant, homophobic, racist and an all around intolerant person. He is the farthest thing from a suitable candidate for an interview with the president.

Melissa Garber is a Collegian columnist.

Mr. Professor President

Dan Nicastro

Education has not been a particularly high priority of the George W. Bush administration. In fact, the stunningly little work George W. Bush has done on education has been rebuked and severely criticized by almost everyone in the education community.

The so-called No Child Left Behind Act has left its fair share of students, teachers and school districts in the dust. Also, the school voucher program was criticized by pretty much everyone, and finally, any additional funding for education has been sacrificed in favor of the war on terror.

I must admit, I was one of those people critiquing Bush's handling of the education system, however, after further examination of the president's policies, I must say he has turned me into a believer. Although his administration proposed cutting half a billion dollars from the 2007 fiscal year education budget and channeling it into funding the abysmal No Child Left Behind Act, I can safely say, I finally understand his reasoning. George W. Bush has decided to try his hand at the future of education: interactive history lessons.

Technology has changed every facet of society, making it easier to quickly access information, pictures, videos and other types of media. The next frontier is the education system, which is not privy to most of this technology because of cuts in its budget. Therefore, President Bush has taken it upon himself to give all American children a rundown of the Vietnam history lesson in the United States using the War in Iraq as the comparison.

To make this work, the Bush administration first needed to get permission from Congress for this hypothetical field trip into Iraq. Bush is so crafty, he made the Congressional permission slip look like an almost exact replica of the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, which was signed by Lyndon Johnson in his 1964 Gulf of Tonkin Resolution.

After getting the seal of approval from Congress, Professor Commander in Chief was ready to begin this interactive history lesson, telling the American people we were bringing democracy to the region. In a brilliant move, he said "It is clear that the future of freedom and peace depend on the actions of America." Well played sir, well played.

Bush was able to shape his speech so specifically that children everywhere would not be forced to memorize President Lyndon Johnson's August, 1964 speech where he said of Vietnam, "This is not a simple war, but a struggle for freedom on every front of human activity."

A few months later, Bush began covering the chapter on Dissent in 1960s America. He proceeded to tank the war effort in Iraq, only to show American students the failures of Vietnam. "Nearly six [fifty-three Americans] said the war [in Iraq] was not worth fighting," mirroring the opinions of the students 'round in time, the country on the Vietnam War. Bush showed no expense, even going as far as to ask Geraldo to give away troops positions to Iraqi insurrectional television.

However, the protests on college campuses could not even compare to those of the 60s, and it was time to get the troops stirred up (so to speak), so Bush called up his old friend Neil Young, inviting him to be a guest speaker for the nation and convincing him to create a new album of songs showcasing how much he hates the War in Iraq. Young begrudgingly accepted, and the collegial protest movement stepped up. Hooray.

Things were going wonderfully for President Bush by this point. His history lesson was a rousing success, as most of the nation was starting to mention the V-word when talking about Iraq; however, Bush was not finished with the curriculum just yet.

The next chapter dealt with war atrocities and the public backlash they created. This was a piece of cake. One of the associate professors, Donald Rumsfeld, was way ahead of Bush on this one. He had not one, but two major examples of war atrocities: Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib.

While Guantanamo was more about the denial of fundamental civil rights (boring), Abu Ghraib had all the glitz and glamour of the My Lai massacre of 1968. This was more than just your standard torture. There were reports of "prisoners being ridden like animals, sexually fondled by female soldiers and forced to retrieve their food from toilets."

Much like the My Lai massacre, this dramatically shifted public opinion and really started the downward trend in the polls well done, Mr. Rumsfeld. Professor Bush must have agreed because he refused Rumsfeld's resignation and even went as far as granting him tenure within a few weeks of national exposure.

There are many, many more instances of Bush's scarily accurate teaching style. I would never have thought I would say this, but he may be up for a full professorship after his term of office ends. Who ever would have thought of using real world events to mimic history?

Never has this much money (over $300 billion) been put into so successful an education initiative. This schooling may be allowed to continue, as Bush has two years left in office and lots of global extremism to fight (Korea would fit nicely with the history lesson); kind of gives a whole new meaning to the phrase "school is killing me."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SECULAR STATISTICS OF DEATH

I was disillusioned to read Brad Leibowitz's editorial regarding activities people should avoid. Disillusioned by the continued propagation of the myth that, "In the course of human history more blood has been spilt, and more lives have been lost as a result of wars being fought in the name of God, than any other reason."

Let's critically evaluate this contention. The Crusades occurred between the 11th and 15th centuries. I could find no agreed-upon figure regarding the number of people killed, however, during this time, the European population increased by 35 million.

Assuming Crusaders killed one in 10, approximately 3.9 million Europeans lost their lives. Let's double that to account for Middle Eastern and Muslim Crusades (7.8 million). Around this time, the Spanish and Roman Inquisitions took place.

It is estimated that 34,000 people were burned at the stake. From 1400 to 1700, about 300,000 people were put to death in Europe for witchcraft. In Massachusetts, the witch hunt lasted only one year and resulted in 20 women being killed.

Now let's turn to secular crimes against humanity. According to The Guinness Book of World Records, under the topic "Judicial," subtopic "Crimes: Mass Killings," the greatest massacre by one government against another is 26.3 million Chinese during the regime of Mao Tse Tung between 1949 and 1965.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn estimates the loss of life from state repression and terrorism under Lenin, Stalin and Khrushchev from 1917 to 1959 to be 66.7 million.

In Cambodia, according to the Khmer Rouge foreign minister, more than one-third of the eight million Khmer (at least 2.7 million) were killed between April 1975 and January 1979.

The figures for the Mongolian invasion of northern China from 1210 to 1219 and 1311 to 1340 are on the order of 35 million people, while the number of victims of bandit leader Chang Hsien-Chung, known as the Yellow Tiger, from 1643 to 1647 in the Szechwan province, has been put at 40 million people.

Because these figures are assertions rather than reliable estimates, let's cut them in half to 37 million killed. We have not included two world wars, the Japanese invasion of China or thousands of other territorial wars of the last millennia.

Now let's do the math: crimes against humanity in the name of Christ, approximately 8.1 million people killed; not in the name of Christ, approximately 133 million killed.

I want vigorous debate in the public square, an honest exchange of ideas; however, many of us, Liberal, Conservative, religious or otherwise, often don't bring much substance to the debate. We rely on myths, spin and name-calling to make our point, rather than thoughtful and honest dialogue winning the day.

Having said that, I will admit perhaps Mr. Leibowitz was trying to be humorous or provocative as a columnist. That's fine, but if a topic isn't provocative without propaganda, or if one cannot be humorous without deceit, then perhaps we should find some other topic worthy of our attention.

Finally, thoughtful people know not every Christian is a crusader, and not every secularist is a Hitler. I hope in future Collegian editorials, that substantive ideas will be vigorously expressed while supported by fact and critical analysis.

INTERPRETATIONS OF HISTORY

I am deeply offended by your inaccurate portrayal of the Turkish-Armenian conflict in your article on Oct. 18, 2006. Two million Muslim civilians died in the same region under the same circumstances: 523, 955 of these deaths are documented in the Ottoman Archives as acts committed by the armed Armenian revolutionary groups, such as the Dashnaks, Hinchaks and Ramgavars.

This is a deep rooted conflict that you decided to simplify by labeling Armenians as the victims in a conflict where many more Muslim civilians died. Armenian revolutionary groups were going village to village slaughtering Muslim civilians with the backing of Czarist Russian forces that were invading what was left of the crumbling Ottoman Empire.

In addition, the Allied Forces that occupied Turkey at the end of WWI held the Malta Tribunals, in which 144 Ottoman officials were tried. A team of Armenian researchers were funded by the Allied Powers but could not find any evidence, and all the Ottoman officials were released after three years.

Even after all of these events, the suffering of Turks did not stop on this issue. In the 1970s and 1980s, over 70 people, mostly Turkish dignitaries, were killed in terrorist attacks by groups like ASALA (Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia) and JCAG (Justice Commandos of the Armenian Genocide) in European cities and the American cities of Boston, Los Angeles and Santa Barbara.

Historians, and other intellectuals, who disagree with Armenians have been bullied into keeping silent.

On Oct. 4, 1977, UCLA History Professor Stanford Shaw's house was bombed by Armenian terrorists. This event forced him into early retirement. On Nov. 16, 1993, Princeton historian Bernard Lewis was sued by Armenians in France for expressing his views in the French newspaper Le Monde.

These are just a couple of the many incidents of academic intimidation by the Armenian Diaspora on this issue.

Armenians have a very powerful ethnic lobby in America: the Armenian National Committee of America. This is why this topic is so grossly politicized and brought before the public on such a consistent basis.

Thanks to the efforts of this lobby, no one knows that Armenia has been militarily occupying the Azerbaijani region of Nagorno-Karabakh since 1993 in violation of U.N. resolutions 822, 853 and 874.

Thousands of Azeri civilians were murdered in this invasion, including over 800 in the town of Khojaly on Feb. 26, 1992. There are currently about one million internally displaced people in Azerbaijan (most of whom live in great poverty because of there lost property) who are denied their right to return guaranteed under the U.N. Human Rights Declaration.

Your intolerance puts forth the idea that Muslim lives are less valuable than Christian lives. When Christians die, it amounts to genocide. Yet, when Muslims die, the world turns a blind eye.

If you have any respect for human life, you will detract your insensitive comments and apologize for dishonoring the lives of so many.

A Homecoming of Rejects

The Mullins Center hosts All-American Rejects, and more

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

College tours must be one of the hardest tours for a band to perform on. Each night consists of playing in an arena to a crowd who may, or may not, have heard of them until then.

Saturday night was different however. The Verizon Wireless tour consisted of a popular band, The All-American Rejects, with three other bands: Damone, Under the Influence of Giants and Ima Robot, each of which has the potential to become just as popular.

Damone, the first band to perform, was by far the odd band out of the concert but not in a bad way. Their 80s metal sound added a fun twist to the concert. This band did not look shaken up despite having their trailer stolen. According to the man who was selling the band's t-shirts, the band had recently lost everything in a robbery, forcing them to borrow equipment from the rest of the bands on the tour.

After a quick change in the equipment setup, the band Ima Robot hit the stage. Lead singer Alex Ebert was by far one of the most energetic front-men of the night. He danced from side to side all across the stage.

Ebert would switch back and forth from singing the lyrics to rapping them. This rapid switch created some great dance grooves. The audience followed in tune, dancing along as well.

Most of the material the band performed was from their latest album "Monument to the Masses." During the last song of the band's set, Ebert performed an imaginary toast to the audience to thank them for their support. Their gratitude resulted in the audience toasting right back.

Following Ima Robot was the band Under the Influence of Giants. A cameraman taped the band's set, capturing their performance on video for an upcoming promotional release.

Under the Influence performed well, but the crowd wasn't as into them as they could have been. Despite the crowd's lack of enthusiasm, singer Aaron Bruno kept reminding them they should dance to the music, whether they were seated or standing on the floor.

Bassist David Amezcua tried his hardest to get the people on the floor to dance. Throughout the set, Amezcua was seen wearing sunglasses and a bandanna. His appearance was similar to the Muppet, Animal.

Quickly after they exited the stage, the floor reached its maximum capacity. Excitement was felt throughout the entire venue. Fans began to chant for the All-American Rejects, getting anxious for the band of the hour to come out. Then at 9:30, the moment arrived, and they hit the stage.

The band got things started by performing one of their hit singles "Dirty Little Secret" before introducing themselves. From the audience's reaction it was obvious the band didn't need an introduction. After all, fans had come to see them – the rest of the bands that played were just an added bonus.

If you'd like to hear a Daily Collegian exclusive audio interview with AAR drummer Chris Gaylor, visit www.dailycollegian.com.

The All-American Rejects have become a popular punk style band with a strong following. On Saturday night, the band performed at the Mullins Center for Homecoming.

As roadies swapped the band's instruments in between songs, singer/bassist Tyson Ritter would tell jokes so the crowd wouldn't bore.

At one point, Ritter got all the girls in the crowd to cheer for guitarist Mike Kennerty, after proclaiming he was the best looking guy in the band. "I am you see the definitions in the cheap seats," Ritter joked to the audience.

Ritter and company did a good job of going back and forth from the band's two albums for material, performing such songs as "Swing Swing" and "The Last Song" from their platinum certified, self-titled debut album.

Following the last song of their encore, the band left the stage as quickly as they had come.

Morris set to play at Bezanson Hall

By Bradley Fairbrother
Collegian Staff

Hot on the heels of Cecil Taylor's performance at Bowker Auditorium last month, the Fine Arts Center's "Solos & Duos" series (now in its fifth season) has another treat in store for UMass, this time in the form of guitarist Joe Morris and cellist Daniel Levin. The musicians will perform as a duo this Thursday at Bezanson Recital Hall, at 8 p.m. Tickets are $10, and $5 for students.

Music magazine, The Wire, dubbed Morris "one of the most profound improvisers at work in the U.S." Growing up in New Haven, CT, Morris attended The Hartford, an alternative high school that allowed the young guitarist to concentrate on his music, and spend time at Yale attending concerts and recitals.

His major early influence was Jimmy Hendrix, until his sister's copy of John Coltrane's "OM" turned him on to jazz. Coltrane led to Miles Davis, Thelonious Monk, Ornette Coleman and the aforementioned Taylor and later Eric Dolphy and Fred Hopkins.

His major early influence was Jimmy Hendrix, until his sister's copy of John Coltrane's "OM" turned him on to jazz...

In 1975, Morris made the move to Boston, where he quickly established himself as a soloist, and a capable member of large and small groups. In 1980, he performed in Belgium and Holland and, upon his return to Massachusetts, he helped found the Boston Improvisers Group.

In 1981, Morris released "Wraparound," his first album as a leader on his own Riti Records. The LP featured Sebastian Steinberg on bass and Laurence Cook on drums.

Also in Boston, Morris fell in with a number of masterful improvising musicians, including Lowell Davidson, Billy Bang, Andrew Cyrille, Butch Morris and saxophonist Joe McPhee, who will perform at Bezanson in November, also as part of the "Solos & Duos" series.

In 1987, Morris' music took him to New York City, where he remained for two years performing at venues like Club Chandelier, Greenwich House and the Knitting Factory before returning to Boston in 1989.

Over the next four years, Morris performed and recorded with musical trio Sweatshop and the quartet Rocket Club. Since the early '90s, he has recorded for labels like I.C.M., Black Saint/Soulnote, Knitting Factory Works and Omni Tone.

He has performed and recorded with Matthew Shipp, William Parker, Joe Maneri, Mat Maneri, Raphe Malik, Ken Vandermark, Susie Ibarra and Hamid Drake, many of whom have performed as part of the "Solos & Duos" series.

Musician Daniel Levin will also be part of Thursday's performance with Morris. "The Boston Phoenix" calls Levin "a major new voice on his instrument and in improvised music." Hailing from Burlington, VT, Levin picked up the cello at age six and later studied at the Walnut Hill School for the Arts, Mannes College of Music and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Following an epiphany while improvising with a dancer at the Sea Arts Festival in Florida in 1993, Levin moved away from the classical realm, and towards the world of jazz.

Levin has performed at the Vision Festival in New York City, JVC Jazz Festival (also in New York City), New Orleans Jazz & Festival and at famous New York improvising haven-like the Fe Stone, Knitting Factory and Tonic, and the recently departed Country, Bluegrass and Blues club (also known as CBGB's).

His collaborators include Morris, Joe McPhee, Tim Berne, Satoshi Takeishi, Sabir Mateen and former Hampshire College music professor Mark Dresser. Levin's most recent record, "Don't Go It Alone," is out now on Riti Records and features Morris on upright bass, Matt Moran on vibes and Dave Ballou on cornet.

This season's "Solos & Duos" series will conclude with McPhee's solo saxophone performance on Nov. 29. Next Semester, the spirit of "Solos & Duos" remains with the Fine Arts Center's "Mega Triangle" series featuring Michael Gregory (Feb. 23), Michele Rosewoman and New York Up (March 29) and pioneering saxophonist Roscoe Mitchell, from Art Ensemble of Chicago (April 26).

Morris and Levin will next perform together in Morris' quintet at Freddy's Backroom in Brooklyn, N.Y. in November.

The Canadian-born band The Barenaked Ladies have morphed into an alternative rock group with a sense of humor.

UMass gears up for Barenaked fun

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

Barenaked Ladies are invading the Mullins Center tomorrow night. This comical alternative rock band has released 11 albums, including a live recording, a greatest hits album and a Christmas album. Their career spans over a decade, and they have no intension of slowing down.

It all began in the year 1988. Steven Page and Ed Robertson were just two Canadian teenagers who, for years, had attended school together. Although they were a year apart in age, they forged a friendship based on a mutual admiration for Peter Gabriel and the conundrum of rock critics.

These friends began to play local shows under the name Barenaked Ladies. Although they had no serious goal in mind, Page and Robertson gained the reputation of being a unique improvisational duo with an uncanny ability to amuse anyone, and everyone, present.

Morris has performed and recorded with numerous musicians, such as Matthew Shipp, William Parker, Joe Maneri, Mat Maneri and others.

Eventually the Barenaked Ladies morphed into an alternative rock quartet with a sense of humor. Together upright-bassist Jim Creeggan, percussionist Tyler Stewart, keyboardist Andy Creeggan, Page and Robertson began sharing vocal and guitar responsibilities.

Barenaked Ladies recorded their first album,"Gordon" in 1992. This album served as a launching pad for the band's unique folk-alternative rock sound and oddly insightful lyrics.

Zany and catchy tunes, like "Be My Yoko Ono" and "Grade 9," exposed the public to the Ladies. The songs were played on college radio stations and went double-platinum in Canada.

The song "Brian Wilson" became widely popular as it referenced the Beach Boy member, and the lyrics themselves referenced the famous Pavlov's dog psychological experiment.

This album also has a studio version of "If I Had $1000000." This song remains one of their most well known songs to date.

Tomorrow night at the Mullins Center BNL will perform their outlandish stage show, which is anticipated to be a crowd pleaser.

For the release of their next album, "Maybe You Should Drive," Andy Creeggan exited the band and was replaced by Kevin Hearn. Released in 1994, this album remains warm in the hearts of fans "Jane" and "Life, In a Nutshell" still remain staples of the band's performance repertoire.

In 1996 "Born on a Pirate Ship" was released and eventually went gold. "Break Your Heart" and "Old Apartment" were by far typical love songs, but approached the topic of loss without getting cliche.

"Shoe Box," a song about secrecy in relationships, became a mainstream hit when it was used on the soundtrack for the NBC show "Friends."

The year 1998 was when the Ladies broke into the highly coveted American mainstream scene with the release of "Stunt" and the successive radio play of "One Week." The song became a sensation. Soon parents, radio and manufacturers alike started to cash in with the goal of learning its bizarre lyrics about Chinese chicken, Hamlet, Tylenol and taking off one's shirt in public.

As "One Week" reached the top of the Billboard Chart, other songs like "It's All Been Done" and "Call and Answer" prompted fans to fans to seek out more of the BNL discography. Their eyes were open to the genius that is the Barenaked Ladies.

As a result of their popularity, tour dates sold out across North America. Soon the Barenaked Ladies became a household name.

Following this success, they released four albums: "Maroon," "Everything Is Everyone," "Barenaked for the Holidays" and, most recently, "Barenaked Ladies are Me."

When Barenaked Ladies first formed, they created a distinctive style of performance that largely led to the establishment of a cult-like fan base. Their live shows include random rap sessions, dance breakdowns and improvisational banter-filled interludes.

On stage, they exhibit about random encounters with typical folk and rhyming odes about out of the ordinary behavior of family members.

In hearing about these impressive live show tactics, fans all over North America flocked out to see the signature performance style of the Barenaked Ladies in action.

By the early to mid 1990s, the band gained an intense and devoted following facilitated by word-of-mouth promotion.

At first, the success was not all-encompassing as the band may have hoped. The name "Barenaked Ladies" evoked some discomfort among the politically-correct community, including the mayor of Toronto, who cited the name as "demeaning towards women and sexist." Opponents failed to see the irony of the name and everything it implied.

In reality, the band contained no ladies, and had no intention of being bare or naked. They evoked zero implications of harboring any sexist tendencies. From what fans gathered, Barenaked Ladies was just a group of comical Canadians who wanted to play their own brand of alternative rock.

The band name was meant to raise a tone of ridiculousness. It refers to a Bob Dylan concert Page and Robertson attended together in 1988. At some point, the term "bare-naked lady" arose into the consciousness of these two Canadian teenagers.

The boys found the term completely absurd and agreed it would serve as an excellent band name because of its redundancy and ridiculousness. This same nonsensical nature of the term itself directly correlated to the nonsensical attitude the band presented as they wrote songs, played gigs and built a receptive fan base.

Maintaining a fan base for over 15 years is a difficult task. But the Barenaked Ladies have learned to rely on their main assets to ensure such longevity.

For one, even after 15 years and 11 albums, they are still enjoying themselves. They make smart music with a social consciousness. They never lose the unique, fun-loving style that made them well-known.

They bring the same positive energy to their live shows that they did at the beginning of their career. They still rap; they still dance; they still "wing it."

One can never know what to expect when the BNL take the stage because no two shows are exactly the same. All that fans can expect is a set of BNL's best songs paired with creative rapping about nonsense issues, and ending with the appropriate flying Kraft Macaroni (during the song "If I Had $1000000).

The unpredictable behavior of Barenaked Ladies will take the stage at the Mullins Center tomorrow, along with some special guests. The show starts at 7:30 and tickets are on sale now.

The Prestige proves to be fast-paced and stylized

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

As with his defining movie "Memento," the plot of Christopher Nolan's "The Prestige" is rooted in a subject to which the masses would naturally find intriguing and mystifying. They would also find it shrouded in the optimum story to suit such a subject in regards to drama and suspense.

The resulting movie should, according to Nolan's calculations, generate the most audience interest possible. The central concept of "The Prestige," however, is far more pedestrian and timeworn than that of "Memento," and Nolan seems to realize his new film will not be lauded on the grounds of concept originality this time around.

To compensate, the film adorns its subject matter with an attitude of childlike wonder traditionally reserved for the profession of its main characters.

"The Prestige" is based upon the novel of the same title by Christopher Priest. Rupert Angier and Alfred Borden (Hugh Jackman and Christian Bale, respectively) form a team of magicians in London at the turn of the twentieth century.

After Angier's wife drowns in a trick bungled by Borden, the two split on bad terms and develop a rivalry. They sabotage each other's performances with increasingly malicious intentions until Borden is arrested for Angier's murder. his sentencing being one of the first scenes in the film, followed by flashbacks detailing the events leading to Angier's death.

Information is revealed concerning Borden's family, as well as his affair with Angier's assistant (Scarlett Johansson), Angier's teaming with magic-illusion designer (Michael Caine) and obsession with a magic trick that may very well be magic, designed by Nikola Tesla (David Bowie), and the demands and sacrifices of dedicated magicians.

Nolan again showcases his talent as a master storyteller, generating enough mystery and suspense to guarantee the film demands attention every second it's playing. He compacts a plethora of plot developments and twists into a movie slightly over two hours long.

The tightly wound story adds to the snappy immediacy of the film, forcing the viewer to pay rapt attention to the screen in fear that something crucial to the story might be missed. The film's method of rapid-fire expository delivery is a method that quickens the pulse although it could be considered cheating. It's a fail-safe plan to maintain interest in case the story itself loses any vim or vigor.

Neither Angier nor Borden are what one might describe as sympathetic characters. Both resort to lowly means of achieving fame while lashing out at one another. Any residual amount of audience sympathy is washed away in the film's most memorable scene, which involves a canary.

But while the audience cannot like the characters, they can relate to them: two people, who are certain they are better than their rivals, are motivated by the primitive desire to become the undisputed alpha human by any means necessary.

It's a brutal film, and it deserves accolades for never lapsing into a moral structure, never presenting Angier and Borden judgmentally. Considering that the two main characters profess themselves to hold powers greater than those of ordinary men, their status as amoral opportunists and the movie's depiction of them as such is irony writ at large.

The movie sends a sobering message that there are no wizards, just pathetic men behind curtains, and the masses would do well to cease looking for divinity in everyday life and, instead, learn to cope with the disappointing truth of a world devoid of magic.

"The Prestige" is draped with only the finest of production values, which lovingly caress each corner of the screen in rich imagery and music. There's hardly an instant in the film that's not accentuated by gothic sets and music, or at the very least color schemes that emanate dread and malaise.

It's difficult to admire the skills of the actors themselves beneath all the gilding and polish, but they still manage to shine through on their own. Of course, the most glaring problem with the film's excessive stylishness is that it gums up the passageways from the story to the viewer.

In contrast, "Memento" employed style but did so with the purpose of bringing the story closer to the audience–not to frame it and cordon it off.

One would be hard-pressed to find a recent film more riveting than "The Prestige," which practically barrels through the movie theater with sheer kinetic energy. Nolan has fashioned a vastly complicated Frankenstein's monster of a movie, loaded with so many various moving parts that onlookers are bound to run for cover, fearing it will suddenly malfunction and send all the pistons and cogs flying.

Its twisting and turning story elegantly ties a bow around itself. Its lavish imagery and its delicate themes of faith and obsession all combine to form a compelling argument to see this film. It's just unfortunate that this hulking, lumbering film is too intimidating for anyone to feel comfortable in approaching it to get a better look.

Scarlett Johansson plays a seductive assistant in this plot-twisted drama.

Christian Bale stars as Alfred Borden, founder of a magician team in London at the turn of the century.

From the director of "Memento" comes the film, "The Prestige," a thriller that takes place at the turn of the century.

City fashion vs country style

"Campus couture"

By Kelly McGuire
Collegian Correspondent

After spending nine months working in Manhattan, I realized the notions I had about myself regarding fashion were false; I was not as daring with clothing, accessories and shoes as I previously saw myself to be.

However, when I returned to Amherst after being away for just short of a year, I realized fashion does evolve everywhere, even in places like Amherst, Massachusetts where the social norm are t-shirts, flip-flops, sweatshirts and Birkenstocks.

Nothing is wrong with these steady, ever-classic trends, but coming from a place where fashion is forever changing and evolving at a rapid pace, it's nice to see that Amherst can create its own fashion timeline–however slow moving it tends to be.

What's hot and what's not trickles out of New York faster than any other city, with the exception of Paris. People in NYC completely shed any and all inhibitions when it comes to clothing.

They would wear the funky colored rubber boots over jeans when it rained to keep the rain from trickling in. They'd wear black leggings with stiletto heels and oversized bohemian flowing shirts. And of course, a new favorite–the Audrey Hepburn, gigantic sunglasses that engulf the whole entire face–I have a drawer full of them.

A style that Manhattan recently adapted in early 2006 was the phenomenon of wearing a belt around the upper waist. After deciding belts around your waist were "so last season," the next trend placed them right on your rib cage, and secured them tightly with any cute shirt or dress. It spruces up an outfit.

My first night out back at Amherst, I stood in front of my closet contemplating what to wear–generic cute tank top and jeans with some flip flops and earrings? Or should I bust out some new ballet flats, skinny jeans, black Tee and patent leather red belt?

After deciding belts around your waist were "so last season," the next trend placed them right on your rib cage, and secured them tightly with any cute shirt or dress. It spruces up an outfit.

I chose the latter, figuring people in New York were wearing this kind of outfit for over six months now, so people in Amherst must have surely adapted.

"What are you wearing?" asked almost everyone when the night got going. I told them this was a style I'd seen for months. My friends shook their heads and giggled at me, as if I was wearing a garbage bag as a dress. I smiled and just continued with my evening, sort of feeling out of place in this country town. But I knew enough from what I saw in New York to be confident in what I was wearing.

Flash forward a few weekends later. I'm out again, this time sans the belt, (not for any reason relating to my previous experience) because a belt wasn't necessary with my outfit; however, I surveyed the clothing many Amherst ladies were wearing and what do you know? I saw about six or seven lovely ladies sporting high belts with some adorable matching accessories.

I secretly smiled to myself, not because I was the reason for the coming of age fashion in Amherst, but simply for the fact that the country (Amherst) was catching on to the city (New York) even if they were a few steps behind. Better late than never, right?

A popular trend, timeless in its mass appeal, are oversized sunglasses, as represented here by Chanel.

NBC's cut-backs looking grim

By Phil Rosenthal

Bill Veeck, the late sage who used to own the Chicago White Sox, always liked to say that it wasn't really baseball's stars that were expensive. "It's the cost of mediocrity that murders you," he said.

It's failure that's costly.

NBC Universal Television Group Chief Executive Jeff Zucker is talking about trying to deploy lower-cost programming rather than traditional dramas and comedies in the 8 p.m. prime-time leadoff slot.

Advertiser interest just doesn't justify the expense, Zucker has said, especially when General Electric's media unit is trying to slash $750 million in annual administrative and operating expenses by the end of 2008, an initiative called NBC Universal 2.0 that was announced Thursday.

What NBC is going through is increasingly common in the media business these days. It reported a nearly 15 percent profit margin on $3.6 billion in revenue for the third quarter, but because the $542 million profit was off 10 percent, it was cast as a drag on General Electric.

"Success in this business means quickly adjusting to and anticipating change," NBC Universal Chairman and Chief Executive Bob Wright said in a statement. "This initiative is designed to help us exploit technology and focus our resources as we continue our transformation into a digital media company for the 21st century."

That's a nice way of stating that while NBC Universal spends money to build up the digital platforms it hopes will produce more than $1 billion in revenue by 2009, it plans to take a hacksaw to costs. This means consolidating some operations and eliminating approximately 700 jobs, or about 5 percent of its global workforce, as well as spending less money in the first hour of prime time.

Jeff Zucker was named the chief executive officer of NBC in 2005. Since then he's been responsible for all NBC Universal programming.

Of course, when NBC shelled out for "Friends" or "The Cosby Show" or "Golden Girls" — you know, programs people actually watched — scripted shows weren't expensive no matter how many zeroes were on the checks.

It's when you're spending $2.6 million per hour of "Friday Night Lights," a quality drama that's nonetheless averaging only around 6.5 million viewers, to open NBC's Tuesday lineup this fall, that the $1.1 million "Deal or No Deal" looks so good.

The more than 15 million viewers "Deal or No Deal" averages on Mondays looks pretty good, too.

Back when Zucker, then merely head of NBC Entertainment, was upping the renewal fee each year for "Friends" to keep the top-rated comedy on Thursday nights, he justified it by not only the ad revenue it generated (it also kept NBC No. 1 in the ratings) and helped the network promote its other programs.

The price eventually extended beyond $9 million per half-hour. Sometimes you have to spend money to make money.

You want expensive? How about when NBC paid Paul Reiser and Helen Hunt each $1 million per week to star in "Mad About You" when the fading sitcom was routinely getting pounded by CBS's show NBC had discarded.

It's never what you pay. It's what you get for your money. And no matter what Zucker thinks of what advertisers will support at 8 p.m., the 9 p.m. shows are bound to be affected. What's that worth?

Just last year, Zucker himself said the first hour of prime time was crucial because "the ability to launch things in the second hour and having them self-start is usually impossible."

So now he's saying he wants to rein in costs?

"NBC is rebounding and we think it is well-positioned in the fourth quarter of 2006 into 2007," General Electric Chairman Jeffrey Immelt said last week, noting that NBC's ratings were up 15 percent.

But a lot of that is because the network has this fall added National Football League telecasts on Sunday nights, which is costing NBC $3.6 billion, $600 million per year for the next six years.

It's a lot of cash, to be sure. It's not necessarily expensive.

mature.

"The thing that impressed me the most today was when we were down 13-3. There was no panic. There was no bickering. We just stayed collected, stayed calm, and stepped up and made plays on both sides and dug ourselves out of an early hole."

Entering the stretch run of the season, quarterback Liam Coen conceded that some good can come from the Minutemen having to come from behind.

"I think it was a good experience in a way," the sophomore said. "I think we handled it great. There was no commotion on the sidelines, we almost felt like we shot ourselves in the foot. We were confident that we were going to come back and get things rolling."

After the Cassidy touchdown, UMass held the Rams scoreless until Gallagher hit a 21-yard field goal eight seconds into the fourth quarter. The Minutemen scored 35 unanswered points in that span – including 21 in the second quarter alone.

Senior running back Steve Baylark cut the Rams' advantage to three points with a two-yard run with 2:18 to go in the first. Baylark rushed for a career-high 235 yards on 26 carries, adding another score in the third quarter on an eight-yard run. He also broke off a career-long 58-yard run early in the second quarter.

Senior center Alex Miller weighed in on Baylark surpassing 200 yards, and what it means to the guys up front.

"We've been working for that two hundred – this is my fourth year now," Miller said. "He's been coming up short like three or four times, so it feels good just to get him over the hump. Those are our stats up front."

Brown added how much easier his job is with Baylark as his running back.

"You can be a real smart coach when you give the ball to No. 5 26 times," Brown said. "He had a great day. It just made it easy for the rest of the pieces to come together."

Brandon London put the Minutemen up for good when he grabbed a nine-yard touchdown pass from Coen three minutes into the second. The quarterback faked a hand off to Baylark going left and rolled out to the right side. He hit London dragging across the field and the senior walked into the end zone for the six points.

Then the UMass defense chipped in. Atoning for his earlier miscue, Smith scooped up a fumble by Cassidy at the URI 23-yard line and took it all the way to the endzone.

"I had to make a big play. I let up two big ones so I had to [redeem myself]," Smith said.

After the snap, Cassidy kept the ball and ran around the left edge when Brad Anderson met him. The senior hit Cassidy, popping the ball free. Overall, the Minutemen forced the Rams to fumble the ball three times on the afternoon – two by Cassidy alone.

Senior Steve Baylark has 892 rushing yards this season. He needs 108 yards to become the third player in I-AA history to have four 1,000-yard seasons.

Coen capped the scoring in the second with a 23-yard strike to Rasheed Rancher on a slant route. He threaded the pass between defenders and hit Rancher in stride at the goal line.

Once again, Coen turned in a stellar performance. In addition to the touchdowns to London and Rancher, he completed 14-of-19 passes for 176 yards.

Each kicker added a field goal in the fourth quarter to end the scoring. Koepplin hit his 24-yarder just two minutes after Gallagher converted his 21-yard attempt lineman or a linebacker.

But Woodward, on 4th-and-6 with his team down by six, slithered through the URI line for seven yards – a first down.

"We had practiced [that play] all week," UMass coach Don Brown said after the 41-16 win over the Rams. "We kind of knew what the look was. We had to wait until we ended up getting it on the right hash [mark]. We thought it was there. The blocking was excellent. I thought that the surprise factor was a positive."

The play caught everyone by surprise. For URI, however, the consequences were greater. The Minutemen salvaged only a field goal on the drive, but the momentum swung to the home team.

"The funny thing about it is that we work on field goals and blocking field goals and kicking field goals for five minutes every day," URI coach Tim Stowers said. "So it was very disappointing that we couldn't stop 4th-and-6 on a field goal. I thought that that was a big momentum change in the football game."

Much goes into a simple play like a fake field goal. Once the ball is snapped, as Woodward says, the play is pretty standard. From the stands, it looked like a mindless, run-straight-ahead-and-pray ordeal. But several external, and sometimes uncontrollable, factors contribute to the play.

First is the field alignment. The offense needs to be on the right side of the field, near or on the right hash-mark. Because Koepplin kicks with his right leg, Woodward lines up on the right to hold the ball. It is easier to break through the line if Woodward is closer to the outside of the defense.

Second is the direction of the wind – whether it's with the team or against it – and third is the distance to the first-down mark.

In this case, UMass needed six yards for the first, which probably added to the surprise factor. URI surely wasn't expecting a fake when the Minutemen needed a long six yards.

"I eyed it in my head where I had to get to," Woodward said. "I knew I had made contact around [the first-down mark] so I had to make sure that I got the extra yard or so. I barely got it though."

Woodward has only seen action twice this season – against Stony Brook and William & Mary – and had his most important play of his season on Saturday, as a holder.

"I enjoyed it," he said. "I was ready for it. I kind of wanted to get in the end zone."

The Minutemen only got three points on the drive, but outscored the Rams 41-7 after URI scored its second touchdown with 6:16 left in the first quarter.

Once UMass pulled away, it was another boring afternoon of winning. Homecoming Day didn't disappoint. The alumni got a win and some big plays from Baylark and Coen.

But don't forget about the fake field goal. Those don't come around too often.

reach for the Maroon and White, as it trailed by two with fewer than 30 minutes to play, but a freak goal brought the game to within one. Rams freshman goalkeeper Amy Thomas came out of the net to kick the ball to a teammate, but the ball bounced off UMass' Britt Canfield and slowly rolled into the unoccupied goal.

"It was luck," Canfield said. "I just jumped up, hoping for some sort of deflection and it just happened to go in the goal. I was a little surprised but it was a good goal that picked our intensity level up."

"We knew every time their keeper got the ball it would be an adventure and it was," Rudy said. "We finally got a hold of one, and we were almost able to get a few more."

The jump in intensity level for both teams picked up considerably after the goal by Canfield. Junior defender Christina Nunes picked up the first yellow card of the season for any UMass player when she knocked the opposing goalie down with 11 minutes left to play.

The Minutewomen were able to put pressure on Rhode Island in the final 10 minutes with numerous scoring opportunities, but were unable to get the equalizer. The Rams got a big scare when the game seemed all but over. Canfield took a shot with two seconds remaining that almost went over the head of Thomas.

"It's a tough loss," Rudy said. "I'm disappointed by the first 45 minutes, but the good part is we didn't give up [when we were] down two. A lot of teams would have folded. We played with a lot of excitement and created a lot of chances. I liked our response at the end, but it was too late.

"I'd like to compliment our freshmen," he added. "They came to play. As soon as they stepped on the field things were happening. I was pleased with [Sydney] Stoll, [Christina] Adams and [Katie] Ruggles. They really impacted the game with their energy. They hustled and anticipated, and that really has to go into my thinking on what we do from here on in."

The loss puts the Minutewomen in a difficult spot in the A-10 with just two conference games remaining.

"This makes next weekend so critical now," Rudy said. "We have two games left to get points. I'm pleased we made a game of it today, but we made it tough on ourselves."

Duo from Iceland leads Rams over UMass

By Dominic Polt
Collegian Staff

When you scroll down an official roster for any given athletic team, it tells you the basic background information on every player: name, jersey number, class, and hometown. It's a routine for many UMass fans when the Massachusetts women's soccer team (10-8, 6-1 A-10) hosts a visitor.

Before the start of yesterday's frustrating 2-1 loss to the Rhode Island Rams, spectators entertained themselves by looking over the game's program: senior defender Jennifer Sayles is from Warwick, Conn., freshman Kassandra Spitler hails from Montoursville, Pa., etc.

Thumbing down a list loses its intrigue after a while – and Rhode Island's women's soccer team (10-5, 4-3 A-10) is no exception. Until, however, you get to junior Thorunn Jonsdottir and sophomore Dora Larusdottir. The two blonde-haired, blue-eyed midfielders come from a town not all that local – Reykjavik, Iceland.

In yesterday's matchup, Larusdottir netted the game's first goal, putting an unassisted shot past UMass goalkeeper Kristin Walker in the 22nd minute. The tally proved to be the game winner, as the Rams left the Pioneer Valley with a win.

"It felt good," Larusdottir said of the bucket.

In the week leading up to the contest, UMass coach Jim Rudy warned his team to prepare well for the Scandinavian juggernauts – and rightfully so. The two play with a vibrant and sound style of play unfamiliar to American athletes.

The players that are born and raised on the other side of the Atlantic are programmed to play a type of soccer that is errorless in method and execution. That immaculately technical breeding is visible when they square off against opponents in the States.

"I don't think they play women's soccer; they play the international game," Rudy said. "It's technical. It's tactical. They don't waste balls. You never saw them playing balls to people that weren't there or people open 10 yards away and miss them."

"They grow up with international football all the time. They read it, they saw it, they watched it. It's part of their lives every day. Our kids only see it when there's training. It's a different view of the game completely," Rudy said.

Jonsdottir, an international business major and team co-captain, is fourth on the squad in total points with 10. She has registered two goals and six assists, with a .529 shots on goal percentage.

The Reykjavik Secondary High School graduate has played for the under-17, under-19 and under-21 Icelandic National Teams since 2000 and was selected to the Senior Icelandic National Team in 2003.

Larusdottir, a finance major, is a graduate of a high school called the Commercial College of Iceland and has recorded four goals for eight total points on the season.

She, too, has played for the under-17 and under-21 Icelandic National Team. In her time with the team, she competed in the Nordic Cup, European Cup and World Cup games.

So much fine-tuning in Iceland is making it evident here in America.

"They're both ridiculously technical," URI coach Zac Shaw said. "The sophistication sort of comes along with being European. The ability to see the field and the ideas about space and time, it's just so different. They're both big-time talent. They just provide something so different. I think they're a good mix with the rest of the team."

Rhode Island is now tied in first place with Charlotte, and Shaw can't wait to see what his two European gems have in store

Rudy stressed to his team the importance of keeping the two Icelandic nationals contained, but in the end, it wasn't enough.

"If you let them get started, that's what they do. And we let them get started," Rudy said. "I knew they would probably get at us some. But I knew we were going to be able to get balls out at them. But once we got out, they did well at opening up and getting open and making plays."

The perfection and execution of the duo's play was certainly noticed and respected by members of the UMass team.

As an avid student of the game, UMass senior defender-midfielder and Captain Nadia Villarroel appreciated seeing a different genre of soccer culture.

"European soccer is very different from American soccer. They're really incredible players," Villarroel said. "I think Jenny [Roehrig] and Vanessa [Patry] dominated a lot of the balls in the air. But there were some periods of the game where the Icelandic girls had a lot of space to move around."

The Icelandic players were understandably shy when asked to comment on the game, but they would consistently finish each other's sentences.

"We're still in control of our own destinies," they said before getting on the team bus.

Playoff hopes still alive after big weekend

By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

The playoff hopes of the Massachusetts field hockey team (6-12, 3-3 Atlantic 10) can no longer be described as dim. The Minutewomen triumphed in both games over the weekend – defeating West Chester, 2-1, and La Salle, 4-3.

These victories add significance to this week's matchups with New Hampshire and Rhode Island.

As the second half of Sunday's game began, the Maroon and White found itself in quite the predicament.

If the Minutewomen were to win the game, they would need to overcome the three-goal deficit that La Salle amassed in the game's first period.

Poor passing and defensive breakdowns marred the first-half performance of the Minutewomen.

"They weren't playing with a sense of urgency," Shea said about her team's performance in the first half.

La Salle dominated the first half, outshooting UMass 8-2. Although La Salle only forced five penalty corners to UMass' three, the Explorers were able to capitalize.

WC	1
La Salle	3

Their first score came eight minutes into the game. Kara Harpel took a feed from Amy Comstock off a penalty corner, and slid it past freshman goalkeeper Sarah Williams.

Harpel would double the Explorers' lead late in the first half when she broke in alone after intercepting a pass in the Neutral Zone.

As time expired in the first half, La Salle recorded another penalty corner and capitalized. Colleen Nesbitt scored off the rebound, and La Salle carried a comfortable 3-0 lead heading into the locker room.

Shea wasn't the only person vocal in the halftime huddle. The players that were unavailable to the coach due to injury provided those in uniform with tactical insights they picked up from the sideline.

"We always give them an opportunity to speak up at the half," Shea said. "Today, it was a collective effort. The whole unit spoke up."

The Minutewomen took advantage of a penalty corner to kick off the rally. Freshman midfielder Cher King ripped a shot through the wall of La Salle defenders to cut the lead to two.

The team's leading goal scorer, sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie, took over from that point. Midway through the half, Gillespie found herself open in front of the La Salle goal. King executed a perfect cross pass and Gillespie slid it past the La Salle net minder.

The game-tying goal came late in the half. Gillespie tipped home a feed from sophomore Katelyn Orlando to deadlock the game.

The Minutewomen had a few opportunities to win the game in regulation, but couldn't take advantage.

"We had the chances to win it in regulation," Shea said. "There was no letdown. They still wanted to win it in regulation."

UMass was certainly the aggressor in the game's extra session. It held a 4-0 shot advantage in overtime.

The decisive fourth goal came two minutes into the overtime period.

A La Salle foul gave the Minutewomen a free hit, deep in the Explorers' zone. Junior defender Kristina DoRosario gained possession and got free, eventually locating an open King. King took the pass and blasted it home while falling to the turf.

"[King] has played really well lately," Shea said. "She's really come along."

Sunday's win puts the Minutewomen in good position for a berth in the A-10 Tournament. The conference's top four teams qualify for postseason play.

The Minutewomen also saw action on Friday – defeating West Chester 2-1.

A comeback was a necessity in this match as well; however, they weren't in as big of a deficit.

West Chester kicked the scoring off at the 19-minute mark. Samantha Krick scored off a rebound. The goal came amidst a flurry of shots from the West Chester offense. Williams stopped the first two, but found herself out of position on the third. The score came shortly after the Golden Rams' first penalty corner.

The Minutewomen would do all the rest of the scoring. Junior forward Rachael Mervine scored her fifth goal of the year at the 27:40 mark. The goal was the product of a flawless one-time pass from Orlando.

Junior midfielder Kara Murphy took a shot on goal that Orlando redirected. The score proved to be the game winner.

Shea wasn't especially pleased with the victory, however.

"We didn't play particularly well," Shea said. "We played a little scared. But in the second half we broke out a little bit and played to win the game, and not like we were trying to protect something."

Junior midfielder Kara Murphy has started in 17 of UMass' 18 games this season. She has seven points on one goal and five assists.

Seymour injures left elbow in Sunday's win

By John Wawrow
Associated Press

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. – Patriots defensive lineman Richard Seymour hopes his sore left elbow won't prevent him from practicing this week.

"We'll see how it feels in the morning," Seymour said, following the Patriots' 28-6 win over Buffalo on Sunday. "It'll probably be pretty sore. But we'll see what it is and take it day by day."

Seymour did not return after helping limit Willis McGahee to a 2-yard gain late in the second quarter. He said someone came down on his arm while it was planted on the turf.

He spent the second half on the sideline with his elbow wrapped.

Patriots also lost starting safety Eugene Wilson, who hurt his right leg in the third quarter and did not return.

Coach Bill Belichick did not provide an update on either player's condition. New England, which played without tight end Daniel Graham (ankle) and offensive tackle Nick Kaczur (shoulder), plays at Minnesota next weekend.

The Bills lost reserve defensive end Ryan Denney, who hurt his right hamstring in the first quarter and did not return. Coach Dick Jauron did not provide an injury update.

It was the latest injury to affect the Bills' defensive line, which is minus rookie defensive tackle John McCargo, who was placed on injured reserve two weeks ago with a broken left foot.

Defensive end Anthony Hargrove made his debut for the Bills after being acquired last week in a trade with St. Louis. The third-year veteran finished with two tackles.

UMass men and women dominate Seawolves

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Despite being on the road Saturday afternoon, while the rest of UMass celebrated Homecoming Weekend, the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams made the best of their situation.

Both teams dominated Stony Brook in their first dual meet of the season at the Pritchard Gymnasium Pool in Stony Brook, N.Y. The men's team (1-0) won 185-112, while the women (1-0) swam to victory by the score of 190-110. The teams combined for 23 wins in the 32-event meet. Each team also swept first, second and third in three separate events.

The Maroon and White hosts Army in its first home meet of the season this Saturday at 2 p.m. The teams swim at the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. Pool in Boyden Gymnasium.

The meets are scored by awarding points to the top finishers in each event. In the individual races, nine points are awarded for first place, four for second, three for third, two for fourth and one for fifth.

The relay events award the first place team 11 points, four to second and two to the third place team.

The scoring system places emphasis on winning the events, but it also rewards teams for having good depth.

Senior Liz Lovejoy starred for the Minutewomen, winning three individual events and swimming the final leg of the 400-yard relay.

She won the 200-yard butterfly with a time of 2:11.13. The senior also took first place in both the 100- and 500-yard freestyle events. Lovejoy swam a 54.59 in the 100 and a 5:20.03 in the 500.

Junior Samantha Demty won the 200-yard individual medley with a time of 2:16.30. She also took second place in the 200-yard butterfly, finishing only two seconds behind Lovejoy.

UMass women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb was satisfied with Demty's performance.

"Samantha continues to show that she is one of the best swimmers we have in the program," Newcomb said. "I look for her to earn a lot of points for us this season."

Senior Vanessa Flequel led the Minutewomen's sweep of first, second and third in the 100-yard backstroke. Her time of 1:03.96 was just fast enough to beat her teammates, freshman Elizabeth Walsh and junior Susan Allen.

The Maroon and White took the top three spots in the 100-yard fly as well. Sophomore Christa Narus won the race with a time of 1:00.76.

The Minutewomen also enjoyed success in the relay events. The team of Narus, junior Allison Volpe, sophomore Jackie Porter and Lovejoy won the 400-yard freestyle relay.

The women took spots two, three and four in the meet's opening event, the 200-yard medley relay.

On the men's side, senior Evan Swisher and sophomore Nate Bromage won two events apiece.

Swisher earned first place in the meet's only two backstroke events. He won the 100-yard race with a time of 1:52.50 and the 200-yard race with 52.86. The senior's performance in the 200 was seven seconds better than the second place finisher, UMass freshman Trevor Ziegler.

Bromage swam a 52.08 to win the 100-yard butterfly. He added a first-place finish in the 200-yard butterfly with a time of 1:49.62. The sophomore edged teammate AJ Vozella by one-hundredth of a second. Freshman Tim Smith took third place, finishing only 16-hundredths of a second behind Bromage.

The Minutemen dominated two other freestyle events, the 500- and 1,000-yard races. In the 500, sophomore Tristan Partridge swam a 4:55.70 to take first. Sophomore Brad Sloan and freshman Brendan Jones took second and third, respectively.

Freshman Justin Brooks won the 1,000-yard freestyle in 10:09.86. Sloan and sophomore Mike Prout finished in second and third place, respectively.

Although the Minutemen won 12 individual races, they failed to place higher than second place in either of the relay events.

Even with having to change their techniques and strategies due to facility constraints, both the men's and women's divers posted strong performances. Sophomore Karen Upperco won both the one and three meter dives. She posted a score of 207.96 in the one meter and 220.80 in the three meter. Senior Mary Jenkins finished second in both events.

Junior R.J. Rappe won the one meter dive by nearly 30 points for the Minutemen. Rappe took first again in the three meter with a score of 271.28. Sophomore Byron Johnson finished fourth in the one meter dive and third in the three meter.

New England off to its best start since '97

By John Wawrow
Associated Press

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y.—Tom Brady and the New England Patriots have become so accustomed to winning and particularly against Buffalo that even lopsided victories are no longer satisfying.

Take Brady, the perfectionist, for example: The Patriots had just routed the Bills 28-6 on Sunday, a game in which Brady methodically engineered four scoring drives. And yet the quarterback was kicking himself for a pass that he insists he shouldn't have thrown.

"Stupidity by me," Brady said.

He wasn't referring to an interception or incompletion. Rather, Brady was discussing a 5-yard pass on the run that found Doug Gabriel open in the end zone with the game already out of reach in the fourth quarter.

"Lucky," Brady said.

The Patriots (5-1) remain atop the AFC East after Corey Dillon scored two touchdowns rushing, Brady added two TD passes, and a stingy defense did the rest to get New England off to its second-best start since 1997.

And the Patriots continued their domination of Buffalo, winning their seventh straight and 12th in their last 13 meetings against the AFC East rivals. The Bills (2-5) continue to unravel, having lost three straight heading into their bye week.

"Our performance out there was embarrassing," linebacker London Fletcher said. "It's just not good football. It's the same mistakes over and over again."

New England has won three straight since a 17-7 loss to Denver, and five straight on the road, a stretch in which the Patriots have outscored their opponents 156-64.

"I feel pretty good right now just because we won the game," said linebacker Roseyelt Colvin. "But I do feel we can get better."

It's hard to imagine how, considering the Patriots, refreshed from a bye week off, had the game in hand by the end of the first quarter when Dillon scored his second touchdown on a 12-yard run to put New England ahead 14-3.

The defense then did its part, forcing three turnovers and limited the Bills to 256 yards offense and 13 first downs and only four in the second half.

Brady, who finished a modest 18-of-27 for 195 yards passing and no turnovers, sealed the win with two scoring drives in the second half, including a 35-yard TD pass to Chad Jackson.

The Bills defense couldn't get the Patriots off the field, allowing their opponents to convert 8-of-15 third-down attempts. And then there were the penalties.

The most undisciplined came when Buffalo defensive end Chris Kelsay was penalized for unnecessary roughness for delivering a late hit on Brady, who had given himself up by falling to the turf on third down at the Bills 24. The Patriots capitalized on the next play when Dillon scored his second touchdown.

Buffalo's offense wasn't much better.

J.P. Losman went 16-of-25 for 193 yards passing, but committed three turnovers, two fumbles and an interception. The second-year starter has now committed eight turnovers, including five interceptions, in his past three games.

"We have to grow up," said guard Chris Villarrial. "I'm frustrated and the team is frustrated."

"It was a long day," added Coach Dick Jauron. "We continued to make foolish errors that really don't give us much of a chance to win the game."

So much for how well the Bills competed in a 19-17 loss at New England to start the season.

Rhode to victory

Senior running back Steve Baylark picked up his first career 200-yard game in Saturday's 41-16 win over Rhode Island. He rushed for 235 yards on 26 carries, and had two touchdowns on the day. Baylark was named Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week on Sunday.

Minutemen survive early scare, crush URI

BY JON PELLAND

For the first time in a long time, Massachusetts football coach Don Brown can back up his statements concerning his team's ability to deal with adversity.

After going down early Saturday afternoon, the Minutemen surged back and defeated Rhode Island, 41-16, in front of 15,522 fans at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

UMass (6-1, 4-0 Atlantic 10) travels to Brookline to face Northeastern this weekend. Brown coached the Huskies from 2000-03 before returning to Amherst prior to the 2004 season. The game is set for a 12 p.m. kickoff.

With just over six minutes remaining in the opening period, Rams quarterback Derek Cassidy punched the ball into the end zone to put URI up by 10. 13-3. A 59-yard pass from Cassidy to Jimmy Hughes up the middle of the field set up the score. Hughes went in motion from his wing position on the left side and streaked up the middle, catching. UMass safety Brandon Smith out of position.

"When you play [an option offense] usually you have one big run and one big pass against you, and that's what we had," Brown explained.

It looked as if the Minutemen were in trouble for the first time since they went down early against Villanova on Sept. 16. Freshman Tony Nelson fumbled the opening kickoff Saturday, paving the way for the Rams first score – a nine-yard touchdown run by Joe Casey, but Colin Gallagher missed the extra point.

UMass got on the board with a Chris Koepplin field goal, set up by a 7-yard run by backup quarterback Scott Woodward on a fake field goal just four plays earlier. On fourth-and-six, Woodward took the snap and barreled straight ahead for seven yards and a fresh set of downs.

"It certainly was a little bit of a rough start," Brown said. "I'm not worried about us being tested. Our senior leadership has been excellent. Our guys have stayed together and stayed collective. They're passionate about the game, but I also think we're very

UMass pulls out all the stops against Rams

Plays like this are always exciting.

They release fans from redundant monotony and shoot excitement into a normal situation. This play, in particular, was completely unexpected.

The Massachusetts football team went down 6-0 early on Saturday, against Rhode Island at Homecoming Day. Halfback Tony Nelson lined up to receive the opening kickoff after UMass won the coin toss.

After dodging a few tackles, Nelson fumbled at the 20-yard line, and the Rams recovered it for a touchdown.

The Minutemen didn't get much of a challenge in their previous three games and this one, on Homecoming Weekend, looked like the long-awaited test.

UMass received another kickoff (the coaches removed Nelson in favor of Courtney Robinson on the next return) and started its first drive at its own 22-yard line.

Quarterback Liam Coen, on UMass' first play from scrimmage, fired downfield to wideout Rasheed Rancher for a 22-yard gain. Another Coen strike led Brandon Condon up the field for 19 yards to the Rhode Island 44-yard line.

But URI made a temporary stop, forcing a 4th-and-6 from the Rams' 29. Out came kicker Chris Koepplin for the field goal — a good momentum stopper after the quick URI score.

Backup quarterback Scott Woodward is the regular holder, and Brown hinted at the fake field goal possibility earlier in the season with a capable quarterback taking the snaps. Nobody thought it would be a running play though.

Woodward took the snap from center Alex Miller and put the ball down. Koepplin took the normal two-step run to the ball but ran past Woodward looking for a linebacker to block.

"There's the snap and then I act like I'm putting [the ball] down for a second," Woodward said. "Koepplin comes through and lead blocks for me. It's a pretty normal running play."

But there's nothing normal about the play call.

Woodward picked the ball up after Koepplin ran by and barreled into the pile of linemen and linebackers. Common knowledge indicates that a backup quarterback would end up face down in the McGuirk grass after an encounter with a defensive

Ofosu's goal not enough to get the win

BY JEREMY RICE

The Massachusetts men's soccer team hit another bump in the road Sunday in the midst of its push for the postseason. The Minutemen (8-6-2, 2-4-1 A-10) fell to Rhode Island (9-4-4, 6-1-0 A-10) in a 2-1 overtime battle, badly damaging their chances at making the Atlantic 10 tournament.

URI	2

UMass will conclude its season this weekend with a pair of conference games. A-10 frontrunners Saint Louis and Duquesne will visit Rudd Field to wrap up the Minutemen's regular season schedule.

The Billikens play the Maroon and White Friday at 3 p.m., and the Dukes come to Amherst for Senior Day, Sunday at 1 p.m.

Forward Prince Ofosu scored his third goal of the year midway through the first half. In the 19th minute, the sophomore received a pass from freshman Michael Jejna and beat URI goalkeeper Chris Pennock one-on-one for the score and the 1-0 lead.

The play was Jejna's second assist of the year. His first helper came in the first game of the season against Maine. That point was also earned on an Ofosu goal.

The defense was caught out of position, and Jejna took advantage of it, setting up Ofosu for the score. URI's Stephen Scalzo made a desperation attempt to keep the ball out of the goal, but the ball hit the back of the net to put UMass on top.

Sunday's match marked the second straight game in which Ofosu has scored a goal. His first came in the season opener, a 2-0 victory over Maine.

The glory was short-lived, however, as the Rams tied the game later in the first half. In the 32nd minute, junior Dawid Badecki sent a free kick past UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons into the lower left corner of the net to knot the game at 1-1.

Badecki has been a force in the games that have counted. In six A-10 wins for the Rams, he has tallied either a goal or an assist.

The second half went scoreless, although the Rams outshot the Minutemen 12-4, including a span of seven straight shots for URI without a return shot from UMass. The Rams also had four corner kicks; UMass had one.

Simmons remained solid for the Minutemen, stopping all five shots on net from URI in the second half.

In the fifth minute of the first overtime period, junior Lukasz Tumicz scored the game-winner on a feed from Jeffrey Gonsalves.

Gonsalves came down the right side of the field, and sent a pass across the box to Tumicz, who sent the Minutemen home with his fifth goal of the year.

Rhode Island's win keeps the Rams tied with Duquesne for second place in the A-10. Saint Louis maintained its hold on the top spot in the standings with a win over Temple.

With the loss, the Minutemen are tied for eighth place in the conference. To reach sixth place and grab a spot in the A-10 tournament, they will need help from a number of teams.

UMass will have to beat the first- and second-place teams in the conference and get help in the form of losses from Xavier, Fordham and La Salle.

Sophomore forward Prince Ofosu scored his third goal of the season in yesterday's 2-1 overtime loss to Rhode Island. He now has eight points on the year. UMass is in eighth place in the A-10 after the loss.

Rhode Island spoils Senior Day for UM

Senior Day for the Massachusetts women's soccer team (10-5, 4-3 Atlantic 10) was spoiled by the University of Rhode Island in a 2-1 loss on Sunday afternoon at Rudd Field.

Rhode Island (10-8, 6-1 A-10) struck first in a key conference matchup in the 22nd minute on a goal from sophomore midfielder Dora Larusdottir. Her initial shot was stopped on a terrific save by UMass goalkeeper Kristin Walker, but the rebound came right back to Larusdottir and she was able to best Walker on the second attempt.

"She [Larusdottir] got a nice rebound and she was in the right place at the right time," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "She was opportunistic and was able to put it in. She played great all game."

The Minutewomen entered halftime trailing by a goal, and it left Rudy disappointed in his team's performance.

"With a game of this importance we needed to show up in the first half and play, and we didn't," he said. "We didn't exhibit any passion until the second half."

The final half of the game began much like the first half did, when Rhode Island connected for a goal, just under seven minutes into the second period. This time it was Rams leading scorer, junior forward Deb Nelson, who scored on a header from a centering pass from senior forward Lauren Forgione.

"The second goal was not stoppable," Rudy said. "She received a good pass and it was a great header. [Nelson is] a terrific player who has had a great season. We knew she was good in the air and she proved it."

The game appeared to be out of

Students feel uninformed in SGA election

BY KEVIN FOLEY AND RYAN RICHARDSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

An informal poll of students taken during last week's Student Government Association Senate elections showed that most students didn't feel like they were making an informed vote.

"Voting is important in a democracy, but if you don't know what candidate stands for, what's the point?" asked Seth Quinn, a University of Massachusetts senior, one student among many who felt ill-prepared for voting.

This underlines the result of the referendum ratified last week to reduce the size of the SGA Senate from approximately 90 senators to 49, which passed with 78 percent of the vote. The impulse was guided by a desire to increase accountability amongst the senators; last year, several gained their seats with as few as two votes.

"Reducing the size of the senate is not the main goal," said Elvis Mendez, SGA president. According to Mendez, the main goal is to create a more manageable and efficient senate that is more accessible to the student body.

The SGA aims to increase senator accountability by coupling this reduction in size with changes to the campaign process, including a possible lengthening of the campaign period.

"[There may be] major shifts in senate cycles, allowing students to be more involved," Mendez said.

Currently candidates have only four days to campaign

UMass student dies in accident after car flips over

University of Massachusetts student Bradley N. Skikne died early Sunday morning after his 2004 Toyota Matrix drove up an embankment and flipped while driving on Amherst Road in Pelham.

The accident occurred around 4 a.m. Skikne, a 22-year old resident of Middleton, was pronounced dead on the scene.

Skikne, who was not wearing a seat belt, was ejected through the sun roof of the vehicle and sustained massive head wounds, said Police Chief Edward Fleury of Pelham.

The road was closed for four hours following the crash, and state police are currently still investigating the incident.

Skikne was enrolled at UMass as a philosophy and biochemistry/molecular biology major.

"I know he will be greatly missed by us all. And I know he will always be in our hearts, he was one in a million," wrote Gwenn Eva Fedderman in mass email addressed to friends of Skikne.

Digital textbooks used to ease students' expenses

BY CAITLIN QUINN AND EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

Browsing the Internet for cheap or even free products is nothing new to the average college student. But newly added to this list of products are textbooks, one of the biggest sources of college students' disappearing funds.

Students across the country are turning from traditional print resources to electronic ones.

According to the Government Accountability Office (GAO), there was a 186 percent increase in the price of textbooks between 1986 and 2004.

The price of textbooks dramatically increases the expenses college students have each semester. The GAO reported in 2005 that the average college student spent $900 on books and supplies, which is 26 percent of the cost of tuition and fees at average four-year public universities.

The textbook industry is a $6.5 billion-a-year business. The increase comes from the fact that publishers can only profit from new books sold at high prices. To try to compete with the used textbook market, publishing companies put out new editions with only slight variations.

"The textbooks often are not improved, but they almost always are more expensive," said Dr. Frank Werner, an associate professor of finance at Fordham University, in an editorial submitted to the New York Times.

In these new editions, publishers include supplemental materials such as CD-roms, online passwords and workbooks in order to increase the price. The New York Times also claims that most teachers don't use the supplemental materials.

Frustrations about rising prices have led to the creation of many Web sites that provide free online texts. Freeload Press (textbookmedia.com), for example, publishes the book for free and offsets the costs with commercial advertisements. They also sell print versions of the books for about 65 percent less than the competitive price.

The University of Massachusetts is now involved in this new technology using a program called eBooks. The library rents the rights to certain books for an annual fee, making these books available to students so they don't have to buy hard copies.

Access to eBooks is free for students. UMass uses marketing books24x7.com and netlibrary.com as a source for the books.

"Both offer a lot more books then we have access to, but we don't take all that they offer," says Jim Kelly, humanities bibliographer for the W.E.B. DuBois Library. "What we try to get from these are those that we would otherwise not buy."

The Lamar Soutter Library of UMass Medical School's Web site is part of the ebooks system. It includes 261 online biomedical textbooks.

UMass also uses the E-reserves digital library. "Ereserves is used for excerpts, class notes, and anything short," says Janet Hughes, an employee of the UMass Library. "E-reserve is not a substitute for textbooks; it's for supplemental readings."

On E-reserves, only 10 percent of a text can be put online. Professor Stephen Simurda of the Journalism department chose Ereserves over an expensive course packet this semester. "It seemed like $150 or more was a lot for the reading packet," he said.

Another professor at UMass, who chooses to remain anonymous, uses his own textbook for one of his courses, and makes the text available for free online in order to make the material for his course more accessible to students. He wants to "save students money" and make the material easily accessible for Washington Rep. David Wu said that one way college education can be more accessible for all students is by making textbooks more affordable.

Soldier missing in Baghdad

BY QUASSIM ABDUL-ZAHRA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A U.S. soldier in Baghdad was reported missing late Monday, and residents said American forces sealed the central Karadah district and were conducting door-to-door searches. Other reports claimed he was an Army translator of Iraqi descent and was abducted.

A military official in Washington said the missing service member was a translator and that the initial report was he may have been abducted. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the information was not cleared for release.

An employee at Baghdad's al-Furat TV, which was raided by American forces earlier Monday, said the U.S. forces conducting the search told him they were looking for an abducted American officer of Iraqi descent.

The employee said U.S. soldiers and Mouwatik al-Rubaie, the government's national security adviser who went to the station during the raid, told him the missing officer had left to join family members in Baghdad's Karadah district. It wasn't immediately possible to clarify the reports.

The officer's wife, also an Iraqi-American, was reportedly in the capital visiting family, according to the reports passed on by the al-Furat employee. He refused to allow use of his name fearing retribution.

Haitham al-Husseini, a close aide of Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, said he arrived at al-Furat station to negotiate the departure of the American troops and was told by a U.S. Army colonel that they were looking for an American soldier who was kidnapped.

Search dogs unable to find missing girl

Maura Murray, a former UMass student, disappeared over two years ago after crashing her car.

HAVERHILL, N.H. Specially trained dogs searched over the weekend for a University of Massachusetts at Amherst student who disappeared after crashing her car.

But the cadaver-sniffing dogs failed to find Maura Murray, who was last seen near the crash site on Route 112 more than two years ago.

Donations helped pay for the search by volunteer dog handlers in the Woodsville area. Private investigators also have been working on the case.

Don Mason, of the New Hampshire League of Investigators, said the dogs picked up some scents, but nothing conclusive.

Mass. rethinks school standards

BY MELISSA TRUJILLO

BOSTON — Lawrence Public Schools Superintendent Wilfredo T. Laboy says all districts in Massachusetts are working hard to achieve the goals the state has set for high school students — and many are improving.

But with more than a third of his 10th-graders failing Massachusetts' math and English language arts standardized tests, he doesn't believe now is the right time to raise graduation requirements.

"I thought the goal was to not leave any child behind, not to put them further behind," Laboy said.

The state Board of Education scheduled a vote for Tuesday during its monthly meeting on an amendment that would be the first change to what students must score on the MCAS to graduate since 2001, when students began taking the tests as a graduation requirement.

Under the amendment, sophomores beginning with the class of 2010 would have to complete one of two requirements to graduate:

•Score 240 in math and English language arts, which is considered having a proficient grasp of the material. Currently, 10th graders need a score of 220 in the two subjects, which labels the students as needing improvement.

•Score 220 on the tests and create an "Education Proficiency Plan" for the subjects they aren't proficient in. Under the plan, they would be required to complete a review of their skills, successfully complete courses that would move them to proficiency during the rest of their high school career and complete annual assessments to determine whether they are making progress.

Board of Education chairman James Peyser said current standards don't guarantee students are ready for college or a career. The federal No Child Left Behind law also requires all students to be proficient in

Patrick calls for support of private economy

BY DAVID WEBER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FRAMINGHAM, Mass. Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick borrowed a page from the Republican play book Monday, stressing the importance of private industry in boosting the state's economy.

During a speech to business leaders in Framingham, Patrick said, "I know that businesses, not governments, create jobs. But it is a role and responsibility of government to create the conditions that enable businesses to grow and succeed. Democrats in particular have to get comfortable again talking about and working to support the private economy."

Patrick said state and local regulations on business and construction need to be streamlined so companies can avoid startup delays.

Meanwhile, Kerry Healey toured the Media and Technology Charter High School in Boston to highlight her call to lift the state limit on the number of new charter schools. Healey has said there should be no cap.

During the visit, Healey also renewed her push for a one-on-one debate with Patrick. Most polls show Healey trailing. Patrick and Healey wants a prime time debate with just the two major party candidates, which she hopes will better showcase their differences.

Patrick has said he opposes a one-on-one debate. He repeated that message again on Monday saying that all four candidates on the ballot — including Independent Christy Mihos and Green-Rainbow candidate Grace Ross — should take part in any public debate.

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick stresses the importance of private industry in boosting the state's economy.

Mendez appointing committee to increase student involvement between the certification of their nomination and the end of the elections. While students who complete the nominations process receive $14 for p rinting, it seems that the campaign is insufficient to generate awareness among the electorate about what each candidate stands for.

Mendez also plans to appoint at least one ad hoc committee to look into increasing student participation in the SGA.

In addition, there are plans to place greater emphasis on already existing programs like "Back to the People", where senators meet with their constituents once a month in the Dining Commons throughout campus.

"[Senators] don't know what people from Southwest want unless they talk to people from Southwest," Mendez said. "All of this is being done to open up the SGA to the student body.

"The SGA doesn't have a budget of $1.4 million, the student body does," Mendez said.

"Students who want to vote should get proactive," said SGA Chancellor of Elections Priyanka Pant.

As more candidates use social networking services like Facebook.com to manage their campaigns, it becomes even easier for voters to actively seek out information about candidates.

In Mendez's view, this round of elections indicates a positive step for Senate accountability. However, there was a four-way tie for a commuter seat in which the candidates received only five votes each.

"In the past, the SGA has had senators who didn't even want to run get elected with one or two votes," said SGA Speaker Peter Barros. "However, with this round of elections and with the changes in the number of senators, we're seeing much higher voter participation and support for senators. I have a feeling we're going to have a great year."

reading and math by 2014.

"We need to strike a balance between continuing to challenge the bulk of schools in the state without leaving some students and schools behind," said Peyser, who added he was hopeful the amendment would pass Tuesday. "I think this is the right time."

Since becoming a graduation requirement, MCAS scores have slowly risen for all students. In 2001, just 68 percent of sopho mores earned scores of 220 or higher on their first try. By 2006, that increased to 84 percent of all students.

Those scoring proficient or advanced on the test rose from 38 percent of students in 2001 to 59 percent in 2006.

Peyser said the scores showed MCAS has helped drive schools to succeed, and 10th-graders are capable of reaching state-set goals. But Laboy said all students should be able to reach the current graduation requirements before the state decides to make them tougher.

"Let us get them there," he said. "I hope the children don't despair, lose hope and walk away from us."

The Department of Education should instead focus on increasing funding to the districts that need it most, Laboy said.

"We're being asked to do more with less," he said.

students of online courses, who also use the book.

The professor said that most of his students use the online version instead of buying the book.

Inadditionto freeresources, cheaper textbooks are now coming in the form of CD-ROMs. Etext.net is one Web site that sells textbooks in CD-ROM or PDF file form for cheaper than store-bought textbooks.

There are also drawbacks to online sources, Simurda says. "It's not perfect. It's easier for students to physically have a book in their hand."

Simurda has suspicions that not all students do the readings for class because they're online.

"Books are portable and easy to mark up," said Kelly.

Many students are simply more comfortable reading books, as well. Sitting and staring at a computer screen for long periods of time can lead to eye strain, headaches, fatigue and difficulty focusing, according to pasadenaeye.com, the Web site for an eye care facility in Texas.

Hurricane threatens California

BY MARK STEVENSON

SAN JOSE DEL CABO, Mexico — Hurricane Paul roared toward the southern tip of the Baja California peninsula Monday, becoming the third hurricane this season to threaten the resort popular with Hollywood's elite.

Paul had maximum sustained winds of 90 mph and was moving north at about 5 mph, the National Hurricane Center in Miami said. The storm's winds weakened from 105 mph earlier and was downgraded to a Category 1 storm, the center said.

Forecasters predicted it could hit Mexico's Pacific coast by Wednesday.

A hurricane watch was issued for the tip of Baja California, which has been battered by two other hurricanes this season. The storm was on a course that would bring it just south of the peninsula late Tuesday before plowing into Mexico's Pacific coast near the resort of Mazatlan. At 4 p.m. EDT, the storm was about 420 miles southwest of Cabo San Lucas.

"We ask ourselves, Why on this date in October?'" said Francisco Cota, civil defense director for Los Cabos, adding that officials try to "stress that the season is not over yet."

Cota said officials planned to meet later to decide whether to evacuate people.

A light rain fell in Cabo San Lucas as employees at the upscale Hotel Finisterra passed out the latest weather report to keep guests updated on the storm. They also were scrambling to organize indoor activities.

"We want to make sure we have entertainment for people during the storm to keep people tranquil and safe and provided with food and entertainment: movies, board games, interactive games with staff like bingo," said Patricia Garcia, concierge at Hotel Finisterra.

Some, however, weren't sticking around for the storm. Long lines snaked from ticket counters at the airport in San Jose del Cabo.

Charles Bataglia, 38, of Chicago, cut his weeklong deep sea fishing trip short but was unable to get a flight home. Instead, he bought a ticket for Guadalajara in western Mexico.

"I didn't want to be trapped for four or five days. I have two young children. My wife works full time. I work full time," said Bataglia, standing at the airport in San Jose del Cabo. "There were definitely some difficulties trying to locate a ticket. Hopefully, I'll be able to find my way home through Guadalajara."

Stephanie Dalley, 50, a drug and alcohol counselor from Forestville, Calif., was glad she had planned to leave Monday. "We're just figuring it was good timing," she said.

Mexico was struck by two Pacific hurricanes last month. Hurricane John battered Baja California, killing five people and destroying 160 homes, while Hurricane Lane hit the resort town of Mazatlan, causing relatively minor damage.

Iran tests uranium equipment

BY GEORGE JAHN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIENNA, Austria — Iran is expanding its uranium enrichment program even as the U.N. Security Council focuses on possible sanctions for its defiance of a demand to give up the activity and ease fears it seeks nuclear weapons, diplomats said Monday.

The diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge the information to media, told The Associated Press that within the past few weeks Iranian nuclear experts had started up a second pilot enrichment facility.

While the 164 centrifuges were not producing enriched uranium, even the decision to "dry test" them showed Iran's defiance of the Security Council. The council had set an Aug. 31 deadline for Tehran to cease all experiments linked to enrichment. It may start full deliberations on sanctions as early as later this week.

U.S. votes on $5.25 billion proposal to widen canal

Voters backed an expansion plan to approve the largest modernization project in the 92-year history of the Panama Canal, expanding the waterway to allow for larger ships while alleviating traffic problems.

BY WILL WEISSERT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PANAMA CITY, Panama — The United States on Monday applauded Panama's overwhelming vote in favor of widening its canal, an eight-year project that will cost $5.25 billion and should lower prices for shoppers on the East Coast buying goods from Asia.

The massive project, which would add a third set of locks on the Atlantic and Pacific sides of the waterway, is expected to double the 50-mile canal's capacity, allowing container ships, cruise liners and gas tankers currently too wide for its dimensions to squeeze through.

"There will be an impact on the pocketbook," U.S. Ambassador William Eaton told reporters in Panama City. "The transit costs will be cheaper and that will have an effect on the market."

The United States, which built the waterway in the early 1900s and controlled it until 1999, had been mum on the expansion plan so as not to sway Sunday's referendum. But Eaton said Monday that Panamanians had made the right choice.

"This is important to the U.S. It's important to our economy," he said. "We welcome expansion."

While turnout was only about 43 percent of Panama's more than 2.1 million eligible voters, nearly eight in 10 voted in favor of expansion. Construction won't begin until 2007 and is expected to take up to eight years.

President Martin Torrijos, who staked his political future on the plan, said the project, the largest in the canal's 92-year history, would create 40,000 jobs in a country where 40 percent of people live poverty and were unemployment sits at 9.5 percent.

The Panama Canal Authority, the autonomous governmental agency which runs the waterway, will borrow $2.3 billion between 2009 and 2011 to help finance the expansion, but expects to pay for the entire project by gradually increasing tolls for ships that sail through it.

Marvin Castillo, director of Panama's Maritime Chamber, said "any increase in tolls will have to be spread widely enough through all sectors of the shipping industry so that users can prepare for it and it won't represent a major hit."

The canal is on pace to generate $1.4 billion in revenues this year, but could produce $6 billion in revenues per year by 2025.

A chunk of tolls paid on each ton of cargo that passes through the canal goes to the national treasury for education and other social programs.

About two-thirds of shipping traffic passing through the canal is headed to or coming back from the United States. That figure will likely get even higher after expansion is complete.

The biggest vessels now moving through the Panama Canal's 108-foot-wide locks are known as Panamax ships, carrying up to 4,000 containers. But 27 percent of the world's containerized shipping is hauled by vessels that can carry 9,000 containers but are too big for the canal. By 2011, 37 percent will be too big, the canal authority says.

Many international shippers also said the expansion was necessary given the increasing amount of products from China, Hong Kong and other parts of Asia that need to be transported to stores on the U.S. East Coast. China is the canal's second-biggest user, comprising 18 percent of traffic.

Some U.S. Republicans have worried about Beijing's growing influence in the canal zone. Ports on the waterway's Atlantic and Pacific sides are managed by shipping giant Hutchinson Whampoa Ltd., which is controlled by Hong Kong-based tycoon Li Ka-shing. But Eaton said the U.S. largely views Chinese interest in the canal as "purely economic."

"They have a huge stake in making sure the Panama Canal operates efficiently and safely, just as we do," he said. "We don't see ulterior motives in the Chinese interest."President Theodore Roosevelt arranged for Panama's independence from Colombia in 1903 to build the canal. By some accounts, more than 25,000 people died during American and French efforts to build the waterway, which opened on Aug. 15, 1914.

Torrijos' father, Gen. Omar Torrijos, who took power in a coup in 1968, signed a treaty with President Jimmy Carter in 1977 that ceded control of the canal to Panama on Dec. 31, 1999. Since then, accidents and the time needed to transverse the canal are down, while revenues are up.

Iran to negotiate nuclear plans of low-enriched uranium suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz. The process of uranium enrichment can be used to generate electricity or to create an atomic weapon, depending on the level of enrichment.

Iran said it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at its enrichment plant in Natanz, central Iran, by the end of this year. Industrial production of enriched uranium in Natanz would require 54,000 centrifuges.

Although it is nowhere near that goal, successful testing of other "cascades" would indicate that Tehran is slowly mastering the complexities of producing enriched uranium.

A U.N. official said that even a "dry-run" allows Tehran "to develop the technology, to make sure that things work."

Another U.N. official said Iran had the technical means to start the second cascade several months ago, but apparently had decided to wait until the recent collapse of EU attempts to revive negotiations on an enrichment freeze with the Islamic republic.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, which has taken the lead in probing Tehran's nuclear program since the existence of a clandestine enrichment program was revealed more than three years ago, could not be reached for comment and issued no official confirmation.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, the chief Iranian envoy to the IAEA, said he had no knowledge of "new developments" at Natanz. But he told the AP that all nuclear activities "are going on as planned."

In Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said his country's nuclear capability has increased tenfold despite Western pressure to roll back its atomic program, which Iran insists is peaceful.

"The enemies, resorting to propaganda, want to block us from achieving [nuclear technology]," Ahmadinejad told a crowd on the southern outskirts of Tehran. "But they should know that today, the capability of our nation has multiplied tenfold over the same period last year."

Ahmadinejad boasted that "the power of our enemies is less than one-tenth of their power in last year."

He did not elaborate, and the remarks appeared aimed primarily at rallying public support as the U.N. Security Council prepares to consider limited sanctions.

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes. The United States and dozens of other countries fear, however, that it is secretly trying to make nuclear arms.

Ahmadinejad repeated that Iran was ready to negotiate about its nuclear ambitions. But the six nations that have spearheaded the most recent attempts to bring Iran to the negotiating table continue to call on Iran to first suspend enrichment.

The Islamic republic has turned down a package of incentives offered by those six world powers — the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany — on condition that all enrichment activities cease.

The United States and its U.N. Security Council allies, Britain and France, have drafted a text that would impose limited sanctions on Iran for its defiance. But a U.N. diplomat told the AP that the text might have to be softened to enlist the support of Russia and China, which have veto power on the Security Council.

Both Moscow and Beijing are reluctant to impose harsh punishments on Tehran, an economic and strategic partner. They also fear that any sanctions — which for now rule out military action — could still start the process toward consideration of force.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Monday he was hopeful talks with the Iranians would resume and that there was a "real chance" for a negotiated settlement without sanctions.

However, the European Union's external relations commissioner, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, said that Tehran had not responded positively to the incentives package and that the Security Council may need to explore "another alternative."

Internet bets are big no–no

Colin McDonald

Is gambling online illegal? Recently Congress passed a bill titled "The Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act of 2006," a bill supposedly banning all activities involving betting, but many experts question the effectiveness of this new legislature.

Why ban online gambling, though? I'll agree it's not always the safest way to invest your money, but it's certainly not causing widespread panic or mass hysteria.

Illegalizing online gambling is not a new concept. This latest act is more like an upgrade to the Wire Act, which only covered the act of gambling over the phone. The bill was actually introduced several times before by Rep. Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.), but only after being hastily attached to the must-pass SAFE Port Act has the new legislature seen success.

With its quick and rather subtle induction, it's no wonder that Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg (D-N.J.) admitted no one on the Senate-House Conference Committee had even seen the final language of the bill. Thus, an act was passed illegalizing online gambling right under our Senate's lazy nose, but does this bill really exclude American gamblers from playing poker online?

"The direct answer to the title question is: I don't know," stated Steve Badger in his article titled "Is Online Gambling Legal?"

Numerous references and situations dictated as gambling according to the new legislature are rather vague or ambiguous.

"Playing online poker is not illegal for U.S. citizens, in regards to Federal Law — unless it is a crime in an individual state," Badger continues.

So, is our government just saying gambling is bad? If kept within state boundaries, it's apparently OK, but cross-state and out of country betting is a big no-no. Sure, various, seedy corporations outside the States might be hard for the IRS to keep in contact with, but then why ban gambling within the States as well?

And if the government is trying to save me from an addiction that, according to Goodlatte, "hurts individuals and their families," why do I still have the phrase "What happens in Vegas stays in Vegas" flashing on my television screen every night?

There is a simple answer to why the United States has illegalized online gambling: taxes. Given standard technology it would be very difficult for the government to collect taxes on Internet gambling, and if the government doesn't get a cut, it cuts. This is really the only reasonable explanation I can see for a ban on Internet gambling within the states.

This new act affects more than just our own policies on Internet betting, though. Apparently

And if the government is trying to save me from an addiction that, according to Goodlatte, "hurts individuals and their families," why do I still have the phrase "What happens in Vegas stays in Vegas" flashing on my television screen every night?

the BBC claims the bill will upset members of the World Trade Organization (WTO). Already the country of Antigua has brought up a case with the WTO, claiming the United States has violated free trade agreements, when just two years ago the WTO had deemed an American ban criminalizing online gambling would violate global laws.

Maybe the U.S. Senate just forgot. It seems to me like another act of utter disregard for world politics on our part.

In any case, it just seems plain old silly that our government would criminalize gambling online. Other countries have even seen huge benefits from mainstream betting corporations. Betfair, an online gambling corporation based out of the United Kingdom, has recently achieved a company value of over $1 billion. It has received numerous awards since its founding in 2000, including the Confederation of British Industry's (CBI) "Company of the Year" in both 2004 and 2005.

Betfair has also won awards for "Socially Responsible Operator of the Year," in addition to providing massive employment, safe and secure transactions and (most importantly) a huge chunk of change for the government's tax coffer.

By shutting down American gamblers, we've not only crippled ourselves from benefiting from some potentially big business opportunities, but we've also hampered foreign business from operating as well.

I think America needs to step up to the plate. Sure, online gambling may seem risky, but companies like Betfair have proved that well sanctioned and financially responsible businesses can not only securely manage online gambling, but can also provide big benefits and a steady revenue for our government.

By turning our backs to the world of online gambling, we've not only shut down potential opportunities, but have hampered and even offended foreign markets. The WTO will doubtless have more to say on the issue regarding Antigua. Whether or not this new bill constitutes a violation of free trade agreements is still up in the air.

In the end, the new act is just a shoddy document hastily attached to an otherwise completely irrelevant bill that was never even voted on; It was never read or discussed in the Senate, and is considered vague and ambiguous by our country's experts. In my opinion, America needs to re-assess the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act of 2006 and come up with a better policy for Internet gambling.

Ladies: some provocative suggestions

Debbie Friedman

Halloween presents a special challenge to the female college student. Not only must we come up with a unique costume idea, we must also make it sexy. It's quite the task — one that requires some serious outside the box thinking. So for those of you panicking to come up with an idea before this weekend, I'm here to help. Below is a list of eight sexy costume ideas, sure to make you the center of attention this Halloween.

THE SEXY BABY:

Nothing says sex better than a baby. I've seen the plain baby costume done before, but it's always by a guy, and it's never sexy. This costume is perfect for a college girl, since it provides the opportunity to show some skin. Really, all you need is a tight white shirt, a bikini bottom and some sort of pacifier or bottle to convey that you are, in fact, a baby.

THE SEXY PUMPKIN:

This classic costume can easily be "sex-ified." However, in order to do so, you must first de-pumpkinize by deflating the normally poofy costume into a skintight spandex-like one-piece to show off your curves. While people may think you are just a hooker in an orange jumper, you can attempt to avoid this assumption by drawing a face with permanent marker on your chest, but of course, draw a sexy face.

THE SEXY HOBO:

They made the homeless person fashionable and sexy in "Zoolander," so you can do it too. It's pretty easy to "derelict" yourself since this costume relies on dark, sultry colors and ripped clothing, which is sexy in itself. Stay away from the typical hobo costume idea, which involves oversized, baggy, unflattering clothes. Instead, find some tight pre-ripped jeans and combine them with a top that is also ripped to shreds. You could even get away with not wearing a top and be a "sexy hobo on a hot day in Florida with no air conditioning."

THE SEXY ASTRONAUT:

You might think it's nearly impossible to make this costume sexy because of its bulky unisex suit, but that is ridiculous. All you have to do is take off the suit, strap on a white bikini and wear the helmet and boots. Having a small American flag would be a good prop too, as you could use it to re-enact the moon landing all around campus.

The Sexy Kerry Healey: Make sure you flat–iron your hair seven times before leaving and convey a sexy uptight look the entire evening.

THE SEXY KERRY HEALEY:

If you are into politics, why not dress up as the Republican Gubernatorial nominee? She's pretty hot, so you wouldn't have that much work to do, aside from altering her outfit to be less appropriate. Make sure you flat iron your hair seven times before leaving and convey a sexy uptight look the entire evening.

THE SEXY "SESAME STREET" GANG:

If you and your friends are looking for a group idea, look no further. The "Sesame Street" gang can be made sexy, by adding clothes surprisingly. Get traditional Oscar, Big Bird, Cookie Monster, Grover and Elmo costumes, and dress them up in mini-skirts, low cut shirts and sexy make up. I guarantee you will get more than a few looks with this idea.

THE SEXY DUCK:

The duck is one of the sexiest animals on this planet; therefore, it makes for an excellent costume idea. Since leggings are in fashion, pick yourself up a pair of bright orange ones and get some yellow flippers too. Wear a white leotard and pin a feather on your back. You'll need to fashion some sort of sexy beak too. While waddling around in this costume may not seem, or feel, sexy, it is. Trust me.

THE SEXY BEER BOTTLE:

If you really want to get a guy's attention, dress up like a big ol' sexy beer bottle. It's probably the hottest idea I've mentioned so far. You could wear a bulky beer bottle shaped cardboard cut-out, and it would still be incredibly sexy, as long as you cut some slits up the sides in order to show off what is underneath.

Remember, as college girls, it is our civic duty to come up with a way to be creative and sexy all in one on Halloween. Don't settle for just creative or clever and negate the responsibility we all have to be eye candy in skimpy clothing on this freezing October night.

With the list I just gave you, there is no excuse to settle for the cliché sexy Halloween costume this year. Anything can be sexy if you really put your mind to it. So this Halloween, be smart, be safe, but most of all, be sexy.

A strand above the rest

"Q and A Barber Shop," located behind "Loose Goose" on the second floor of the old-fashioned strip mall named the "Carriage," has been serving the Amherst area for over a decade now. For the past four years, whenever I am not back at home in Boston, I've been an avid customer of this barbershop because of the price and the fact they know how to cut Asian hair.

Hair is something extremely important to the majority of us. That's why we continually get a trim, a fade, line-up, braids or perm because hair defines us as people. That is why I go to "Q and A," the employees will treat my hair as if they were cutting an immediate family member's hair. The establishment patrons have even dubbed the barbershop, "The fade that will get you ..."

Armando Papo Hernandez, a native of Spanish Harlem, started "Q and A" with his partner in crime, Monte Montgomery, an amazing vocal artist from New Jersey. Now Amherst residents, they have been creating fades since I was in elementary school.

It's the little things that make this place so peaceful and relaxing. How many haircutting establishments shake your hand after they have finished giving you a fade? With that handshake you are getting the sense they not only want your business, but your company and your presence.

When you enter the door they say, "What up my brother?" Now, it might be because they don't know your name, but I prefer to be called a brother rather than "sir" or "kid." It gives me the sense that Hernandez and Montgomery aren't talking above or below me; we're on the same equal playing field.

The price at "Q and A" for a fade is about $13: a few dollars more than a local competitor. I first found this establishment because of a grave mishap brought on to my shining, silky smooth, dark chocolate hair by this local competitor. I was referred by a friend to "Q and A," which fixed the mistake (caused because I wanted a cheap haircut) and I've been a patron ever since.

When you enter the door they say "what up my brother?" Now it might be because they don't know your name, but I prefer to be called a brother rather than "sir" or "kid."

But if you are a poor college student (and I definitely know some of you are), Hernandez has told me countless times, if you're in need of a haircut and you don't have enough money to pay for one, he'll give you one at no cost. How sweet is that?

It's not just a barbershop; this is a community within a community. Everything is discussed in here: politics, religion, relationship issues, sports, music, business etc. Name a subject, and it's been talked about in the barbershop or will be discussed if you bring it up.

Last time I was getting a haircut, we were discussing where to park and where not to park around town. The guys told me about places where meters are non-existent and where you are assured you won't get towed or get a ticket.

If the University wants more diversity in its classrooms, they may consider turning it into a barbershop setting. Nowhere in my life has black, white, yellow, brown and red ever mingled and laughed under the same roof: truly a sight to see. Hernandez even proudly shows a map littered with stars signifying all of his hair clients' origins; it's like looking up towards the sky on a clear summer night.

Every person, from every socio-economic background, sits on the same hand-made wooden stools. On one occasion, the new Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Byron S. Bullock dropped by "Q and A" while I was interviewing the owners. I recognized Bullock through the various cultural centers and clubs I am affiliated with, and both Hernandez and Montgomery knew him. A man of Bullock's caliber and stature definitely gives credibility to this small hole in the wall.

It's good to have these wonderful establishments like "Q and A" to make us feel at home and give us the respect we deserve. "Q and A Barber Shop," along with other privately owned establishments, depends on us as much as we depend on them, but we don't give them the credit they deserve. So I'd just like to say thank you, "Q and A," for serving my hair and my soul.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THERE ARE BETTER WAYS

After reading Monica Gieberman's editorial entitled "Things I hate about UMass," I was disturbed by her allegations, lack of research and the absence of legitimate proposals for solutions to these problems. It is one thing to point out a problem, and another to offer a desirable and feasible solution.

In the Parking Services section, I was extremely disturbed by the sentence, "they should allow students to park wherever they desire." This is not a feasible solution to the problem of over-ticketing or lack of spaces and would make finding a desirable parking space even more difficult.

If you choose to bring a car to campus, you will have to fight for parking. Students can choose to live in dorms with adequate parking, share cars with friends or roommates or use public transportation.

Gieberman asked in regard to ticket and permit collection, "how much money does this school need?" A better solution would be to have a portion of the money collected from tickets and permits put in a fund allocated by students for different uses. The proceeds could fund other problems Gieberman mentioned, such as minimal Health Services and OIT staff. Reallocating these funds so another doctor, or a larger IT staff, is hired would be beneficial to the student body.

Construction is directed to better the learning environment, expand facilities for research and teaching and provide a better campus for students. Future UMass students, who will get superior educations in better facilities, will not care if Shane Burke had to spend an extra five minutes walking to class.

Construction workers are human beings as well; they would demand higher wages on the weekends and be more reluctant to work those hours. Construction is a business dictated by weather concerns, so work must be done when it can and, come winter, you won't have this problem anyway.

In the Textbook Annex section, I would also be mad about spending $800 on books if I were Mary Kociuba, not only because of the cost, but also because I didn't research my options. Assessing which books you desperately need to have and which ones you can read on reserve in the library could have cut Kociuba's costs in half.

If you do not want to wait in line, have a diverse offering of prices or get off your couch, then visit Web sites such as eBay.com or Amazon.com. Students should seek to maximize their own profit and sell their own books online (for more than a 10 percent return), split the cost with a friend taking the same class or read the book in the library.

Perhaps Gieberman's purpose wasn't to address the solutions adequately, but why would she take the time to write an article that only adds to these ludicrous complaints? If she and others hate these things so much, they should be focused on making student committees to come up with desirable and feasible solutions.

ATHLETIC COVERAGE

As one of the Center for Student Development advisors to RSO sport clubs, I was thrilled to see the Collegian has taken notice of these amazing groups of students. Not only are the members of the teams committed athletes, but they also have to be organizers, fundraisers and managers.

The students I work with invest a great deal of their money, time and energy into making their teams successful. I would like to point out there are a lot more sports clubs than were featured by Mr. Chandler and Mr. King in their article published on October 18.

I hope they will continue the good work they started by featuring the other groups in the near future. They are archery, ballroom dance, baseball, bicycle racing, crew, figure skating, soccer, women's ice hockey, lacrosse, motor sports, paintball, polo, women's rugby, tennis, volleyball and ultimate Frisbee.

I also want to acknowledge the support these teams do receive from the University. Although the article was accurate in describing the difficulties they face because of their lack of varsity status, they do receive administrative and advising support from the Center for Student Development, and many receive some financial support from Campus Recreation or the Student Government Association.

They all need more support, especially in areas such as space to store equipment, practice and compete and, of course, finances. I hope the Collegian article has served to raise awareness of these issues, and I applaud you for noticing your fellow students.

Leo to perform at arts benefit

By Corey Charron
Collegian Staff

Ted Leo and the Pharmacists plan to perform new material from their upcoming album that will be released sometime next spring. The concept of the new album focuses on the politics of President Bush.

Ted Leo and his band, The Pharmacists, will bring their rare type of high energy to Pearl Street Tuesday night. Bullseye, a local band, will join them for a concert to benefit Flywheel Arts.

Leo has a rather large reputation for putting on fast, exciting punk-rock shows, risking life and limb for the sake of his music. At this past summer's Pitchfork Music Festival, for example, Leo smashed his forehead with a microphone, and immediately started bleeding across his face. Fortunately for the audience, he continued playing through the pain, resulting in one of the more memorable performances at the festival.

At a recent solo show in Baltimore, the power went out, and Leo played with the lights off, eventually moving the performance into the streets.

Leo was a student at Notre Dame University in 1990 when he started the punk-rock band Chisel. The band lasted until 1997, when it broke up after gaining a solid national reputation. In 1999, he formed Ted Leo and the Pharmacists while living in Washington, D.C. The band released its first record, "Tej Leo (?), Rx Pharmacists," that same year.

Bassist Dave Lerner and drummer Chris Wilson round out the rest of the group. The band's influences range from The Clash to Elvis Costello.

It has released four albums in all, with several EPs dating back to 1999. "The Tyranny of Distance" was released in 2001 on "Lookout Records" and received much critical and cult praise.

The band's most recent record, "Shake the Sheets," was released in 2004, with more political undertones then any of their previous albums. The first song off the album, "Me and Mia" received some radio play.

Leo's rendition of Kelly Clarkson's hit "Since You've Been Gone" caused some in the music industry to pay more attention to the relatively unknown artist. Don't expect Leo to perform the song live. Requests to play the song at shows are adamantly refused. Leo claims he doesn't want to be known as the guy who covered Kelly Clarkson.

Ted Leo and The Pharmacists are talented musicians who tour the country extensively, as well as Europe and Australia. They have opened for several major players in the indie rock world, including Wilco, Broken Social Scene, Belle and Sebastian and the Fiery Furnaces.

Death Cab for Cutie has recruited them to open up for several dates for next month's tour. The Pearl Street show will be the only show that Ted Leo and the Pharmacists will be headlining until going out with Death Cab For Cutie. At the end of November, they will also tour with Vague Angels and be featured as the main act.

During the upcoming tour fans will be able to preview the long-awaited follow-up album to "Shake the Sheets." With an estimated spring 2007 release, the new album has promised to be more aggressive, stemming from George W. Bush's presidency.

The new music will be released on record label "Touch and Go." The album was recorded in a barn in Long View Farm Studios in local North Brookfield, Massachusetts.

Bullseye is a local band from the Pioneer Valley. Their EP, "Duck-Taped Shut," is available at local record stores. The band consists of 5th, 6th and 7th graders. Their music is surprisingly catchy and well-done, considering their age.

The concert is a benefit for Flywheel Arts, a local establishment in Easthampton. Flywheel is a non-profit organization and a haven for emerging artists. The concert is at the Pearl Street Ballroom. Doors open at 7:30 p.m. and the show will start at 8:30 p.m.

Smith faces possible eviction from home

Anna Nicole Smith did not appear Monday for a meeting requested by the attorney for an ex-boyfriend who claims to be the father of the reality TV star's 6-week-old daughter.

The lawyer for photographer Larry Birkhead traveled from Los Angeles to take a deposition from Smith in the Bahamas, where the former Playboy playmate moved while she was pregnant and declared her current companion Howard K. Stern as the child's father.

Birkhead filed a lawsuit in Los Angeles seeking a court order to demand Smith bring the baby to California for a paternity test. Her attorneys have argued the court does not have appropriate jurisdiction, but Birkhead lawyer Debra Opri said she would use Smith's nonappearance Monday to argue for dismissal of that challenge.

"We're letting her know if she wants to make it this way, we're not going to make it easy for her," Opri said in a phone interview from Nassau. "This is a tragedy of a natural father, Larry Birkhead, who is being deprived of the bonding process of a father and his daughter."

A Bahamian attorney for Smith said he believed Opri needs to work through local courts to demand a test from his client, who has obtained permanent residency in the islands.

"If anyone is to be inconvenienced, let him be inconvenienced and bring this action here," Wayne Munroe said of Birkhead.

Munroe said Smith stood by her decision not to voluntarily submit her daughter for testing.

"If this young woman thinks advertising will sway my client, she is rudely mistaken," he said, referring to Opri.

Smith may be facing eviction from the New Providence, Bahamas, home where she is currently living. A real estate developer from Myrtle Beach, S.C., tells People magazine that he owns the property.

G. Ben Thompson said he purchased the million-dollar home in August as a favor to the reality star, but he added that she thinks it's a gift. Thompson said that if Smith does not move out he will formally evict her — even though he doesn't want to embarrass or humiliate her.

A lawyer for Smith would not confirm or deny Thompson's claims. It's unclear whether or not the eviction would affect her residency status in the Bahamas.

A hearing in the paternity case has been scheduled for Thursday at Los Angeles Superior Court. If Birkhead is confirmed to be the father, he could receive visitation or custody rights and possibly a large amount of child support.

The baby girl, Dannielynn Hope Marshall Stern, was born on Sept. 7, three days before Smith's 20-year-old son Daniel died while visiting his mother and half-sister in the hospital.

A private examiner has said Daniel died from a lethal combination of methadone and two antidepressants. Local officials were expected to announce this week whether they would call a jury inquest into the death.

Oberst showcases material for older fans on rarities disc

BRIGHT EYES

'NOISE FLOOR: RARITIES 1998-2005'

By Allie Reith
Collegian Staff

It's easy to predict which Bright Eyes role Connor Oberst hopes to fill with the release of "Noise Floor (Rarities: 1998-2005)": the old school Bright Eyes who is too heartbroken (or drunk) to function. His scratchy voice sings back intricately constructed lyrics of misfortune, disappointment and hope. His songwriting talent is expansive and this album just further solidifies his place as one of our generation's greatest talents.

The first track, "Mirrors and Levers," opens the album with female voices echoing the chorus of "An Attempt to Tip the Scales." This is strangely haunting, with the voices joined by mumbling in the background and light guitar chords. Where the song is going is slightly unclear.

But eventually, a familiar Oberst's voice enters the foreground, lacking any guitar accompaniment and singing slowly, "Don't be frightened of turning the page 'Cause it's is all the same."

The song was originally released in 2000 on the EP "Don't Be Afraid of Turning the Page." Although only a few stanzas long, this song serves as the perfect opening to an album that will only become more deeply angst-ridden over time.

"Drunk Kid Catholic" is possibly the most prophetic song on the album. It compares those who rely on alcohol ("the drunk kids") to those who rely on religion ("the Catholics") for salvation. The song offers this reasoning: "They're all about the same: They're waiting for something. Hoping to be saved."

Oberst himself grew up in a Catholic household, and a reoccurring theme in this music is the aversion and skepticism toward any religious teachings.

There is sort of a home-recording feel to this album. Oberst recorded a few songs with his good buddy and fellow musician, M. Ward. Neither of these songs were released to the general public until now; two of them appear on the album.

The second of these songs, "Seashell Tale," starts off with Oberst counting off. It appears to be a song about that one perfect day where everything seems to line up like a dream. As he sings, "Our flesh and blood has found me in your arms again: See the whisper of the wind has found your hair again," it is obvious those perfect moments exist to all who are open to them taking place.

Oberst puts his own touch on "Devil Town," originally a Daniel Johnston song. The repetitious nature of the song allows Oberst (along with guest Nick Zinner of the Yeah Yeah Yeahs) to inject a different point of view into each continuing stanza. It just gets epic as the song rolls on.

The album closes out with "Motion Sickness." This song is sad as it looks for something stable to depend on. It's easy to see eye to eye with Oberst as he boasts, "I wanna get myself attached, to something bolted down. So these winds of circumstance won't keep blowin' me around."

At the end of the song, Oberst laughs as he blurts out, "Oh my God," signaling the end of what seemed like a long recording process.

Even when his voice is at its most unrefined, Oberst offers promise. His voice may be unbearable, but his lyrics present salvation. Each song is like a little story. The slow guitar chords found in many of the songs fade into the background.

His clear mission is to show that he may be an abrasive and heartbroken guy, but he maintains insight as he tips the bottle back. The sound quality is not perfect and Oberst's voice is not perfect. Oberst succeeds at inspiring those without a perfect voice to pursue writing and recording the music they love to create.

It should not be missed by those who fancy themselves true Bright Eyes fans — the kind who like "Fevers and Mirrors" more than "I'm Wide Awake, It's Morning."

Lemonheads' new line up fails to correct old mistakes

LEMONHEADS

VAGRANT RECORDS

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Ten years since their last release, Boston's native sons the Lemonheads are back — kind of. Suffice to say, the self-titled release doesn't reunite the original band, a lineup that hasn't existed since 1989; rather, it signals lead 'Head Evan Dando's return to rock.

The unlikely teen idol, whose brief time in the limelight outshone record sales or mainstream acceptance, recovered from the mandatory fall-from-grace with his 2003 solo debut, "Baby I'm Bored." Now he has taken his old band name back, plugged his guitar back into an amp, and recruited two former members of the Descendents to make a brisk, punk-inspired bid for further glory.

So the Lemonheads may never have been the best band from Boston, but the legions of fans and critics that swear by the band's 1992 "It's A Shame About Ray" album are sure to welcome the name back with open arms.

Dando is still combining his love of rock, punk, folk, and country, but on the self-titled record he seems more willing then ever to put his head down and barrel through the songs. The 11 songs fire one after the other in a little over half an hour, all of them relying on alternative-rock energy. Even the most country-fried song of them all, "Baby's Home," is plugged in Dando is so eager to fully and truly rock he even brings in Dinosaur Jr.'s guitar legend J Mascis to bring the house down on two songs.

But Dando, who sounds as young and fresh as ever on these tracks, is still relying on old tricks. His knack for pop songwriting remains unchanged, which is good because he can write some great songs, but is unfortunate because he hasn't improved on any of his flaws.

"The Lemonheads" has a number of really good songs, such as the opening "Black Town," but is bogged down with mediocrity. To make matters worse, not one classic emerges out of the whole set — usually Dando can be counted down for at least a smattering of spot-on songs per album. To his credit, though, Dando keeps most of the writing in-house. In the past he found most of his best, or at least his most famous, songs co-written (not to mention that the band's biggest commercial hit was their indelible, Generation-X cover of "Mrs Robinson"). While new member Bill Stevenson and longtime Dando collaborator Tom Morgan make some big contributions to the material, Dando handles over half the album by himself, including tracks like "Pittsburgh" that serve as highlights of the record.

So "The Lemonheads" isn't the huge proclamation that a reunion often implies, but as Dando's return to the electric-guitar inspired work of the past, it works.

In fact, "The Lemonheads" is something of a good allegory to the band itself. It's not the best, it's not the most original, but Dando is an undeniable talent. "The Lemonheads" is sure to bring a lot of smiles to a lot faces and Dando seems to be working on his own terms.

Even if the spotlight isn't shining so bright, The Lemonheads are back, kind of, and their new album might not be that great, but it's good enough.

Bush dies in fake documentary

By Robert W. Butler
McClatchy Newspapers

Might as well get the most obvious question out of the way up front: "Death of a President," a faux documentary about the murder of George W. Bush, is neither left-wing wish fulfillment nor an encouragement to kill politicians you disagree with.

Gabriel Range's provocative and technically seamless what-if examines how that disastrous event might be used by the same folks who brought us the Iraq war and the Patriot Act to instill fear in the populace and ram through ever-more repressive laws in the name of security.

"Death" purports to be a documentary looking into the murder of Bush on Oct. 19, 2007, as he was leaving a speaking engagement at a Chicago hotel. He was gunned down by a sniper nestled in an office building across the street.

Apparently the documentary was made many months after that traumatic night and attempts to take in all aspects of the tragedy, from the thousands of angry and sometimes violent protestors who converged on Chicago's Loop to give the president a fiery reception to the cops, FBI and Secret Service people who were involved.

We learn early on that a man from Syria is on death row for the crime, but the filmmakers build a case that the government arrested, tried and convicted the wrong guy mostly because having the assassin be from the Muslim world feeds into the conspiracy/security fears of American voters. It's a chance for the new Cheney administration to consolidate its political power, presumably before the 2008 presidential election.

RATED R

GRADE B-

The main problem with "Death of a President" is that it's preaching to the choir: The only people likely to go see it are those who already think we've been sold a bill of goods on Iraq and security and all the rest.

But as a technical achievement the film is a revelation, seamlessly melding real news footage (sometimes tweaked with subtle but effective special effects) with talking-head interviews. The scenes of riots in the streets of Chicago are amazing; I couldn't begin to identify what's real news footage and what was staged for Range's camera.

NBC to cut 700 jobs by 2008

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NBC Universal said Thursday it would cut 700 jobs and streamline its news operations as part an overhaul aimed at exploiting new forms of electronic distribution. NBC, a unit of General Electric Co., said it expects the revamp to save $750 million in operating expenses by 2008. The job cuts would represent about 5 percent of its work force.

As part of the changes, NBC's long-struggling 24-hour cable news channel MSNBC will move its operations to NBC's headquarters in Manhattan's Rockefeller Center and also to another NBC facility in Englewood Cliffs, N.J.

The changes don't represent a diminishing commitment to news, but just reflect how the industry is changing, Jeff Zucker, chief executive of NBC Universal's television group, told The Associated Press.

"The growth in news is in different places it's online, it's on wireless," he said.

The company's TV station group will also create a consolidated news facility in Burbank, Calif. that will support NBC as well as its Spanish-language broadcaster Telemundo.

The revamp will also affect the company's Universal Studios business, where cuts will be made to consolidate support and marketing functions.

The expected savings follow three lackluster years at NBC Universal, where operating profit fell 10 percent in each of the past three quarters. The slumping results cut into GE earnings.

NBC Universal said it plans to reinvest much of its savings into higher-growth areas. It has been aggressive in creating broadband-only channels, for example, and has partnered with Yahoo through Telemundo to establish one of the most popular Internet destinations for Hispanics.

The changes will be noticeable on television, where NBC will stop scheduling high-priced dramas and comedies during the first hour of prime-time at 8 p.m. Instead, cheaper-to-produce programming like "Deal or No Deal" or "The Biggest Loser" will fill that hour.

Zucker noted that rival ABC has quietly been doing the same thing in recent years.

"We want to be sure that we continue to provide the best programming possible," Zucker said. "We just want to put the programming where we get the highest rate of return."

NBC's cost-saving plan involves firing employees from the company's 11 news divisions, including on-air talent.

French artist showcases race riots

BY ANGELA DOLAND
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Bizarre, startling posters appeared on the walls and street corners of Paris this year. They showed faces mostly black faces contorted into outlandish grimaces, with teeth bared, nostrils flared, eyes crossed.

The provocative photos were the work of a Paris street artist who wanted people to confront stereotypes. His giant photos asked passers-by an in-your-face question: When you see a kid from the housing projects, do you see a bogeyman?

Almost exactly a year ago, when riots broke out in France's troubled suburban housing projects, news reports broadcast countless photos of hooded youths setting fire to cars. French photographer JR, who goes by his initials only, thought about those images, the stereotypes they reinforced and how he could use photography to bring a different message.

"After the riots, Parisians viewed suburban kids as extraterrestrials," JR said in an interview in his Paris studio. "On television, you always saw them wearing masks. People said, 'Those kids are all the same. Everybody who comes from those areas took part in the riots.' Everybody was afraid of them, and so I decided to take pictures of them looking like monsters or extraterrestrials."

The riots broke out after two youths were electrocuted in a power substation while hiding from police, and they were fueled by such problems as racism and unemployment. Many of the rioters were the children of immigrants, and the unrest forced France to confront decades of discrimination against minorities as well as a failure to integrate immigrants and provide opportunities for poor youths.

JR didn't grow up in the projects, and he says he can't speak for the teenagers and young adults that appear in his photographs, also published this month in a book, "28 millimetres."

The 25-year-old photographer, who has a large following at home and abroad, is also part graffiti artist and performance artist. Usually, he has to hide from police as he plasters his work illegally on buildings at night, which is why he keeps his identity anonymous.

When JR did a similar exhibit in 2004, hanging giant photos on the walls of a suburban housing project, local authorities lodged a complaint against him.

This time, something unusual happened. Officials invited him to hang his work on a community center in the center of the capital. His gallery of faces was pasted on the walls outside Paris' European House of photography. And his work helped inspire an exhibit that opened last week in Clichy-sous-Bois.

Sponsored by the town's city hall, the public relations project is called Clichy Sans Cliche Clichy without Cliches. It is a reaction to the images of burning cars that were flashed around the world pictures that French media eventually stopped broadcasting, for fear they were encouraging the violence. The project's Web site asks: "What if we showed life in Clichy the way it is?"

Hip hop is not a trend

BY BEN WEBER
ORANGE COUNTY REGISTER

COSTA MESA, Calif. — So I'm at the denim-and-diamonds gala opening of the Orange County Performing Arts Center's new Samuel H. Scherr Theater not exactly Hip-Hop Central, you realize and Sheryl Crow's perched on a stool about to strum and sing "The First Cut Is the Deepest" when the most telling thing happens.

Sheryl starts telling this story about growing up in the '70s and listening to radio in the golden age of eclectic AM that's how she learned the Cat Stevens tune, via Rod Stewart. And somehow, don't ask me how, she shifts from exalting the glory of classic rock to this quip: "You know, this rap thing it's just a phase."

She wasn't being serious. Anyone could tell from her ironic tone of voice.

At least I thought anyone could tell. But as a few people chuckled at the intentional ridiculousness of her remark, the guy behind me let out a heavy sigh, leaned toward his wife/date/mistress/secretary whatever and said:

"Yeah. It really is."

'Cause, you know, he knows. You could tell just looking at that straight-up gangsta pit-in-p, in his off-the-rack blazer, crisp Oxford shirt and absurdly overpriced designer jeans. He's got the inside dope. He knows hip-hop is on the outs.

It was in that split second that I suddenly regretted every negative rap review I'd ever written.

Not that they weren't justified most you, I'm picky, I'll say that but my selectiveness comes from years of hearing the same unimaginative album again and again, only with a new face and different guest rhymers. And as with recycled rock, there are only so many really pleasures to be found.

I continue to gravitate toward the innovative, the daring, the experiment ... whether they land squarely in the mainstream (Kanye, Common respon advertising and youth rebellion as rock 'n' roll ever was.

But is it selling? Not if you believe Billboard.

At press time there were exactly two rap albums in the Top 10 the abysmal G-Unit drone of Lloyd Banks' "Rotten Apple," surely moving units because of 50 Cent's involvement, and Ludacris' meager "Release Therapy." Only four more rank in the Top 50. And if you count hip-hop-influenced albums from Justin Timberlake and Fergie and Christina Aguilera and the like, the number only rises to about a dozen. That's paltry compared with how resolutely rap ruled even five years ago.

Even on the Hot 100 singles chart, where hip-hop and its corollaries fare better, there's been a drop-off. Now that downloads are being considered, the Top 10 is more a mix of whatever's blowing up on Power 106 plus Middle America's favorite hits, which this year have spanned from Daniel Powter's "Bad Day" to the latest Weird Al parody.

Yet rap-is-crap naysayers persist, their cumulative condescension often louder than jet engines. You'd think someone would have told them their battle has mostly been won.

Already there's been a stemming of the tide of boring, by-the-numbers discs though there is a new Chingy record. I doubt that lousy listen, with its repetitive, hook-free stream of come-ons, empty boasts and five-minutes-ago slurred speech, would even get bodies moving in a club, its clear target.

Meanwhile, there's a new smorgasbord from Diddy — formerly P. Diddy, formerly Puff Daddy, Sean John, sir if you're on his payroll. "Press Play" may be his first official offering in five years and, surprise, it's marginally better than everything else he's issued under his name but it's also exactly the sort of bloated beast that's never gonna go away.

At 80 minutes, it's at least 30 too long, for starters he could have dumped the survivor brags that sound ludicrous coming from a multimillionaire who has supped with Regis Philbin.

What's good about it is its final two-thirds, from Xtina's spotlight on "Tell Me" (in which Diddy imagines what it'd be like to be unknown) through to Mary J. Blige's wail on "Making It Hard." In between, the parade never lets up. Here comes Big Boi; now Timbaland; look, there's Nas and Cee-Lo and Keyshia Cole and Brandy. As usual, there are plenty of memorable singles, but Diddy the pseudo-rapper himself often gets lost in the mix.

Also not apt to die: West Coast thug jams, whether from Ice Cube or Kurupt or Daz or Snoop or Xzibit or all of them at once. Daz's "So So Gangsta," abetted by Jermaine Dupri, is softer than usual, but Xzibit's "Full Circle" is one of his strongest efforts, a tough yet rollicking work that veers from the gritty street-life portraits ("Ram Part Division") to a series of unusually insightful pieces, from the mantra chants of "Concentrate" to the lift-yourself-up promise of "Family Values."

Like Cube, though arguably more appealing, Xzibit has matured, his work more thoughtful, less impulsive. But his lapses into old ways can be just as off-putting as something from the other end of the spectrum say, "As If We Existed," from a group called Sol. illaquists of Sound. The feel is all right, pitched somewhere between Digable Planets and A Tribe Called Quest. But check the would-be inspirational lyrics for veganism, against cigarettes and alcohol and you might begin to feel like you're attending a heavy-handed lecture from self-righteous politicos.

The sole benefit of the muting of hip-hop, then, is that the best stuff becomes easier to spot. Apart from the Roots' "Game Theory," I've heard exactly two great ones lately, and they both come from Chicago newcomers: "Blue Collar," from Rhymefest, and "Food & Liquor," from Lupe Fiasco.

Both are consistently varied, no two tracks sounding quite the same. Both draw from a deep well of '70s soul and old-school hip-hop, much as Kanye does which makes sense in Rhymefest's case, given that before his own record was out he had already nabbed a Grammy for co-writing "Jesus Walks."

Actor speaks about South Africa

BY JEFF STRICKLER
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

Derek Luke faced a problem when he arrived in South Africa to star in "Catch a Fire," a true story in which he plays anti-apartheid hero Patrick Chammusso. He looked healthy, and no South African native would buy the notion of a black man looking healthy in 1980.

"I had been told that I had to lose weight to play the role, "he said. "My method for loosing weight is to hop on the treadmill. But when I got to South Africa, they said I looked too lean and muscular."

So he went on a crash diet that took off 20 pounds of muscle. In retrospect, he realizes that it might not have been the best thing for his health, but he maintains that it was crucial for the movie.

"The people in South African weren't thin because they went to the gym," he said. "They didn't have enough food."

Luke acknowledged that when the movie opens Friday, most American viewers won't know the difference between muscular-lean and starvation-hungry. But they might notice the impact it had on the way he gets inside his character.

"The psychological challenge [of going without food] does something to you, "he said. "It was prep work for the role that I couldn't do any other way."

Luke also conducted lengthy interviews with Chammusso, who was arrested for being a suspected member of an anti-apartheid military operation. He wasn't part of the group "at the time", but the beatings he received in prison turned him into one. When he eventually was released from jail, he joined the armed struggle against the repressive white rule.

"This guy is a hero," he said. "I went to him with a list of interview questions, but he started interviewing me. The first thing he asked me was if I know Beyonce. I said, 'No, I don't. And that's not what I'm here for. Let's get serious.'"

Luke, who was only seven-years old when Chammusso led his first mission, didn't know much about the history of apartheid when he arrived in South Africa. But he quickly immersed himself in the subject, including visiting Robben Island, the infamous prison where Nelson Mendela was held. He went into the tiny isolation cell in which Mendela spent most of the 27 years of his incarceration and lay down in the spot the civil rights leader had slept.

"As an African American, it was very difficult to relate to the way so many paid for their freedom with blood and pain," he said. "In America, we enjoy such a comfortable life. It's not until you go to a place like South Africa that you realize how blessed we are."

Luke has played several real-life roles, beginning with his portrayal of the title character in "Antwone Fisher." For the most part, he has followed the conventional acting wisdom that a performer who is playing a real person should avoid spending time with that person because of the danger of becoming just an impersonator of physical mannerisms rather than someone who fully inhabits the role.

He decided to ignore that advice when it came to playing Chammusso.

"In the films I've done prior to this, I was discouraged from meeting the real-life person," he said. "But this was different. To me, this movie isn't so much about the person as it is about the message. It's about having heart. It's about the human spirit. It's about a guy who says, 'I've taken enough. Now what can I do to change things?'"

Derek Luke tries to stay away from character impersonation in his acting rules when playing characters based on real life individuals.

For his latest role, Luke had to visit the Robben Island prison where Nelson Mendella spent most of his 27-year prison sentence dentally, the Gambler had the same mysterious brown substance on his pitching hand in each of the games in which he pitched. Is anybody else seeing a connection here? Or does Rogers always overlook dirt on his hand?

Don't be mistaken, Rogers is not the only one to blame for this whole fiasco. Where were the umpires during all this? And where were Tony LaRussa and the Cardinals? Shouldn't they have something to say about an opposing pitcher blatantly cheating in the World Series?

LaRussa was seen talking to home plate umpire Alfonso Marquez after the top of the first, but that's about as far as it went. After the game the Cardinals skipper didn't comment on the mysterious substance that foiled his team. You'd think a manager would have plenty to say about it, but for some reason LaRussa kept quiet.

According to Steve Palermo, MLB supervisor of umpires, after his little chat with LaRussa, Marquez instructed Rogers to clean the "dirt" off his hand before the start of the second inning.

League rules state that the umpires should have inspected Rogers' hand to make sure that it was in fact some earth on his pitching hand. But they didn't. Palermo says that Marquez and his crew "observed" the substance as dirt and that was the end of it.

But it shouldn't have been. Does anybody care whatsoever about the integrity of baseball anymore? Apparently not, if an umpiring crew in the World Series doesn't inspect a foreign substance on the pitching hand of a 41-year old journeyman hurler.

Then there's the confusion. Palmero asserts that Marquez told Rogers to clean off his hand, but Rogers claims the umpire never mentioned anything to him about the pine tar — cough, cough, excuse me, "dirt."

This whole situation just adds to MLB's disgusting apathy for the rules. Just to see if he can get away with it, maybe Rogers should slob pine tar on his entire body the next time he takes the mound. If Bud Selig wants to show the fans he's committed to keeping this World Series legitimate, he needs to suspend Rogers for the remainder, and let the Tigers wash their hands (wink, wink) of the whole ordeal.

Jon Pelland is a Collegian Columnist

During Game 2 of the World Series, Fox cameras spotted a suspicious brown substance on the pitching palm of Tigers pitcher Kenny Rogers.

complete-game shutouts for the Philadelphia Athletics in the 1905 World Series.

Whether or not the substance on Rogers' hand was anything but dirt remains to be seen, and if it's found to be an illegal substance, it will most likely be covered up by Major League Baseball in an effort to prevent any further damage to a league that is already under the cloud of suspicion called steroids.

But the question at hand is: what did Rogers do wrong?

I'm not defending the guy for having a foreign substance on his hand. But since there wasn't a big stink put up about it, why should I speculate that is the case?

I'll admit, if I'm a batter for the Cardinals and I notice something fishy going on 60 feet away from me, I'd be the first to complain and throw that pitcher under the bus. But seeing the Cardinals declining to push the issue leads me to believe that something even more suspicious is going on.

Maybe cheating in baseball is such an excepted action that everyone is just covering up the game.

We've recently learned that nobody is safe when it comes to protecting steroid users in baseball. Just ask Mark McGwire and Rafael Palmeiro. After a while, we started questioning the legitimacy of every offensive record there had been, and with good reason. Many people have accepted the fact that steroids are prevalent in all professional sports, and most notably in America's pastime.

And if batters have been cheating all these years, what makes pitchers so innocent? You mean to tell me that pitchers knew of prevalent steroid use, and thought, "I'll just work on my fastball in the offseason."

Let's be serious.

Kenny Rogers has been around this league way too long to think that nobody cheats in baseball. That's because everybody cheats in baseball. Only to them, it's not cheating. It just means you're trying harder. It means you will do anything to win. And who wouldn't want a teammate like that.

It's not cheating. It's a competitive edge.

It's not right, but it's Major League Baseball, and Kenny Rogers is just another player who is trying to win.

fourth behind Towson's Sean Schafer and Delaware's Joe Flacco.

The difference between the two teams is on the defensive end. While the Minutemen lead the conference in scoring defense with a scant 11.3 points per game allowed, the Wildcats allow a bloated 30 points per game. The Minutemen are first in pass defense with 143.3 yards per game allowed, while UNH ranks eighth in that category. Maine leads the A-10 in rushing defense, allowing just 98.9 yards per game on the ground. Richmond and UMass follow that with 97.4 and 108.4 yards allowed, respectively.

Weekly Awards

The Offensive Player of the Week award went to UMass' Steve Baylark, who registered 235 yards on 26 carries in his team's 41-16 win over Rhode Island Saturday. His performance was the fifth-highest rushing total in a single game in the program's history. He has 35 rushing touchdowns and has moved into a tie for third place on the all-time rushing touchdowns list at UMass.

Akeem Jordan of James Madison was the A-10's Defensive Player of the Week. Jordan made 18 tackles in Saturday 31-17 win over William & Mary. It was the second consecutive week that Jordan has notched 18 tackles in a game.

James Madison also gathered the Special Teams Player of the Week award. Sophomore punter Jason Pritchard averaged a career-best 46.5 yards per punt this weekend on four kicks against the Tribe, and planted two of the four inside the opponent's 20-yard line. The Dukes remain the only undefeated team in the A-10 South.

Junior quarterback Ricky Santos (No. 2) and UNH are reeling in recent weeks. Their latest loss dropped them all the way down to No. 11 in the Sports Network's Top 25.

Hasselbeck to miss at least three games

By Gregg Bell
Associated Press

KIRKLAND, Wash. — Seattle Seahawks quarterback Matt Hasselbeck will miss two to four weeks with a strained ligament in his right knee, coach Mike Holmgren confirmed on Monday.

An MRI showed the Pro Bowl quarterback strained the medial collateral ligament while getting rolled into by a Minnesota pass rusher during Sunday's loss to the Vikings.

"There are three levels [of seriousness]," Holmgren said. "So he's right in the middle.

"He's on crutches for a few days ... I guess it's kind of good news for me. It could have been worse."

Seneca Wallace, a fourth-year veteran, will make his first NFL start on Sunday at Kansas City (3-3). The Seahawks (4-2) are already without league MVP Shaun Alexander, who remains out indefinitely with a broken foot.

On the opening drive of the second half Sunday, Vikings linebacker E.J. Henderson got past a block from fullback Mack Strong. Henderson then swung the left side of his torso into the lower half of Hasselbeck's right leg, which was planted after Hasselbeck had just thrown an incomplete pass.

Hasselbeck crumpled to the ground immediately, rolled over and then tried to get up. When he could not put weight on the leg to stand, he fell again and angrily pounded the turf while trainers rushed to his side.

Hasselbeck was taken the sideline with his weight on the shoulders of two trainers.

"I was falling to the ground and Mack Strong kind of pushed. I definitely didn't mean to do it," Henderson said. "It was definitely an accident, I hope he gets back soon."

UM climbs to No. 4

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team received its highest ranking of the season in the Sports Network's recent Top 25 poll. The Minutemen are ranked at No. 4 in the nation. UMass is one of five Atlantic 10 teams in the Top 25. James Madison is one spot behind the Minutemen at No. 5. The Dukes dealt UNH its first loss of the season with a 42-23 romp on Oct. 14.

UMass Football

RUNNING DOWN A DREAM

Steve Baylark is the Minutemen's resident bulldozer. Not only did he torch Rhode Island for 235 yards on 26 carries on Homecoming Weekend this past Saturday, but he now has a good chance to become just the third player in Division I-AA football history to rush for four straight 1,000-yard seasons.

He has 892 yards through seven games, and is averaging 127.4 yards per game (first in the A-10 and seventh in the nation), so Saturday at Northeastern could be the record-breaking day for the senior tailback. If Baylark does get the 108 yards he needs for the record, he will join New Hampshire's Jerry Azumah and Georgia Southern's Adrian Peterson.

UMass coach Don Brown has praised Baylark repeatedly for his steady improvement over the last four years, especially over the last six months. Brown maintains that in the past, Baylark was mostly a power runner that could bang and bump his way to first downs. But he did not have the breakaway speed featured in some of his big runs this year. On Saturday, Baylark tallied a 58-yard run, the longest of his career.

For his efforts, the Atlantic 10 named him the Offensive Player of the Week. Baylark's second honor of the season. His 236-yard performance on Saturday was the first time in six years that a UMass back has rushed for over 200 yards in a game. Kevin Quinlan was the last player to break the 200-yard mark, when he ran for 241 yards against Brown's Northeastern squad on Oct. 7 of 2000.

The Minutemen are 17-3 in Baylark's previous 20 100-yard rushing games, and they are 10-1 when Baylark records two touchdowns in a game. He has been in the end zone in 12 of the Minutemen's last 13 games, and has an Atlantic 10-best 11 touchdowns on the season. Baylark is also seventh in the nation in scoring with 9.43 points per game.

Baylark now has 35 career rushing touchdowns and 39 overall touchdowns, putting him in 4th place on UMass' all-time scoring list. Saturday's performance was Baylark's 20th 100-yard rushing game of his career. He broke the 100-yard mark on Saturday with the 58-yard run in the second quarter. His stat line after that play: 12 rushes, 138 yards. It was the beginning of the second quarter.

He has enough individual accolades to fill his entire apartment complex, but Baylark, through his own rushing success, has opened up the passing lanes for UMass' talented wide receiving corps. Brandon London, J.J. Moore, and Rasheed Rancher have been the beneficiaries of Baylark's hard running. Because of UMass' lethal ground attack, opponents are forced to put eight players in the box and go with single coverage on the wide outs. London, a 6-foot-5 terror that can hold on to anything thrown in his direction, has been left in single coverage a lot this season. He's burned opposing teams consistently because of his ability to get separation from the corners.

Cornerback Tracy Belton (No. 26) and UMass lead the Atlantic 10 in scoring defense. The Minutemen have allowed just 11.3 points per game.

London caught his 13th career touchdown on Saturday, tying him for 7th place on the UMass' all-time list for receiving touchdowns. He has 23 receptions for 369 yards on the year, an average of 16 yards per catch. Moore has 21 receptions for 326 yards. Rancher has 12 receptions for 267 yards. Tight end Brad Listorti has 14 receptions for 252 yards.

BRADY-ESQUE

UMass quarterback Liam Coen, after an injury to starter Tim Day last season opened the door for the freshman, has let loose in the 2006 campaign. He is leading the nation in passing efficiency at a 188.19 clip. He's completed 69.4 percent of his passes (second in the A-10 behind Ricky Santos of UNH) this season and has thrown for 1,585 yards (third in the A-10) and 15 touchdowns. His 15 TD throws are second only to Santos' 19.

While UMass has relied primarily on the run game in recent years, Coen's emergence as a reliable passer paired with the overall talent of his receivers has opened up the field for the offense.

FUMBLE-PRONE

The Minutemen have forced 14 fumbles this season and recovered nine of them. URI fumbled three times on Saturday, two in the first quarter alone. Linebacker Brad Andersen forced the first fumble at the 7:40 mark, and Rams quarterback Derek Cassidy fumbled with 1:15 left in the first frame. The Minutemen didn't recover either one, but Cassidy fumbled again at the Rams' 25-yard line in the third quarter. This time, safety Brandon Smith swooped in, grabbed the ball cleanly, and scurried into the URI end zone for his second fumble return for a touchdown this season.

FIELD GOAL-LESS

UMass had not allowed a field goal this season until Saturday. Opponents went 0-for-3 in the first six games of the season, and URI's first field-goal attempt on Saturday from 22 yards out sailed wide. However, with 14:52 left in the fourth quarter, URI kicker Colin Gallagher cut short the UMass streak with a 21-yard boot.

BROTHERS SQUARE OFF

Two sets of brothers played on opposite sides of the ball this weekend. Defensive tackle Jason Leonard of UMass and URI wide receiver Shawn Leonard, and UMass defensive lineman Matt Stolte and left tackle Mark Stolte of URI ... There were two illegal substitution penalties in Saturday's game, one on each team ... Rhode Island running back Joe Casey notched 136 yards on the ground Saturday. The last time a back ran for over 100 yards on the ground in a game vs. the Minutemen was Casey, when he rushed for 148 yards against the Maroon and White last season.

Courtney Robinson is the main reason for UMass' improvement on kick returns. With him back deep, the Minutemen average 27.5 yards per return.

Maine, UMass atop Atlantic 10 North

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After two untimely losses, UNH dropped to No. 11 in the nation, while Richmond and Maine come in at No. 13 and No. 15, respectively. Delaware, the team that lost to the Wildcats by a slim 52-49 score on Sept. 30, rounds out the Top 25 at No. 25.

Here are the in-conference standings for the A-10 North.

1. Maine: 4-0
2. Massachusetts: 4-0
3. New Hampshire: 2-2
4. Northeastern: 2-2
5. Hofstra: 1-3
6. Rhode Island: 0-4

Here are the in-conference standings for the A-10 South.

1. James Madison: 4-0
2. Delaware: 2-2
3. Richmond: 2-2
4. Towson: 2-2
5. Villanova: 1-3
6. William & Mary: 0-4

THE MAINE THING

Maine has been the surprise of the A-10 North. The Black Bears didn't make a splash in any preseason polls but they have notched some impressive victories against conference opponents this season. Maine beat William & Mary, 20-17, on the road in its first conference matchup, and ... after Boston College smashed the Black Bears, 22-0, in a Guarantee Game on Sept. 30 ... the Black Bears reeled off three straight 10-plus-point victories against Towson (28-7), Villanova (20-7) and Hofstra (21-10).

The Black Bears have Rhode Island next and should put another W in the win column. The Rams have yet to grab a win in the conference. Maine concludes the season with two tough games ... one on the road vs. UMass on Nov. 11, and the other at home vs. UNH.

UMass and UNH were thought to be the only contenders for the conference title this season, but the Black Bears are in the middle of the playoff hunt.

WILDCATS IN A TAILSPIN

UNH was No. 1 in the nation just a few short weeks ago. But several teams came close to beating the Wildcats and appear to have turned opposing teams onto some of their weaknesses. The Wildcats began the season against Big 10 foe Northwestern ... the only I-A team on their schedule ... and handled it easily in a 34-17 win. Stony Brook and Dartmouth went without a fight, but Delaware battled the Wildcats to a 52-49 final score. Then, it appeared, something clicked for opposing teams. A ranked Richmond squad came close the next week before succumbing, 27-17. Then James Madison handled the Wildcats in a 42-23 rout. The next week was Northeastern, an easy victory on paper for UNH. But the Huskies watched some game film and exploited the UNH defense for 36 points in a 36-35 overtime victory last weekend. The freefalling Wildcats dropped to No. 11 in the national poll, their lowest ranking of the season. UMass and Maine still remain on the schedule, and one more loss might be the end of the Wildcats' postseason hopes.

UMASS-IVE OFFENSE

There are two teams in the A-10 North averaging over 35 points per game ... UNH and UMass. The Wildcats have put the ball in the end zone 40 times this season, eight more than UMass' 32. UNH averages 41.3 points per game and the Minutemen are close behind with a 35.0 average. UNH ranks first in the conference in total offense with 449.1 yards per game, and the Minutemen are in its wake with 439.1 yards per game.

Quarterbacks Liam Coen (UMass) and Ricky Santos (UNH) are also in a battle for statistical dominance. Coen ranks third in passing yards per game (226.4) and first in pass efficiency (188.2), while Santos ranks second in passing yards per game (265.7) and third in pass efficiency (157.5). Santos ranks first in total offense with just over 300 yards per game, while Coen is Senior linebacker Akeem Jordan has led James Madison to a No. 5 ranking. Jordan recorded 18 tackles in each of JMU's last two games.

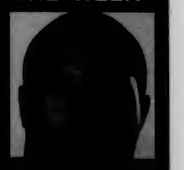
ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

This week's standout athlete is senior Steve Baylark. In the Minutemen's 41-16 rout of URI on Saturday, Baylark rushed for a career-high 235 yards on 26 carries. He also notched touchdown runs of eight and two yards. His 58-yard run in the first quarter was also a career-long for Baylark.



Baylark is now just 1.8 yards shy of his fourth-straight 1,000 yard season

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

With his solo shot in the first inning of Game 2 Sunday night, Craig Monroe became just the fifth player in MLB history to homer in each of his first two World Series games. Barry Bonds last did it in 2002.

'Dirtgate' sparks debate about cheating

Rogers' prior reputation refutes claim that substance was dirt

What was Kenny Rogers thinking? Has the Gambler nickname gone to his head? How did he remain in that game on Sunday night?

These are all questions baseball fans everywhere should be asking — including those in Detroit. Once again, Kenny Rogers failed to uplift his already dreadful image. The guy, blatantly cheated in the World Series, in full view of the Fox television cameras.

Props have to be given to Joe Buck and Tim McCarver (who isn't used to receiving them from the Boston area) for exposing this cheater on air. Everybody has now seen the freeze frame of Rogers' pitching hand with a mysterious brown substance smudged near the wrist.

Sunday night he effectively ruined one of the best stories of this postseason. He could have been the hero of the Cinderella Tigers, but now he should be the goat. Rogers had everybody eating out of his palm after he helped oust the Evil Empire from the playoffs not two weeks ago and led Detroit to its first World Series since 1987. Now we come to find out that he cheated us — and the game — all along.

MLB rules explicitly state that if a pitcher is using a foreign substance to doctor the ball, he must be immediately ejected from the game and face a 10-game suspension. That is exactly what should have happened to Rogers.

Through all this, let's not forget he's the same Kenny Rogers who shoved a camera into the face of an innocent cameraman who was just doing his job, and subsequently received a 20-game suspension from the league.

He came out in the first inning and continued the masterful work we'd seen the Divisional and Championship series.

He got David Eckstein to ground-out and struck out Scott Spiezio to start the inning. A walk to Albert Pujols and a Scott Rolen single got Rogers in trouble, but he ended the threat by forcing Juan Encarnacion to ground-out back to the mound.

Over his remaining six innings of work — with the goop washed from his pitching hand — Rogers allowed just one more hit and ran his scoreless streak to 23 innings. He's now just four innings away from tarnishing the mark Christy Matthewson set.

After the game, some of the Cardinals hitters said the ball was doing some weird things in that opening frame. Their story is slightly more believable seeing as though they haven't publicly assaulted anybody in recent memory.

If we could go back to his performances in the Divisional and Championship series for just a moment. Thank you once again to Fox for exposing those as shams as well. Sunday night the network showed still shots of Rogers in each of his playoff starts. Not coinci-

So who's a bigger cheater, Kenny Rogers or Shawne Merriman?

That seemed to be the only question residing in newsrooms around the country yesterday. There were no ifs, ands or buts about it. These two men were viewed as "dirty." They got caught breaking the rules. They, as the majority opinion holds, are now cheaters.

While Merriman actually tested positive for steroids, Kenny Rogers has been found guilty in the court of public opinion mainly because Major League Baseball has not reprimanded the Detroit Tigers starting pitcher for having a shady brown substance on the bottom of his pitching hand in Game 2 of the World Series on Sunday night.

Rogers became the oldest starting pitcher ever to win a World Series game in the Tigers' 3-1 win over the St. Louis Cardinals, evening the series at one game apiece. However, that win is now tarnished in the minds of those who saw the 41-year-old pitcher clean the brownish gunk off his throwing hand after the first inning.

Home plate umpire Alfonso Marquez noticed the "dirt" and told Rogers to clean it off. The umpires brought Cardinals manager Tony LaRussa out to the field for a brief discussion at the end of the first inning, and that was it. There was no more argument. No more speculation on the part of the National League Champions. It was back to business as usual.

Rogers cleaned what he called "a big clump of dirt" off his hand by the time he took the hill in the second inning. And whatever the substance was, taking it off did not prevent him from pitching a gem the rest of the way.

Rogers allowed one hit and one walk in the top of the first inning. He then washed the "dirt" off his hand. After that, the Tigers fiery starter threw seven more shutout innings, allowing only one more hit and two more walks, and compiling four more strikeouts.

He did better with a clean hand.

Maybe that's why LaRussa and the Cardinals had nothing else to say about the situation for the remainder of the game. They kept their mouths shut because not only were they unable to produce against the veteran lefty throughout the entire game, they did better against him when Rogers had the substance on his hand in the first inning.

His postseason history, combined with this incident, gives many baseball gurus a reason to believe he has been cheating in 2006.

Rogers had allowed 20 earned runs in 20 1/3 career postseason innings before this October. He has now thrown 23 consecutive scoreless innings in this year's playoffs, and is only the second pitcher in the history of the game to record three scoreless starts in a single postseason. The other is Christy Mathewson, who threw three

Reduced Frat: Demolition begins with Sigma Alpha Mu

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of five Frat Row houses was razed yesterday afternoon, as the University of Massachusetts comes closer to owning the five pieces of property located on North Pleasant Street.

A backhoe crunched down and flattened the purple and white house located at 395 North Pleasant St., which Sigma Alpha Mu used to occupy. The demolition is part of a deal between UMass and Alpha Tau Gamma, Inc. ... the company that currently owns the land.

After ATG knocks down the remaining four houses and seeds the land, UMass will purchase the parcels for $2.5 million.

"Part of the agreement in the offer that was made on our behalf included the buildings being demolished, and the land being graded and seeded," Joyce Hatch, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance said in a telephone interview last month.

The other former Greek houses located at 375, 387, 389 and 401 North Pleasant St. will be leveled in the upcoming weeks.

According to ATG officials, the demolition process took longer than expected, and there was a lot of red tape leading up to yesterday's razing.

"It's paperwork, it's checks, it's permits being issued, then all of the sudden you've got to dig up the street, but now one house has come down," said Jim Mulcahy, treasurer of ATG.

Mulcahy said remediation of asbestos also had to take place before ATG could go ahead with the destruction.

"They had to hire a company to come in and check all five buildings for anything that was hazardous," he said.

On Tuesday, Oct. 17 workers had to dig holes on North Pleasant St. to disconnect the houses' domestic water lines and large sprinkler lines. Mulcahy said this was the final procedure before the destruction could occur.

One factor that slowed down the demolition process took place on Sept. 24, when trespassers entered the five vacant houses in the early hours and set fire to an old couch in the building located at 375 North pleasant St.

Yesterday's demolition brings the end of a deal between UMass and ATG one step closer. Officials from both sides have been negotiating for over three years. Last spring, the residents of three of the houses were informed by ATG that they would have to move out by the end of the semester. Since that time, all five houses have been vacant.

Once the $2.5 million figure was agreed upon, ATG began preparing for the demolition.

While plans for what the University will do with the land are still speculative, Hatch said that the absence of the houses will "enhance the entryway

Last Sunday, Noach Brad Skikne, 22, died in a fatal car accident on Amherst Road on his way home after previously stopping to give first aid assistance to people involved in another motor vehicle accident.

Skikne, known as "Brad" to his friends, was a senior scheduled to graduate in the spring and was a familiar face at Chabad House.

"He was a very friendly person, a person who everyone [at Chabad House] knew of. Wherever he was, whether it was a good day, bad day, he was always there for you," Rabbi Simcha Levenberg said.

In a mass email, his friend Adam Katz described Skikne as "an open-hearted human being whose mission, as proclaimed by the Jewish faith,

New program aims to decrease drunk driving in students

BY MATT ALVEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It is 2 a.m. The party just ended, and you are miles from home. Buses have returned to the garage, and your friend's car has disappeared. Now, you feel that your only choice left is to decide which park bench to sleep on tonight.

Night after night, students from the University of Massachusetts find themselves searching for a way home after a full night of partying. Under such pressure, some students are forced to make poor decisions, like driving while intoxicated, walking the dark streets alone, or falling asleep in a house full of strangers.

Marquis Hunt, a former Umass student and Boston native, is avidly trying to start The Designated Driver Project of Amherst. The non-profit group would aim to provide rides for students who find themselves stranded late at night, helping to protect students and the community from the dangers of drunk driving.

Students may sign up for the community group by donating a small membership fee of no more than $10. The service will be available to members every week as long volunteers and funding allow it.

When members are in need of a ride, they can call a phone number to reach a volunteer operator. The operator gathers the caller's information and location, and submits a pickup request to the volunteer drivers.

Ride service programs exist all over the country, such as Tipsy Taxi, which started in Aspen, Colorado in 1983. Headed by Aspen's Deputy Sheriff Ellen Anderson, the program has been around for 23 years, operating every day of the year, 24 hours a day.

Fire report: Van Meter fire caused by plastic

A fire that erupted on Sunday in the basement of Van Meter of Central residential dorms was caused by "a piece of plastic that was left on top of an electric range," according to the Amherst Fire Department report.

BY FRANK VITALE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The fire in the basement of Van Meter which occurred early Sunday morning was not caused by something left inside the oven, according to the Amherst Fire Department.

The fire report states that it "appears that a piece of plastic, perhaps a lid to garbage can, was left on top of electric range." This, along with the fact that the unit ran on a half-hour timer, dispels the rumor that a resident left brownies in the oven.

The firemen found that the smoke detector, as well as the sprinkler system, had already gone off in the kitchenette by the time they arrived. Upon reaching the basement, they found the fire already extinguished, presumably by the sprinkler system.

After shutting off two valves to shut down water flow, the fire department ventilated the room and its surrounding area. All smoke and fire damage was contained in the kitchenette. The water from the sprinklers extended into the lounge and up the north hall of the basement, leaving an inch of water on the hallway floor. Seven dorm rooms in the basement were flooded, as well as the bathroom, laundry room, and several utility rooms.

Cleanup began Sunday morning with maintenance workers cleaning up the standing water in the hall, bathroom, and laundry room. The carpet in the basement lounge was cleaned Monday afternoon, and the carpets in the dorms began being cleaned late Tuesday morning.

The cleanup efforts will treat the smell, as well as eliminate most of the harmful molds or mildews that have grown as a result of the flooding.

Molds can produce irritants, allergens, and even harmful mycotoxins. They can cause serious allergic reactions with symptoms including sneezing, runny noses, red eyes and skin rashes, and can trigger asthma attacks in asthmatics who are allergic to mold.

N.J. court axes new death penalty rules

BY BETH DEFALCO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TRENTON, N.J. New Jersey prosecutors no longer have to prove a defendant is mentally fit to be executed, the state Supreme Court ruled Tuesday.

The decision shifts the burden of proving mental retardation to defendants trying to avoid death penalty, putting New Jersey in line with most other states.

The ruling likely won't affect any of the state's nine death row inmates anytime soon. New Jersey reinstated the death penalty in 1982 but has a moratorium on executions while a legislative panel evaluates capital cases. Its last execution was in 1963.

Tuesday's decision stemmed from the case of Porfirio Jimenez, a Honduran day laborer in prison on charges he sexually assaulted a 10-year-old boy before murdering him in 2001. Jimenez's lawyers claimed he was mentally retarded, with an IQ of 68.

A 2002 U.S. Supreme Court ruling declared executing mentally retarded criminals to be a violation of the Constitution's ban on cruel and unusual punishment, but it left it to states to decide whether the burden of proof about a defendant's mental status lies with the prosecution or defense.

In its ruling Tuesday, the New Jersey high court's majority likened a claim of mental retardation to a claim of insanity, which is considered an "affirmative defense" and has to be proved by the defendant.

Justices Barry T. Albin and Virginia Long dissented, arguing that placing the burden of proof on the defendant to show mental retardation would increase the chance of wrongly executing a mentally retarded person.

Every other state that has addressed the issue has determined a defendant should bear the burden of proof to prove mental retardation. Twelve states do not have death penalties.

Susan Remis Silver, one of Jimenez's public defenders, said the decision was disappointing.

Bloomberg: First Trade Center cleanup was subpar

BY SARA KUGLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – Mayor Michael Bloomberg acknowledged Tuesday that the city pushed for a swift cleanup at the World Trade Center but said the fast pace was an effort to return remains to victims' families quickly.

Meanwhile, 36 more bone fragments were found Tuesday in subterranean cavities along the edge of the site as workers continued burrowing into areas that were apparently missed during the initial cleanup.

Bloomberg spoke a day after The Associated Press reported that some officials handling the cleanup in 2002 had recommended a more thorough search for remains but felt rebuffed by a city agency that just wanted to finish the job.

The agency in charge of the excavation, the Department of Design and Construction, was applauded for its efficiency in 2002 after it whisked away the 10-story pile of trade center rubble in less than a year.

"Were we under time pressure? Absolutely," Bloomberg said Tuesday. "I don't know any family member that didn't want to find out whatever they could about the loved one that they lost. And we did it as fast as we could, consistent with safety and completeness."

Some victims' relatives dismissed the mayor's explanation for the quick cleanup.

"It had very little to do with the families," said Monica Gabrielle, who has no identified remains of her husband, Richard. "This is another spin – it's a diversion away from the issue, which is that management failed, not the workers. And management needs to be held accountable."

Among the officials who said they raised objections during the nine-month recovery effort was Lt. John McArdle, ground zero commander for the New York Police Department.

"There came a point in time when they said, 'We have to try to wrap this up,' and they tried to expedite it as much as possible, and they jumped the gun, and now you have all of these families hurt, and they're finding all these body parts," he said.

Several large bones were accidentally discovered last week after a utility crew opened up a non-working manhole. Since then, the city has been tearing up the pavement and examining other underground pockets in the same vicinity, which is a service road along the western edge of the 16-acre site.

In the past few days, more than 100 bones and fragments have been recovered. The medical examiner's office is working to match them to victims.

Thousands of pieces recovered during the main excavation still have not yielded matches, leaving more than 40 percent of the attack's 2,749 victims without any trace of remains.

The newly discovered bones are just the latest finding of overlooked remains. Hundreds of bone fragments have been found on the roof of a building just south of the trade center site, and officials are eyeing whether other buildings need to be combed again.

Dumpsters sit as recovery work continues at the site of the World Trade Center in New York yesterday. Utility workers removing rubble from manholes discovered bones last Thursday, prompting a search for more remains.

Tennessee fire chief and volunteers charged with arson

BY WOODY BAIRD
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TIPTONVILLE, Tenn. – The city's fire chief and three volunteer firefighters, including the chief's grandson, were charged Tuesday with setting a string of fires in vacant buildings over the past two years.

The men, all members of the Tiptonville Volunteer Fire Department, were arrested Monday. No one was hurt in the blazes they were accused of starting.

All four men were in the Lake County jail Tuesday after a judge set bond at $100,000 for Fire Chief James Blackburn and $25,000 or more each for the others.

"Everybody knew that we had a firebug for a couple of years," said Johnny Whitson, who owns an auto body shop near where two buildings burned.

The charges list 10 structures that were burned from August 2004 to June 2006 – several within 150 yards of Blackburn's home.

Charged in the investigation were Blackburn, who is also superintendent of the city water plant; his firefighter grandson, Brandon Blackburn; and firefighters Floyd Joe Kilburn and Chris Burns.

But the police chief and other Tiptonville residents said there have been many other suspicious fires that no one has been charged with setting.

Robert Dougherty said he moved next door to the fire chief about six months ago and has been amazed by the number of fires in the area.

Phil Bivens, district attorney general for Lake County, said if convicted the firefighters could receive three to 15 years in prison.

"One of the factors the court will look at is that they are in a position of public trust as firemen," Bivens said.

"I just hate that it happened in my town," said Rhodes, adding that he attended school with Blackburn. "These are people that children look up to."

Arrest photos from the Tiptonville, Tenn., Police Department show James Blackburn, Brandon Blackburn, Floyd Kilburn and Chris Burns, all charged for setting a string of fires in the past two years.

Tipsy Taxi operates differently from the proposed Amherst project.

In Aspen, vouchers for free taxi rides can be given out by peace officers, trained bartenders, owners and managers to people in need of a designated driver. Bartenders hand out these vouchers to the public, but people hosting private parties can also call the service if they feel a guest should be escorted home.

One major issue facing such a program in Amherst is the large number of students under the age of 21.

"A lot of people are not supporting this because they say this encourages underage drinking," said Hunt.

This issue makes it difficult for the community, school and law enforcement to lend their support to the program – a partnership that Anderson describes as "essential."

Tipsy Taxi drivers are trained to keep a watchful eye and report any underage drinker who receives a ride. Anderson stresses that drivers avoid confrontation and wait until the patron is safely home. Once the rider is safely home, taxi drivers contact the Sheriff's Department who deal with the issue the next day.

Anderson fears that confronting an underage drinker upon pickup would cause them to decline the service and jeopardize their chances of returning home safely.

"Our first priority is to get people home," said Anderson. "In my many years I've seen too many young people try to drive."

Another issue facing Hunt's proposed project is funding. The project would rely entirely on donations and is in need of startup money. He is currently organizing a raffle and seeking local restaurants to donate gift certificates and other prizes to encourage participation.

"My number one goal is to keep drunk drivers off the road," says Hunt.

"Rarely can a person inspire others to the degree that Noach could inspire," Katz added. "A mere conversation with him had the ability to enthuse, motivate, and push you to become a better, kinder, and happier person."

Skikne's faith played an important part of his every day life. He took a semester off to attend Yeshiva in New York City and spent his days near his rabbi, Rabbi Levenberg, and Chabad House.

"He was actively involved in Jewish life on campus and a faction of Chabad House. All the students knew him," Rabbi Levenberg said. "He even sat next to me when I taught my classes. He was able to synthesize complex concepts so the lay person could totally get it. People think of Chabad House they don't think of me they think of Brad. He was the poster boy. It was his baby."

Skikne was a Biochemistry major. 18 credits away from graduation and working to fulfill his goal of entering Dentistry school. Gwenn Federman wrote this on the notes section of her account in a note called "A Missing Piece".

Ohio executes cult leader for five murders

BY JOHN MCCARTHY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUCASVILLE, Ohio – A religious cult leader was executed Tuesday for murdering a family of five followers who were taken one at a time to a barn, bound and shot to death. The youngest was a girl just 7 years old.

Jeffrey Lundgren, 56, said "I profess my love for God, my family, for my children, for Kathy [his wife] I am because you are," in his final statement before he died by injection at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility.

Lundgren was convicted in the slayings of the Avery family – Dennis, 49, Cheryl, 46, Trina, 15, Rebecca, 13, and 7-year-old Karen.

In 1989, Lundgren arranged a dinner hosted by cult members. Afterward, he and his followers led the family members one by one to their deaths while the others unknowingly cleaned up after dinner.

Lundgren shot each victim two or three times while a running chain saw muffled the sound of the gunfire.

Lundgren formed the cult with about 20 members in the northeast Ohio town of Kirtland after he was dismissed in 1987 as a lay minister of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, an offshoot of the Mormon Church.

He said God commanded him, through interpretation of Scriptures, to kill the Avery family, who had moved from Missouri in 1987 to follow his teachings.

Oppression of women: the bare truth

Jackie Hai

The other week, British Cabinet Minister Jack Straw sparked widespread controversy when he publicly stated his opposition to the wearing of veils by Muslim women. On the HBO talk show "Real Time with Bill Maher," political comedian and commentator Bill Maher and guest panelist Lou Dobbs agreed Muslim women living in the United States should not cover themselves, and that doing so is an affront to American ideals of freedom.

Their reasoning? That the burkha – a full-body robe that conceals the face – symbolizes tyranny and the oppression of women.

"I think a lot of people think tolerance goes to the level of tolerating intolerance. And, to me, the burkha is a symbol of intolerance," said Maher.

Dobbs added: "The fundamental value of this country is equality, period. And the fundamental issue with that burkha is inequality."

Here's my problem with this kind of argument. Who's to decide what practices are "free" and what practices are oppressive? If America is such a bastion of equality and free choice, as Maher and Dobbs seem to imply, then why are so many American women and girls bombarded with impossible expectations to the point of emotional and physical anguish?

In fact, many Muslim women prefer – and, yes, choose – to cover themselves for precisely that reason: to escape the sexualization and objectification that comes hand-in-hand with being female and living in Western society. Their vocal support for the hijab, meaning both the traditional head covering and the concept of modesty, spans generations from groups on Facebook to international Web sites like prohijab.net that proclaim, "Hijab: our freedom, our choice, our right."

Denying them that right, or calling such wishes the misguided product of brainwashing (as some critics will say), is in itself a deluded way of thinking.

Are the women and girls in our country not brainwashed by media and popular culture into looking and behaving a certain way? Reality TV shows admonish us "What Not to Wear" while "Extreme Makeovers" mold participants into Barbie dolls.

Airbrushed celebrities and skeletal supermodels are plastered across the covers of magazines. Franchises like "Hooters" and "Playboy" reduce women to mere objects of men's sexual desires; fashion trends push shorter skirts, lower cuts, tighter tops and higher heels every year.

When humiliating wardrobe malfunctions can cause clothes to literally fall off the women trying to wear them, surely there is a problem.

Take a walk around campus, and you'll invariably cross paths with groups of female students held hostage by our culture's standards of beauty. On a frigid fall day in New England, they are shivering in halter tops, low-rise pants and heels. Does freedom of choice also mean freedom to freeze to death?

When humiliating wardrobe malfunctions can cause clothes to literally fall off the woman trying to wear them, surely there is a problem.

Given the steady rise of eating disorders across the nation, we might as well add freedom to starve to that list, too. Cases of anorexia and bulimia have more than doubled since the 1960s, and most disturbingly, have sharply increased among girls still in elementary school. The reason is no mystery – it is the superficial and downright unrealistic ideals that cannot (and common sense says should not) ever be reached.

"You're trying to fit into this image of something that you're not," said one UMass student, describing her past struggle with body image over the years. "When you're dreaming about food labels, worrying about caloric intake, food becomes a battle, not a pleasure.

"Fashion models and storefront mannequins have shapes that most people just don't share," she added.

And the only thing achieved by designer labels like "Abercrombie" and "Tiffany" is bringing about a sort of brand-name slavery in the middle and working classes where people are spending more than they can afford in the never-ending quest for social status.

All of this for what? Some need to conform, to gain acceptance, to attract men? Honestly America, if we're trying to find some grounds for moral superiority in a system like this, we are looking in the wrong place.

Yet, political pundits and armchair critics not only ignore these glaring issues, but flaunt them on the surface as reasons our culture is somehow more free and more civilized than others. Pressure to cover your skin is primitive and backwards, but pressure to bare it all isn't?

Which begs my next question: if there are people who believe the burkha and hijab symbolize oppression of Muslim women, why won't more people believe the g-string and stiletto pump symbolize oppression of American women?

The answer to that, my friends, is the naked reality of inequality.

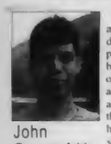
The violation of Habeas Corpus



John Gruenenfelder

Unfortunately, ultimately, dangerous precedents have been a hallmark of the current administration and the bill the president has recently signed into law, detailing how Guantanamo Bay prisoners are to be tried, compounds an already troubling situation.

Perhaps the most troubling aspect of the new tribunal law is the new restriction it places on the right of habeas corpus. Habeas corpus is a writ by which a prisoner is brought before a court so as to learn why he or she is being imprisoned. In other words, it is a safeguard against illegal detention.

It still is, for U.S. citizens at least. For non-citizens, the clock has been rolled back about 800 years in the name of fighting terrorism. If you have the misfortune of being classified as an "enemy combatant," then you also lose any right to habeas corpus. Is this is the direction in which to take the country?

The administration and its supporters often state that the detainees are violent terrorists and, as such, should not be given the same privileges and safeguards other prisoners might.

A longstanding precedent we have in this nation is non-citizens are treated to nearly all of the same rights and protections that citizens are granted. Eroding this foundation can only hurt our country. Just because the law makes a distinction between those with and without citizenship, it does not mean this is a problem only for some of the population; it's a problem for everybody.

The administration and its supporters often state that the detainees are violent terrorists and, as such, should not be given the same privileges and safeguards other prisoners might. This argument contains no proof, however, and is intended more to reinforce the idea these are bad people. If the public consistently views these people as violent criminals, then they are less likely to take offense when rights, like habeas corpus, are denied.

There is little doubt that many of these men are indeed terrorists, but as numerous reports and articles have demonstrated, there are more than a few innocent people who were in the wrong place at the wrong time.

We need open trials of these people so the government can prove beyond doubt whether or not the accused is a terrorist. After all, right now they are suspected terrorists. Treating them as guilty as they were already convicted, which is what we are doing now, is a serious offense to our system of justice.

Public and open trials in our entirely functional criminal justice system would be ideal. A number of European countries have already done just that, and the process has worked well. The president falsely claims this cannot be done due to matters of national security, but he also uses that same argument for well thought out military tribunals.

Even before the new tribunal law was signed, an existing and workable framework, provided by the Uniform Code of Military Justice, was available. The military lawyers felt this was the proper course and many in Congress agreed, but still the administration rejected the idea.

One of the president's fundamental tenets of terrorism is they hate our freedom. Maybe his new strategy is to remove this temptation from the terrorists by preemptively ridding us of certain freedoms. And to start with we get poorly designed trials for people who may or may not be terrorists.

Alexis de Tocqueville wrote that "no protracted war can fail to endanger the freedom of a democratic country." By all accounts the war on terrorism will be very protracted, and we are already seeing inroads being made in curtailing freedoms.

It starts small, as it always must, freedom limited for certain select groups. Non-citizens will always be treated differently, but when it comes to habeas corpus, a fundamental ideal of modern democracy, it is time to be concerned.

I honestly believe our country will not get to the point where citizens' rights are similarly curtailed, but I am troubled that we have gotten this far in laying the groundwork.

The actual threat posed by real terrorists is enough without having to worry about an overreaching government taking steps on the domestic front which do not help prosecute the criminals. Instead, these steps serve only to disheartern people at home and bring scorn from people abroad.

Fortunately, an election will soon be here and will allow voters to send an unmistakable signal to Congress. Just because the president would like to trample over democracy doesn't mean the senators and representatives need to capitulate. Congress needs to not pass such foolish legislation, and the voters need to let Congress know what happens when they do.

Transitioning process down to a science

Teresa Franco

Among the swarm of students wandering about campus each day, new freshmen are not hard to find. They travel in such tight packs it's as though they are strung together like beads on a necklace; where ever one goes, another is sure to follow. They look frightened and confused, but nevertheless, frightened and confused together. I have the unfortunate luck of experiencing this freshman fear twice. Only the latter was sans the safety network. Yes, if you haven't guessed already, I was a transfer student.

There are many issues transfers are not aware of when signing the acceptance letter to their prospective school. There's the initial excitement of having to enter a school where no one knows your name, and everyone's a possible friend. The former school becomes microscopic, and the new school appears to be a huge kingdom of opportunities and possibilities.

Upon hearing my acceptance, I could only think of the positive and was entirely content with my decision. As move-in day drew closer, obstacles I did not think about in the past started to seep into my head. I became bombarded with thoughts, such as the fact I was coming from a school where everyone was a familiar face, to a school which could exceed the population of a small city.

I became bombarded with thoughts, such as the fact I was coming from a school where everyone was a familiar face, to a school which could exceed the population of a small city.

Like a large portion of transfers, I was transferring mid-year; so, not only was I going to have to learn all the endless routes around campus, I was going to have to do it slipping and falling over sheets of ice and gusty winds.

The transfer transition is twice as hard as what freshmen go through. For one thing, freshmen are surrounded by others who are going through the same thing. If they start freaking out about finding classes or missing home, if they wander down their hall, there is a good chance there's another freshman stressed out for the same reasons.

Transfers are basically all on their own, especially since there is no real program providing them with the opportunity to mingle and meet one another. Also, freshmen are expected to not know their way around and ask millions of questions to passers-by about directions on their way to class. I was often hesitant to ask anyone anything, so I spent the first few weeks taking ridiculously round about ways to class, leaving me not only confused, but with sore legs as well.

Another issue transfers face is meeting people. The chances of getting placed on a friendly floor are slim to none. They are thrown into wherever there is space, which in my case was the smallest room on the floor I was on, with a pipe running down the middle of the room and closets with nails shooting out everywhere. Wearing protective armor to get my clothes every morning didn't sound like a bad idea. As for mid-year transfers, the majority of the floor usually has already formed their designated groups and pays little attention to the arrival of new faces.

It can get quite tiresome running around re-establishing yourself while trying to maintain a decent GPA at the same time. Isolation can creep up easily, especially within the first few weeks when everything is still foreign and different. I can recall digging the hole I was in deeper by reading the away messages of my friends at other schools and their activities I would be a part of if I were there.

The main advice I can give to any transfer out there is to not let yourself stay in a slump if you happen to slide into one. There will be times when dropping out and not dealing with it all will sound like a good idea, but in time those thoughts will pass. Remind yourself of the amount of courage it took to make the decision to switch schools all together and how hard you have worked to get here.

In a way, transfers are an extra step ahead in the real world. To any current transfer student out there treading water in the hectic current of UMass, just think of the courage it took you to take this step. After college, when most are having trouble keeping afloat due to the change, you will have the transitioning process down to a science. It will hardly faze you at all.

You have made the transition process twice; therefore, you have experience in two different institutions, making you adaptable to any environment. So, while those you know have been at the same school for four straight years are falling apart post-college, you will be the cool, calm and collected one. You have done it once, so you can do it again with no problem at all.

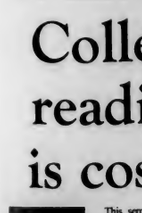
College reading is costly



Andrew Freeman

This semester I spent $40 on textbooks, and I could have paid less. Rather than spend $300 to $600 on books each semester, I chose to purchase only the books I could not otherwise acquire.

College textbooks are overpriced, and this is part of a long-term trend. A 2005 study by the Government Accountability Office found that the price of textbooks grew by an average of 6 percent per year from 1996 to 2004. During that period, the inflation rate averaged 3 percent, half that of textbooks. Textbook publishers can set prices higher than they would for regular books, because of the unique structure of that market.

The textbook industry is a flawed market. Theoretically, a capitalist market works to ensure products provide consumer satisfaction, while preventing them from being prohibitively expensive. Consumers control what purchases they make, and can refrain from buying a product that is perceived as overpriced. In the market of textbooks, consumers – students – have no such control, because they are obliged to purchase what their professors assign.

To illustrate this, consider two textbooks, both used for an introductory calculus course. One costs $30 and the other $100; both cover the same material. Most individuals would purchase the first book, since the content is comparable, and it is substantially cheaper. But if a professor requires the use of the second text, assigning homework from it, the student is compelled to pay the additional $70. The student's choice is restricted to acquiring the textbook or trying to do without it.

A further problem with the market is professors have no economic incentive to choose cheaper products, as it is not their money that purchases the texts. If no lower-cost options are available, professors have no reason – other than charity – to agitate for cheaper options. In short, college students have practically no market power, and professors have no material inclination to use their power.

Since there is no check on the cost of the product, companies can increase prices for higher profits. Pearson, one of the largest textbook publishers, reported profits of $269 million from its higher education business, according to its 2005 Annual Report. Higher education accounted for 30 percent of the company's profits, but only 20 percent of sales, while its school division had 32 percent of sales and 29 percent of profits. This data indicates college textbooks are significantly more profitable than those sold to schools, providing further evidence of their excessive prices.

By this reasoning, if you see a mugging, it's acceptable to take the victim's shoes, since they are being exploited in a worse fashion anyway.

Textbook companies often defend themselves by noting the expense of college has increased in general, and they account for only a fraction of overall costs.

By this reasoning, if you see a mugging, it's acceptable to take the victim's shoes, since they are being exploited in a worse fashion anyway. Many students can afford the high prices, but those who struggle to pay for college should not have to contend with expensive textbooks as well.

Another argument is that supplemental materials (the CDs and media bundled with textbooks) justify the high expense. Bruce Hildebrand of the Association of American Publishers claims in "Textbook Facts vs. Rhetoric" such materials offer "extra support to students who are less prepared" for college, [thus] lowering the dropout rate."

Whatever impact this remedial support has, and Hildebrand cites no studies or evidence to confirm it, it is likely offset by the number of students that are driven out of college by high textbook prices.

To avoid purchasing textbooks, I rely on the library system. As a history major, I can usually find the books for my classes at our library or one of the other four colleges. The books I need for history classes are not large textbooks, but shorter, more focused works, often meant for academics rather than just college students; accordingly, they are usually carried in the libraries. I also use the reserve system, borrowing books that my professors have placed on reserve at the library.

This method for saving money would not work for students in disciplines outside of the Humanities, and it would not support a large number of students. The libraries have a limited number of books that are used in courses, certainly not enough to support thousands of students. The reserve system, similarly, would be overtaxed if everyone stopped purchasing textbooks.

There are many methods to reduce your textbook expenses – reselling books, sharing with friends and purchasing used or electronic editions; however, as long as market forces allow publishers to keep prices artificially high, this problem will persist. Only sustained agitation by students and professors, or government intervention, will eliminate it.

Signing your life away

Michael Dennis

Entering the Campus Center concourse on a brisk autumn evening, you expect to encounter light traffic and perhaps a vendor here or there, but nothing too out of the ordinary. Today, you're convinced, is not the day your life is going to change dramatically.

Three exams and a marathon session of online video lectures have brought your dreams back down to earth, and you're in dire need of something to pick you back up again. Suddenly, a husky and remarkably comforting voice calls out from the distance, and with those spoken words, he might as well be whispering sweet, tender nothings in your ear.

"Free T-shirt. Absolutely free," calls out the sweaty, hyena-eyed man, who is passing out clipboards to eager students as rapidly as arsenic-laced Kool-Aid at a cult retreat. You wonder what sort of mystical secrets these clipboards could be holding, for it appears as though they're the missing link in your quest for the ever-elusive T-shirt.

From such a far distance, you can't make out exactly what color the T-shirt is, nor what's printed on it, the size, or if there actually is, in fact, a supply of T-shirts. Perhaps it's some sort of a cruel ruse designed to lift the spirits of down and out college students, only to abandon them at the altar and leave behind a clipboard of shattered dreams. But if there are indeed real T-shirts to be found, you'd fancy yourself a bumbling fool to pass up such a chance.

You're instructed to hastily sprawl out all of your most sensitive secrets onto a form attached to a clipboard – your social security number, address, phone number, mother's maiden name and your favorite Greg Kinnear movie.

You inquire to the disheveled man who appears to be at the helm of the operation – casual campus apparel's response to Willy Wonka, minus the fancy suit and the chocolate. (But really, who needs chocolate – or an entire chocolate factory for that matter – when such important things are at stake?)

You ask him if there is really a supply of actual T-shirts behind the table, and if so, how did he get them? Slightly embarrassed, you admit you've never seen a T-shirt in real life before, but you're instantly comforted when the bustling throng of students around you declares in unison they haven't either.

You're instructed to hastily sprawl out all of your most sensitive secrets onto a form attached to a clipboard – your social security number, address, phone number, mother's maiden name and your favorite Greg Kinnear movie. It's hard to keep track of exactly what you've written; it's as though it has come from your subconscious, because all that's on your mind is that holy grail of a t-shirt.

It's a beaut: the latest in 100 percent cotton fashion. It has the word "COLLEGE" sprawled across the front, with some sort of corporate logo on the back. This particular model of T-shirt is said to be worth more than life itself – more than your dignity, financial security or the $2 it cost to produce. Dang, it's rarer than the bald eagle, and a hell of a lot more American to boot. You've been searching for years in vain for such a treasure.

The hyena-eyed fellow explains you'll be mailed a credit card once your application is processed. Yeah, yeah, you're thinking, as your eyes gloss over. All the while, your growling stomach implores your nervous system to start your legs in motion towards the Blue Wall, but your eyes can't pry themselves from the t-shirt that awaits you.

For a moment you consider expressing yourself to this Wonka-like character by reciting the lyrics of James Blunt's overpoweringly deep and influential chart topper, "You're Beautiful," and you stop only because you realize the process is finished, and your dreams have all come to fruition; the T-shirt is yours.

Exiting the Campus Center, you wonder how your day could possibly get any more magical. As an official-looking gentleman in dark sunglasses enters, you step off to the side, hold the door and give him a brilliantly upbeat how-do-you-do. Unfortunately, however, your joy has blinded you to the fact he's quite a menacing fellow, and he's headed straight for you.

You're blindsided as his cronies hold you against the wall and he attaches a ball and chain to your ankle. He mutters something about a life sentence before quickly rushing off, and you can hear him laughing maniacally from a distance.

Looking down at the ball and chain, you notice a large dollar sign painted on the side. An overwhelming inclination to warn the other students of the dangers ahead washes over you but quickly passes. It's not your place to derail their aspirations.

As you hobble away, weighted down by the ball and chain, you stop and ponder the T-shirt for a moment, and wonder if the struggle was worth it. You know down the road you may be tempted, overwhelmed, harassed – or worse, even jailed – as a result of the agreement you've entered into. But destiny doesn't wait, and for a precious T-shirt with "COLLEGE!" emblazoned across the front, you're willing to take a risk or two.

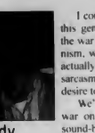
War on rhetoric



Andy Martin

I could write I'm thrilled to be part of this generation; since we've finally won the war on drugs and the war on communism, we can finally focus on something actually scary. However, my penchant for sarcasm has finally been defeated by a desire to speak plainly.

We're told daily that we are in a global war on terror. The relentless stream of sound-bites declares anyone who fails to recognize this is a fool or even a traitor.

Now this runs the risk of stating the painfully obvious, but I feel there's enough rhetoric from the opposite viewpoint, so I won't be hurting anyone too badly.

Let me express this as plainly as I can:

There is no war on terror. There can be no war on terror. This is what I've concluded from listening to our fearless leaders: if you say something enough times with enough conviction, people will believe it, regardless of what it is.

Many Americans must sincerely believe our country is somehow engaging terror, the abstract concept, hand to hand. But what evidence is there that anything is actually happening in this titanic conflict?

Of course, Dick Cheney will be happy to assure you any day that Americans are safer now thanks to the war on terror. For some reason that isn't good enough for me. It reminds me of when Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld assured us he knew where Iraq's chemical and biological weapons actually were.

It's true there have been no catastrophic terror attacks on U.S. soil since September 11. Does that really mean we are safer? Were we formerly accustomed to horrific attacks every three to five years?

The reactionary element in our government has always had a more dogged and effective rhetoric (propaganda) machine. One example of the power of rhetoric occurred in the 1930s when certain people decided it should be illegal to grow hemp. It was nothing but a constant, unequivocal assertion that convinced the public to despise the innocuous weed as a dangerous narcotic responsible for turning sweater-wearing teens into ax-murderers.

I won't try to analyze the reasons for disparity in rhetorical skill, that's just how I see it.

Another good example of this overwhelming rhetoric occurred when our leaders whipped the American people into a frenzy of anti-communism. This started well before the Cold War, even before 1920, seemingly for the sole purpose of suppressing ideas detrimental to the dominance of capital.

In Western Europe in the same time period, America's horror of communism was a source of humor and wonder, and Europe escaped being engulfed by the creeping red terror.

And now, after all the lessons we haven't learned, they've done it again. To be called soft on terror is every politician's nightmare, and this title can be earned with very little effort. Questioning administration policy is a good example.

Naturally, the party that coined the rhetoric and the buzzwords has a monopoly on the issue. True to form, the opposition (acquiescent) party has rolled over in the face of insurmountably single-minded propaganda.

To get back to my point, a war can only be fought between two countries or two groups of people

Of course, terrorism does need to be prevented, and it needs to be a primary job of our government; however, it can't be stopped by a war any more than drugs can.

An all-out war on terrorism cannot be fought, and it certainly can't be won. By framing the conflict in such unequivocal terms, our leaders have put the country in an untenable position. Simply by avoiding eradication, terrorists are beating us on our own terms.

A campaign to prevent terrorism should be pursued the way it was before the World Trade Center attack, albeit with more resources and thoroughness. Intelligence gathering, informers, spies and, yes, assassinations should be our counter-terrorism strategies.

The most notable result of declaring a war on terror is that radical Muslim leaders who recruit the terrorists of the future have a much easier job. It can't be hard to convince young men their faith and way of life are under attack when America is portrayed as systematically dismantling the Muslim world country by country.

Bottom line is the war on terror's only real utility is as a cynical catchphrase to secure political control through intimidation. It is not a sincere attempt to secure American lives.

Nation living in fear

Kevin Dooley

Every other Wednesday, the Daily Collegian Ed/Op section crosses its fingers and hopes that my columns are somewhat interesting, insightful and maybe, just maybe, make someone think about something they may have not thought about before.

I usually fail at being any of these things that all us columnists aspire to be, but this particular week I've decided going a little crazy will allow me to raise an interesting point.

I've been called crazy by almost everyone I've ever met, so why stop here? This following statement may be a shock to some, but it really shouldn't be: people in this extraordinary, magnificent country of ours have not been content lately. In fact, we've been kind of miserable.

That's quite a statement to make since we've all been conditioned to believe, practically since birth through history classes, the media, and just about everybody else, the United States is the culmination of a long evolutionary thought process. We're the lovechild of the Enlightenment movement, the finished product of how human civilization should operate: the fighters for freedom and democracy in the face of oppression everywhere. We should be feeling pretty good about ourselves right now shouldn't we?

So the question becomes, if we're supposedly swimming in a golden pool of luxuries and freedoms, why are we so unhappy? To find out the answer, we must realize not everyone is swimming in these luxuries.

For starters, the U.S. Census Bureau reported 37 million people were living in poverty last year; some have to decide between food and healthcare right now. In fact, 15.9 percent of the population, or 46.6 million, had no health insurance last year.

The gap between the wealthy and the middle class has grown more in the last couple of years than in anytime in history. The middle class is being told our economy has never been in better shape. But when we look in our wallets, they're empty. Mind you, this is all occurring in the richest nation on the planet.

And please explain to me how the United States can be happy right now when word got out last week the CEO of UnitedHealth Group, a healthcare company, Dr. William McGuire has accumulated $1.6 billion in stock options and decides only now that may be enough, for the time being, of course. Meanwhile, healthcare costs are going through the roof.

It would be a shame not to mention another matter which hits close to home, the rising cost of a college education at a public university, which in this state has risen only by 49 percent between 2000 and 2005. During that same time, the median income in Massachusetts rose by only 12 percent. Makes you scratch your head doesn't it?

The national debt has grown to an unimaginable figure of $49 trillion. Could that have anything to do with the fact we're currently waging wars against evildoers who have no other reason to hate us than they were born with that extra chromosome to hate freedom? I hate to also mention the baby boomers will begin retiring in 2008, and social security will likely run out within ensuing years.

How about our president telling the country a few years back he had a conversation with God and He told him he had His vote for invading Iraq. I may have believed that if I was some peasant toiling farmland in Russia in the Middle Ages and the Tsar told me I was off to fight a war in the name of God. It's very depressing to know our president thinks some of us are that foolish.

Now I suppose I should just realize all of this chaos unraveling around me is normal and is the way nature intended things to end up, right?

However, I have a very hard time believing all of this hatred and fear among social classes and races is how everything is supposed to be. I'd be quite shocked if running around like a bunch of loony mice slashing each other's throats in pursuit of the American dream is the blueprint of God/Mother Nature whoever the hell runs this oversized rock.

We may be growing closer to seeing the origins of the universe through our big, mighty telescopes, but we can't even see this country is starting to fall apart at the seams? Are we that blind?

I've got a feeling, based on all these problems I've mentioned, we're a nation of people living in fear. All we've ever been taught is capitalism and chasing down the illusive American Dream is our ticket to happiness. We don't know any other way to really live.

So, how about we get off this high horse I like to call ignorance and perceived security that we've been riding upon for much too long? I think it's about time we stop running around in this fantasy world we've created for ourselves, don't you think? Let's all go a little crazy, because normalcy and the status quo don't seem to be working right now.

Fiery Furnaces to heat things up on Pearl Street

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Thursday night, The Fiery Furnaces will perform at the Pearl Street Clubroom at 8:30 p.m. Whether you're a devoted fan or have no idea who they are, this is one concert that is worth catching.

If you have never heard of the Fiery Furnaces, and there are many of you out there, you are at a loss. You have been missing out on some of the most experimental music of a new breed. They have been described by the Boston Globe as "an oddly dynamic duo ... who comes across as a very symbiotic rock outfit."

Stemming from Oak Park, Illinois, Matthew and Eleanor Friedberger started making music which would soon become the newest concept sound in the underground music community. The brother and sister duo began with small recordings of their grandmother, and have utilized many musicians along the way.

When they hit Northampton, the band will consist of Eleanor singing, Matthew on keyboard, Jason Loewenstein on guitars, and drummers Bob D'Amico and Michael Goldman on various percussion instruments.

Describing the music of Eleanor and Matthew Friedberger is extremely difficult, even if I could listen to it over and over again. If you were to select any of their songs randomly and listen to them to try and get a feel of what they sound like, you would hear upwards of five or six different melodies all spread out and surrounding one overall theme.

This is Cubism in music form. The duo seems to disregard any musical coherence and has the ability to jump from a repetitive bass beat to a crazy circus theme, bending and twisting so that each thematic piece lasts about 30 seconds. They sample what seems to be the most eclectic arrangement of noise made by over eleven instruments, including a synthesizer, organ, guitar, bass, and various drums and noisemakers.

The music drips with heavy, fat chords all the way through. But the music is only half of what The Fiery Furnaces are all about. After Matthew writes the songs, which he does specifically with his sister in mind, Eleanor sings against the beat, creating an odd, experimental feel to everything they do.

The lyrics, in turn, are some of the most 'out-there' concoctions ever assembled. In one of their singles, the lyrics flow as, "Great gulps of Greek fire get us in/ Sling sticks at the stockade Fort Dauphin/ A guardsman gave a griffin said grease my duke/ Down by the chimney and out through the fluke."

It seems you either get it, or you don't.

I had the chance to speak with Eleanor Friedberger yesterday morning, and after two days of performing, her voice sounded dark but elegant. She was cooking something as I spoke with her.

ALEX BUTLER: I'm just going to cut right into this. I know you're music is very out-there and experimental, but I was wondering if you could talk about the transition from the studio to live performances.

ELEANOR FRIEDBERGER: I wouldn't say it's easy. It's a lot of work for Matt, who creates all the arrangements. He makes it seem easy, but he definitely has to sit down and work at making it sound like it does. I know he enjoys it, but it's not like something we all go practice together. We're going to play every song except for two off of [album] "Bitter Tea," and most of it blends together in one half hour set. We rehearse for a month to make sure we all got it down.

AB: It feels like you have a lot of influences and inspirations. What was inspirational for you to keep going? Was your family a big role?

EF: Music was always on, and [Matt and I] were never told to turn it off or stop banging on something, which I think is unique – not a lot of people got to grow up in an environment like that. Listening to the radio, though, in Chicago was probably the biggest influence for me. We'd have the radio on and it's so different place to place. Going to different countries, I spent a lot of time in Britain; you just realize it's so different. I love turning to the Classic Rock station and love everything I hear. And learning from it was so important – you could listen to the radio for three hours and everything was so good. From age eight or nine, I listened constantly. Led Zeppelin was my favorite at age 12.

AB: Any other favorite bands?

EF: Oh sure, there's Van Morrison ... Ronnie Lane of The Faces has an absolutely beautiful voice. Mom recently, I've gotten into more Tropicalia and non-English music. Brazilian stuff, too, but more specifically Jorge Ben – he's got a beautiful voice.

AB: What do you think about being compared to the White Stripes?

EF: Well, we haven't been compared to them in a long time, really only when we released our first album. It's hard to write about bands, nowadays, just because there is so much – everyone needs a point of reference, but we don't care.

AB: Britt Daniels [of Spoon] compared your live shows as "Captain Beefheart with a pretty Joey Ramone on vocals." Do you have any opinion on your live shows specifically?

EF: That's great. We try to give the audience something different, you know, than what they hear on the record. It's a big effort. We try hard, though.

AB: Categorizing you music is something no one seems able to do. I know it must be a tiresome question to answer, but what would you say your music is like in so many words?

EF: Luckily I haven't had to do that. Essentially, we're a rock n' roll band, but with a sense of humor. Though we're serious about what we're doing, we're not afraid to laugh. We tend to flock to music which makes us laugh. I'm not giving you good adjectives here, am I? When I see a random drum solo, I laugh out loud, and that's very important I think. We love doing funny things with our music. But at the same time, I like heart-felt songs with a story. I think having a combination of those two is unusual, but interesting.

The Fiery Furnaces are currently touring with Deerhoof, a band which Eleanor described as "the best band out there." However, there will be no opening band for Thursday night's performance at the Pearl Street Clubroom. Tickets are $14 at the door.

Mushrooms bring health benefits

A farmer harvests shiitake mushrooms at Phillips Mushroom Farm in Pennsylvania. This farm is the largest grower of specialty mushrooms in America.

BY JANET HEIM
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mushrooms, once relegated to the supporting cast in a salad or on pizza, have become culinary stars, from grilled portobello "steaks" to porcini-laden pasta and warm ragouts spiked with morels and chanterelles.

Supermarkets now stock a burgeoning array of prewashed, presliced fresh mushrooms and myriad packages of dried mushrooms – perhaps the most evidence of America's love affair with mushrooms.

Mushrooms have gone mainstream, said food writer Amy Farges, author of "The Mushroom Lover's Mushroom Cookbook and Guide" and co-owner of Marche' aux Delices, a national mushroom distributor in New York City.

"When McDonald's is doing portobellos you know mushrooms have gone up a notch," Farges said. (The chain recently tested a portobello panini on its Bistro Gourmet menus in some restaurants.)

But now "mycophiles" (mushroom lovers) may have even more reasons to celebrate. Although mushrooms were once thought to be nutritional nothings, scientists are unearthing a variety of health benefits. Emerging research suggests they may enhance our immune system, fight infections and even offer protection against diabetes, heart disease and certain cancers.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture recently released new nutrient data for the seven most commonly eaten mushrooms, revealing some surprising levels of nutrients including fiber, B vitamins and the minerals selenium, potassium and copper.

Recent studies show mushrooms are packed with antioxidants – even more than many deeply hued vegetables, such as carrots and tomatoes. Antioxidants act as repellants against free radicals, damaging molecules in our body that are thought to promote cancer and other diseases.

Portobello and cremini mushrooms were found to have the highest antioxidant capacity by Robert Beelman and colleagues at Pennsylvania State University.

Chicago pupils make paper dolls in memory of Darfur dead

BY ANDREW L. WANG
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

CHICAGO – They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an 8th grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people ... I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's 7th grade World Cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises. In the past, her classes have learned about the Killing Fields in Cambodia and the campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur, Levi said. She showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by inter-tribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination. In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties known as the janjaweed to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. Another estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,'" Levi said. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.'"

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one pupil brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. "Publicize the effort at the local bank," one said. "Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes."

The pupils, now in 8th grade, hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that

New law cuts into online poker

BY ADAM GOLDMAN AND RYAN NAKASHI
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAS VEGAS – Observers say the recently enacted U.S. law that bans gambling online could cut into the number of entrants to the planet's richest card game – the World Series of Poker.

The number of players in the tournament, run by Harrah's Entertainment Inc., has ballooned thanks largely to the online game. In 2003, a mere 839 participants took part when accountant Chris Moneymaker emerged from a $40 Internet tournament and went on to win the $2.5 million grand prize. This year, 8,773 players gambled for part of an $82.5 million prize pool and more than half are estimated to have won tournaments over the Web to play.

With the law banning banks from processing Internet gambling transfers set to be enforced before next year's tournament, the well of poker players is expected to dry up.

"It's going to affect the average player most dramatically. And those players are the ones that have kind of filled the ranks," said Michael Bolcerek, president of the Poker Players Alliance, a 130,000-member group that fought the legislation.

"The hardcore ones will find somewhere, they won't care whether it's regulated," Bolcerek added. "That's what a prohibition does. It drives everything underground."

Mike Sexton, who hosts the popular World Poker Tour on the Travel Channel, said the ban would hurt what has become considered a sport.

"I wouldn't say it would put poker in a death spiral but in the long run it will hurt the growth of poker," Sexton said. "The World Series of Poker is going to be devastated over this."

Casino operators, however, were holding out hope.

"Poker's enormous popularity won't be changed," said Alan Feldman, spokesman for MGM Mirage Inc.

The number of poker tables in Las Vegas has surged from 142 in 2003 to 405 in 2006, with many citing the growth to Internet players seeking to test their skills on the felt.

Organizers for the World Series of Poker, televised by Walt Disney Co.'s ESPN, also said they were not daunted by the new law. Before the legislation was enacted, ESPN, which has covered the tournament since 1993, signed on to cover it through 2010.

Tournament spokesman Gary Thompson said since 2005, organizers have not accepted third-party registrations for the $10,000 buy-in main event from online gambling companies with U.S. operations, and that hasn't stopped it from attracting record fields.

"In 2005 and 2006 we had record fields each year. We're confident again that 2007 will be the best one ever," he said.

Study shines new light on fungus

antioxidant, ergothioneine, mushrooms are the richest source, the Penn State researchers found.

Other researchers found that bringing mushrooms out of the dark packs them with the "sunshine vitamin." When growing or just-picked mushrooms are exposed to ultraviolet light, the vitamin D content soars – making them an unlikely but significant source of this bone-building nutrient.

These findings could pave the way for vitamin D-enhanced mushrooms in the future, according to Beelman, who has spent more than three decades studying mushrooms.

Asian cultures have revered mushrooms as both food and medicine for thousands of years. Only recently have scientists in this country turned their attention to these fragrant, woodsy fungi.

"There's been an irrational prejudice against mushrooms by the medical community, but that's changing," according to Paul Stamets, a mycologist (fungi expert) who is owner of Fungi Perfecti, a mushroom farm and research laboratory near Olympia, Wash.

Stamets is involved in two mushroom studies that are being funded by the prestigious National Institutes of Health.

One study is looking at the cholesterol-lowering benefits of oyster mushrooms and the other is exploring the effects of turkey tail mushrooms on strengthening the immune system of women with breast cancer.

These Chanterelle mushrooms, commonly found in thick forests, are normally used in teas for medicinal purposes.

Previous research conducted at the City of Hope's Beckman Research Institute in Duarte, Calif., found that mushrooms may help reduce the risk of breast and prostate cancer by suppressing two enzymes in the body.

Many of the medicinal qualities of mushrooms are traced to beta glucans, the same type of fiber that gives oatmeal its cholesterol-lowering abilities. Increasingly, beta glucans in mushrooms are garnering attention for stimulating immune responses and activating cells that attack cancer, according to Dr. Harry Preuss, a physiology professor at Georgetown University Medical Center, who is conducting a study exploring the anti-diabetic effects of maitake mushrooms.

Many of the recent studies have been funded by the mushroom industry, although now the government has set its sights on mushrooms. So far, most of the findings have been based on animal or test tube studies and have used extracts from mushrooms – which makes the results promising, yet still preliminary.

Often thought of as a vegetable, mushrooms are fungi – in a class of their own, somewhere mysteriously between a plant and an animal. To obtain nutrients, fungi are totally dependent on their environment – most often a dead tree or rotting log (or typically compost for cultivated mushrooms). Researchers have found that changes to the compost or soil can alter the nutrient content of mushrooms, creating opportunities to enrich mushrooms with calcium, selenium and other nutrients.

Experts believe the survival skills of fungi may be a clue to the bundle of benefits locked inside. Mushrooms contain enzymes, antimicrobial compounds and natural antibiotics to fight off potential invaders and to keep them from rotting.

people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

On a recent afternoon, after another after-school brainstorming session, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said, it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

A pair of Spiders earn all-star accolades

By Michael Chandler
Collegian Staff

The No. 17 Richmond field hockey team will send its co-captains, senior midfielder Jodi Murphy and forward Heather Wrublesky, to the 2006 NFHCA Division I All-Star Game. The all-star game will be held Nov. 18, in Winston-Salem, N.C. on the campus of Wake Forest. This is the second straight year the Spiders will send multiple seniors to the all-star game.

The Spiders once again claimed both of the weekly Atlantic 10 player honors with Junior midfielder Shannon Taylor recognized as Player of the Week for the fifth time and freshman forward Lindsey Conrad given her fourth Rookie of the Week award. This is the third time the teammates claimed honors in the same week.

Taylor scored four goals over the weekend, all in a 6-1 win over Saint Joseph's. It was her second four-goal game of the season. Conrad scored two goals including the game-winner in a 2-1 overtime win against Temple.

The Spiders attempt to finish the season with a perfect conference record when they host Saint Louis on Sunday. The two all-star co-captains will be honored before the game as they play their final home game of their careers.

Owls working overtime

Temple played in two straight overtime games this past weekend, dropping a 2-1 decision to Richmond and then taking a 1-0 game from St. Louis.

The Owls face off against Richmond was likely a playoff preview between the top two teams in the conference. Sophomore goalkeeper Erin Hanshue shined holding a powerful Richmond offense to one goal in regulation. She battled a relentless second-half attack from the Spiders, fighting off nine shots. Hanshue stopped another seven in overtime, making several diving stops, but finally succumbed to the nationally-ranked Spiders after allowing the game-winner to Conrad.

Temple expected another low scoring game against the Billikens as both goalies are well established performers this season.

Hanshue entered the game ranked first in the A-10 with a 1.08 goals-against average, and Saint Louis junior Amy Wasserman ranked third with a 1.49 mark. The teams got what they expected, with the two goalies posting shutouts throughout regulation and putting the game in overtime.

Senior defender Megan Hannahoe's fourth goal of the season ended the game, and gave the Owls a win in their final home game.

The shutout was Wasserman's 12th of her career.

The Owls will finish their regular season at St. Joe's this weekend.

Rams surrounded by unwanted company

Falling to La Salle over the weekend, Rhode Island (7-7, 3-3 A-10) now finds itself in a four-way tie for third place in the A-10.

Junior goalie M.J. Britt allowed four goals after allowing only three in her last four games and the Ram offense mustered only one goal from freshman midfielder Jill Powers.

A-10 F. Hockey

The Rams play three games this week, hosting Providence and Vermont, and then travel to UMass in an important matchup of teams tied for third place.

Wings clipped for Hawks

After getting off to a great start, St. Joe's (9-9, 3-3 A-10) has fallen into the four-way struggle for third place, dropping two games over the weekend and its fourth straight contest.

The Hawks have been unable to recover from a heartbreaking overtime loss to La Salle two weeks ago and continue to play below expectations. After the weekend the Hawks no longer hold winning records in the conference or overall for the first time this season.

Young guns on the front line

Massachusetts (6-12, 3-3 A-10) saved its season in a single weekend with two wins, including an astounding overtime comeback led by its young star forwards Cher King and Lauren Gillespie.

King, who ended the game in overtime, was honored as A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week. As a freshman standout, King has played in all 18 games this season starting 16. The environmental science major has been directly responsible for two of UMass' three conference wins, scoring the only goal of the game in an upset over St. Louis Oct. 13, and now with the game-winner against La Salle.

But impressive performances are nothing new to the Barbados native, before coming to UMass King boasted an eye-popping field hockey Resume. After being named MVP of her high school indoor league, King represented Barbados nationally at the 2005 Central American and Caribbean Games. Scoring an incredible 10 goals, King led her team to a third place-finish and was named the MVP of the international tournament. She scored five goals in the Pan Am Games as a member of the under-21 Barbados National team. And perhaps most remarkably, King scored the tying and winning goals in an overtime shootout in the championship match of the Banks International Hockey festival. King, and the phenomenal heroics she seems to so routinely display, represent the bright future of UMass field hockey.

Along with hosting New Hampshire today at 3:30 p.m., the Minutewomen will attempt to close out the season with a winning conference record hosting Rhode Island, which also stands at 3-3.

Wasserman stars in double-OT loss

Saint Louis (7-8, 3-3 A-10) played a hard fought game against conference heavyweight Temple on Sunday, taking the game into double overtime, but could not finish the Owls off and fell 1-0.

Senior goalie Amy Wasserman stopped 11 shots, including six in overtime. Wasserman's shutout throughout regulation and one period of overtime could not hold against the Temple offense, which attacked with a steady force the entire game.

After the loss Saint Louis is now faced with the daunting task of defeating Richmond in order to come out on top of a four-way tie for fourth place. The Spiders are currently undefeated in conference play, and hold an impressive 39-0 streak in league play dating back to 2001.

The Billikens have never defeated Richmond in their history and will have to come prepared to break through the Spiders' strong goaltending, and stop their powerful offense.

Up and down weekend for Explorers

La Salle (6-12, 2-4 A-10) notched a win and a loss over the weekend, dropping a game to UMass in overtime 2-1, with its offense pushing the Explorers over Rhode Island.

Senior forward Jillian Moser tallied a hat trick in a 4-1 win, giving La Salle its second conference win this season.

The Explorers have been able to keep up with most of the teams they have played in the first half, but have played poorly in the second. This season, La Salle has allowed 12 goals in the first half, compared to the nine it has scored. Most of La Salle's games were winnable at halftime. However in the second half, the Explorers have allowed 23 goals and scored only 12 themselves. This accounts for their less than stellar record.

In the first half of play, La Salle has taken 78 shots and allowed only 98. But in the second halves of games, La Salle has taken a mere 67 shots, and allowed an astounding 138.

Next week La Salle will finish their season hosting UMass.

Book closes on tough season

West Chester (2-15, 0-6 A-10) closed out its season with another conference loss to URI completing a season without a conference win.

The team has not had a winning season since 2001, and has a lot of work to do if it wants to return to the field hockey glory it once had been accustomed to. The Golden Rams won the field hockey national championship in their first four years of existence.

UNH on tap for Minutewomen

Shea up to the midfield, and we've also put Erin O'Brien from our deep defender up to the center midfield position."

The reconstructed midfield translates into greater offensive output and an overall improvement in the ability of the team to move and distribute the ball effectively. The midfield, once a weakness, now constitutes strength for the Minutewomen.

"We went from having an okay midfield to... a very strong midfield," Shea said.

O'Brien, one of UMass' two captains, often garners praise from Shea. The sweeper turned midfielder usually appears with the title of 'field general' or 'leader' alongside her name. While uprooting the anchor of the defense may appear risky, junior midfielder Kristina DoRosario seamlessly shifted into O'Brien's old position.

"[DoRosario] has been playing superb back there, she's been playing outstanding defense," Shea said. "Last year she was a center midfielder for us. We've been able to move some people around, and that's made a difference."

Flexibility and depth have been cogs in the Maroon and White machine. With injuries to freshman forward Amy Novak, Senior back Kwylan Jaggassar and sophomore forward Erin Parker, other players have stepped up and patched together vacancies created with the loss of key contributors.

Count freshman forward Cher King as one of the players who elevates her game. She gathered her second-straight A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week honor for her five-point effort against La Salle. King is now second on the team with 18 points (seven goals, four assists).

"We have some people that have had awakenings and are playing great right now," Shea said. "Cher [King], [Katelyn Orlando], and Erin [O'Brien] are playing great, Kara [Murphy] had been more consistent at the left midfield."

After sleeping through the first half of the season, the Minutewomen are waking up just in time.

Three Northeast schools in Soccer Buzz national rankings

National Rankings

For the second week in a row, Notre Dame (16-0-1), North Carolina (17-1), UCLA (14-2) are the top three teams in the nation, according to Soccer Buzz Magazine. No. 26 Dartmouth (10-4-1) overtook Boston University (13-4-2) as the highest ranked team from the Northeast. The Terriers plummeted 13 spots from last week to No. 29. Boston College (10-5-2) played its way back into the National Top 30 after winning and tying a game this past week.

Player of the Week

The Atlantic 10 named senior forward Ali Wean of Saint Joseph's (6-10-0, 3-4-0 A-10) its Player of the Week. Wean led the Hawk attack against Saint Louis on Oct. 20. The senior scored two goals in the team's 4-3 overtime loss on the road. She scored another pair of goals on Oct. 22 in a 4-2 win at Duquesne. Her 10 goals and 24 points on the season are first on the team in both categories.

Rookie of the Week

The A-10 also named freshman forward Kelly Waeckerle of Saint Louis its Rookie of the Week. Waeckerle tallied the game-winner in overtime against Saint Joseph's. Two days later, she added another goal in a 7-0 win over Temple. The freshman leads the team in goals with seven ... George Washington and Xavier have committed the most offside penalties of any team in the league. The Colonials average 3.56 per game, while the Musketeers average 3.24 ... Dayton leads the conference in corner kicks, averaging 5.00 per game ... La Salle is first in fouls per game, with 14.71, but only fourth in yellow cards per game.

Lineup changes improve UMass

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team (6-12, 3-3 Atlantic 10) hosts New Hampshire this afternoon at Garber Field. The Minutewomen, winners of three of their last four, come home after a Pennsylvania road trip that produced two critical conference victories.

The Wildcats have struggled this season. At 1-15, postseason play is out of the picture.

Senior forward Emily Colton has accounted for nearly half of the Wildcats' scoring, with nine of the teams' 20 goals, along with 52 of their 174 shots. Shutting Colton down will go a long way toward curbing the entire UNH offense.

In an otherwise dismal season, the play of junior goalkeeper Margaux Shute has been a bright spot. The frequently tested Shute has made 133 saves on the year, while posting a 3.41 goals-against average.

"She's done a great job," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "She's made a heck of a lot of saves. We have our work cut out for us [against her]."

Despite their record, today's game against the Wildcats should be a close contest.

"You can't look at their record," Shea said. "UMass vs. UNH has always been a strong rivalry."

A solid showing against UNH will further the momentum the Minutewomen garnered over the weekend.

"You want to go into your final conference game with a win," Shea said. "This is really an important game in regards to a statement about our character as a team."

Call them a second-half team. Mimicking their 2005 campaign, the Minutewomen are positioned for postseason play after stumbling out of the gate.

This past Sunday, UMass edged La Salle in overtime. Trailing by three goals at the half, the Minutewomen rallied in the second period with a goal from freshman midfielder Cher King, and a pair of scores from sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie. King tallied the game-winner in the extra session.

Two days prior to its dramatic comeback in Philadelphia, the Maroon and White topped West Chester, 2-1. Sophomore midfielder Katelyn Orlando netted the go-ahead goal with 8:58 remaining in the second half.

Both comeback victories were essentially season-saving wins for UMass. After dropping games to Temple and Saint Joseph's to start conference play, the Minutewomen have won three of their last four A-10 matches. With two games left to play this season, against New Hampshire today and conference foe Rode Island on Saturday, the Minutewomen find themselves in a familiar scenario: Beat Rhode Island this weekend, and advance to the A-10 tournament, or lose, and the season comes to a disappointing conclusion.

Shea attributes the teams' recent success to a modified lineup.

"We've made some changes within our lineup and structure," Shea said. "We've moved Katelyn Orlando back to the midfield, we've put Mary

Co-captain Erin O'Brien (No. 22) recently made the move from the backfield to midfielder. The change is one of many that have brought the Minutewomen recent success. They have won three of their last four games.

Billikens' streak reaches eight

By Steve Games
Collegian Staff

The No. 12 Saint Louis Billikens pushed their unbeaten streak to eight games. They had two wins against two Atlantic 10 basement teams, Temple and Saint Joseph's, this past week.

A-10 M. Soccer

Senior midfielder Alex Matteson scored the game-winning goal against the struggling Owls (2-12-1, 1-6-0 A-10) for a 1-0 victory. The Billikens (10-3-2, 6-0-1 A-10) also triumphed by the same 1-0 score over the Hawks (2-11-3, 1-5-1 A-10). Senior midfielder John DiRaimondo's first-half goal and a stingy defense led the way.

Next for the Billikens will be two tougher A-10 teams in Massachusetts (8-6-3, 2-4-1 A-10) and Rhode Island (9-4-4, 6-1-0 A-10).

Spiders spin postseason web

The Richmond Spiders continue to roll over conference competition. They are unbeaten in A-10 play and have only lost once in their last 10 games. During A-10 conference play, the Spiders have allowed two goals in six games.

On Sunday, Richmond defeated Fordham, 2-1, and clinched a berth for the A-10 Championship. Spiders' junior midfielder Callum Thomas scored an unassisted goal on a corner kick in the first half, and junior forward Alex Naime notched the game-winning goal in the 68th minute.

On Friday night, the Spiders defeated St. Bonaventure, 2-0. Junior goalkeeper Eric Sciocchetti tallied his third shutout of the season. Richmond, with a playoff berth clinched, will still be fighting for a lower seed in the A-10 Championships.

Next on the schedule for the Spiders are George Washington (5-7-3, 3-2-2 A10) and Dayton (5-9-1, 1-5-1 A-10).

Praying for the playoffs

The Fordham Rams are playing themselves out of the A-10 postseason. After dropping a 2-1 loss to Richmond, the Rams are now 2-3-2 in conference play. They are two points behind Xavier for the last playoff berth.

They did, however, pull off an upset against Charlotte, defeating the 49ers, 2-1. Charlotte out shot the Rams 13-2, but Fordham scored on both of its attempts for the win.

Once ranked No. 12 in the nation, Fordham has fallen hard against conference opponents with a record below .500. The Rams could sneak into the playoffs with their next two games against the worst teams in the conference, Temple and Saint Joseph's.

Player of the Week

Rhode Island junior forward Lukasz Tumicz is the A-10 Player of the Week. Tumicz scored a goal and an assist in the Rams' 3-3 double-overtime tie with instate rival Brown. He also scored the game-winner in overtime against Massachusetts after trailing 1-0 to come back and win, 2-1.

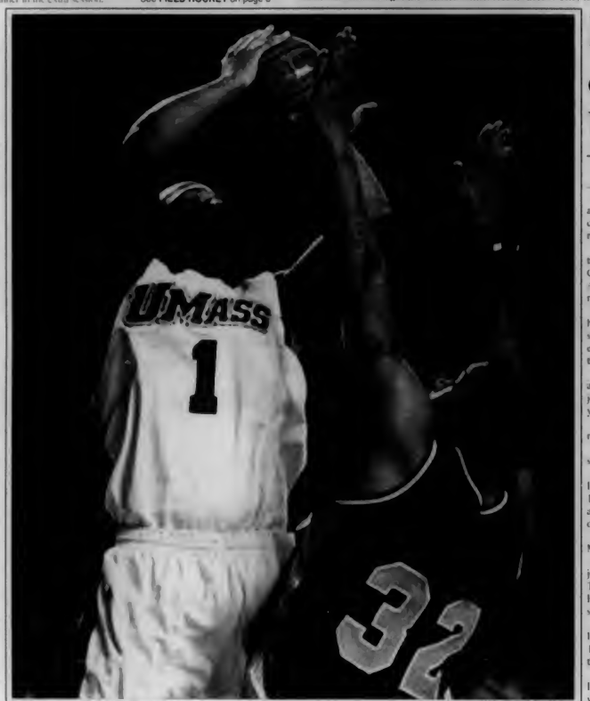
In all, Tumicz tallied five points for the weekend, giving him a total of 19 (five goals, nine assists). He currently leads the conference in assists and is second in the league for total points behind his teammate senior forward Jeffery Gonsalves.

Rookies of the Week

St. Louis freshman goalkeeper Ross Kaufman is the A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week along with George Washington freshman forward Andrew Stadler.

Kaufman earned his second Rookie of the Week honor after posting consecutive shutouts over the weekend. With two 1-0 wins over both Saint Joseph's and Temple, Kaufman has three-consecutive shutouts and seven on the season. He currently leads the conference in goals-against average with a 0.79 mark.

Stadler kept the Colonials in the race for the A-10 Championships with a 2-1 victory over Xavier. He scored the game-winning goal and added an assist in that game.



UMass receives high praise

At the Atlantic 10's annual Media Day yesterday, the Minutemen were picked to finish second in the conference.

Historic race ends well for UM rowers

By Kevin Collins
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts crew team competed in the annual Head of the Charles Regatta this past weekend. UMass coach Jim Dietz and assistant coach Alex Binkowski also represented UMass in competition on Sunday.

The Head of the Charles has been a New England tradition for 42 years. The race is held annually on the Charles River, which separates Cambridge from Boston. Attracting approximately 7,500 athletes, it is the largest rowing regatta in the world.

The field of competition varies from collegiate teams, high school teams, and rowing clubs from not only other states, but other countries as well. The regatta attracts an estimated 250,000 spectators on the banks and bridges of the Charles over the two-day event.

The Minutewomen entered boats in the youth double and varsity eight races. Sophomore Sarah Marsan and junior Hannah Brewster took second in the under-23 youth double event with a time of 19:22.33.

Dietz was pleased with his team's historic performance.

"That is the highest finish ever for a UMass crew," he said. "They were the first collegiate boat across the line."

The New York Athletic Club tandem of Margaret Duggan and Sarah Bates won the race with a time of 19:07.91. University of Louisville rowers Beth Duenhauer and Kathryn Hagghan rounded out the Top 3 with a time of 19:36.40.

Sunday's women's championship eight saw the Minutewomen finish 36th out of 45 entrants.

The varsity eight features senior Gabrielle Papineau, juniors Ellen Maskrey, Jaime Dicke, Kristen Boyce, and Tara Guinan – as well as freshmen Airlina Burrill, Haley Fitzgerald, and Erin Kelly. Sophomore Dana Pulda served as the coxswain.

UMass finished the race in a time of 17:28.03. The United States Rowing Team won the race with a time of 15:36.73. London Training Center was second, rowing the course in a time of 15:54.63.

The first collegiate boat across the line was from Princeton University. The lady Tigers rowed the course with a steady time of 16:13.10.

Two other members of the Atlantic 10 participated in the varsity eight race. UMass rival George Washington finished just two seconds ahead of the Minutewomen in 35th place. While The University of Rhode Island finished in 23rd with a speedy time of 16:56.80.

Although conference meets will not take place until the beginning of the spring, Dietz knows his team has a lot of room for improvement throughout the remainder of the fall rowing season.

"URI bested us all in the Atlantic 10", he said.

The Minutewomen have won the A-10 conference the past 11 seasons, but will likely face stiff competition from George Washington and URI this spring.

Dietz himself turned in a solid finish this weekend in the Men's Grand Masters race on Saturday. His time of 22:27.67 was good for 23rd out of 71 participants. Binkowski also competed on Saturday in the Senior-Master Singles. He rowed the course in 21:52.60, good for 21st out of 56 entrants.

The Minutewomen will head back to work this week preparing for the Head of the Fish Regatta in Saratoga, N.Y. next weekend.

Many teams vying for A-10 playoffs

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

With less than one week of matches remaining, the Atlantic 10 women's soccer regular-season title is still up for grabs. Seven teams have the possibility of obtaining the best record in the conference. But with only two games left for most schools, time is running out for teams to prove themselves in the league.

Despite winning the only game it played last week, Rhode Island (10-8-0, 6-1-0 A-10) vanquished sole possession of first place in the conference. Charlotte (11-4-2, 6-1-0 A-10) caught the Rams in the standings with two victories. The 49ers are winners of eight of their last nine games.

A-10 W. Soccer

On Oct. 22, URI defeated Massachusetts in Amherst, 4-1. Junior forward Deb Nelson put the Rams up 2-0 early in the second half. UMass junior forward Britt Canfield countered with a goal several minutes later, but the Minutewomen could not muster anymore offense.

Having already completed its home schedule two weeks ago, Rhode Island will attempt to clinch at least a share of first place with matches against Duquesne (4-8-2, 3-3-0 A-10) and Saint Louis (10-3-2, 5-2-0 A-10).

Charlotte – the other first place team – defeated Fordham, 3-2, on Oct. 20. The 49ers rattled off three unanswered goals to steal the victory away. Fordham could not develop an offensive rhythm in the second half, after scoring twice in the first. Senior defender Kelsie Orth-by netted the game-winner for Charlotte with only six minutes left in the match.

The 49ers earned their second conference victory last week, defeating St. Bonaventure (2-13-1, 1-6-0 A-10), 3-0, on Oct. 22. Junior forward Nikki Labuda tallied two goals for Charlotte. Freshman goalkeeper Lauren Brown earned her first career shutout, saving five shots.

Charlotte hosts two A-10 schools from Ohio this week. The 49ers square off against Xavier on Friday and Dayton on Sunday.

La Salle (8-8-1, 5-2-1 A-10) is not far behind the two leaders with 16 points. The Explorers fared well last week, earning three points of a possible four. On Oct. 20, the team tied Xavier (7-8-2, 2-3-2 A-10), 2-2, on the road. Junior forward Kristen Hextall and junior midfielder Michelle Verzi scored the two Explorer goals five minutes apart in the second half. Sophomore midfielder Susan Loeffler tied the match for the Musketeers in the final minute of play.

Two days later, La Salle defeated Dayton (7-5-3, 5-2-0 A-10), in a 1-0 road victory. The game's only goal came off of a free kick from Explorer junior defender Jenna Guagenti in the second half. Guagenti's 40-yard shot found the back of the net, just slipping past the reach of sophomore goalkeeper Stacy Chew.

The Explorers only have one game left in their regular season. They travel to Washington, D.C., to take on George Washington (9-9-0, 2-6-0 A-10) on Saturday, Oct. 28.

Dayton and Saint Louis are three points behind Rhode Island and Charlotte in the A-10 race. A first-place finish is not out of the question for either school, but they will need to win their final two matches and hope that the leaders stumble in their games.

The Flyers travel this week to Richmond and Charlotte to close out their regular season.

Saint Louis, on the other hand, will attempt to live up to its preseason expectations with home matches against UMass and Rhode Island. At the beginning of the season, the A-10 coaches predicted that the Billikens would run away with the conference title.

'Big Brothers' looking for more role models

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

Every community has needs, and in rural and suburban areas like Hampshire County, some of those needs are hidden by a belief that poverty and social problems don't exist in our own backyards. Throughout the country there are hundreds of children who aren't living in a picture book home, kids – especially young boys – who need someone to be there as a friend and role model, and Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County is trying to help them find that person.

"I always felt like it's important to give back to the community you're living in," said Pat Dolan, a University of Massachusetts senior and a volunteer with Big Brothers Big Sisters for the past two years.

Though the help of volunteers like Dolan and a dedicated staff, Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County serves 200 children in need. In spite of the amazing expansion of the program – it went from handling 75 kids in 1995 to its current numbers – there are almost 200 more kids waiting to enter the program on the recommendation of parents and guidance counselors.

"We know we can get to them before they get older," said program director Renee Moss.

Ten years ago, that wasn't always possible. When the program first joined the national organization in 1995, the waitlist was 300 children long. Many of the kids would be too old for the program, which includes children ages 6 through 14, before their name came up.

Moss emphasized how impor-

UMass officials receive environmental award

By Holly Seaburn

The University of Massachusetts was chosen as one of three recipients to receive the Massachusetts Environmental Purchasing and Sustainability Award for fiscal year 2006, and plans to expand its conservation projects for next year.

Joyce Hatch, vice chancellor for administration and finance at UMass, received the award at the State House last Thursday, Oct. 19.

There were 11 University officials lead by Hatch at the ceremony, including Craig Roberti from Environment and Health Services at UMass. Roberti applied for the award on behalf of the campus, according Donald Robinson, head of Environment and Health

Dad wants cussing toy off store shelves

JACKSONVILLE, N.C. — A father is asking Toys "R" Us to take a popular toy set off the shelves because he says the one given to his 6-year-old son utters a curse word.

The toy is a police officer set that includes a nightstick and a utility belt. A recorded message that includes a curse word plays when the nightstick is removed from the belt.

"I've had to explain to parents why my son is saying the f-word; it's horrible," Philip Morton told The Daily News of Jacksonville. "It's really a cute little toy; but God forbid, it's not what I want my kid hearing."

Morton told The Associated Press that he returned the toy to the Geoffrey toy store where he bought it and played it for store managers, who agreed to give him a new set with a recording that didn't include the obscenity. He kept the original set and played the recorded message, including the apparent curse word, over the phone Wednesday for Associated Press reporters.

Geoffrey is owned by Toys "R" Us.

Kathleen Waugh, a spokeswoman for Toys "R" Us, said that only two complaints have been made to the retailer about the set. In response to the first customer complaint made earlier this year, the retailer tested the recording and found nothing wrong. Still, it re-recorded the chip. In response to the second complaint, Toys "R" Us tested the police offer toys but didn't find a problem.

"This is just an isolated" incident, Waugh said. "It must have been a faulty chip."

Jerry Gibson, president of TekNek Toys International L.P., of Southlake, Texas, said Wednesday he has heard Morton's recording and believes the voice says "stop." He provided The Associated Press with a copy of the source file for the recording, which says "Stop, I don't want to have to pull out my nightstick."

"We've shipped over 30,000 of these toys," Gibson said. "We would never as a toy company making toys for children in this age range, or any toy for that matter, use inappropriate language."

Still, Morton said the company shouldn't take a chance that another child could hear what his son heard.

"I understand they can't check every toy on the shelf," Morton said. "But if one doesn't say it and one does, maybe someone is playing a game and got in a hurry and forgot about it. Personally, I think they should be held liable."

Serial killer Rolling executed in Florida

By Ron Word
Associated Press

STARKE, Fla. — Danny Harold Rolling, Florida's most notorious serial killer since Ted Bundy, was executed by injection Wednesday for butchering five college students in a ghastly string of slayings that terrorized Gainesville in 1990.

Rolling, 52, was pronounced dead at 6:13 p.m. EDT, more than 16 years after his killing rampage at the start of the University of Florida's fall semester.

When asked for a last statement, Rolling sang for two minutes what sounded like a hymn with the refrain "none greater than thee, O Lord, none greater than thee," witnesses and prison officials said.

He appeared to continue singing after prison officials turned off the microphone, finally stopping just before he died.

The bodies of his victims were found over three days in late August, just as the University of Florida's fall semester was beginning. All had been killed with a hunting knife. Some had been mutilated sexually assaulted and put in shocking poses. One girl's severed head had been placed on a shelf, her body posed as if seated.

The killing spree touched off a huge manhunt and plunged the laid-back college town into panic. Students fled and residents armed themselves.

Belongings that Rolling left at a campsite in the woods and DNA taken after a later arrest for robbery linked him to the slayings. When he came up for trial in 1994, he shocked the courtroom by pleading guilty.

"There are some things you just can't run from, this being one of those," Rolling told the judge.

He later told The Associated Press "I do deserve to die, but do I want to die? No. I want to live. Life is difficult to give up."

Construction causing fits on UMass campus

Construction on campus again continues this week through the rain and the mud. Good and bad news for detour-haters: The Campus Center Way Commonwealth Avenue intersection has re-opened, more detours have been set up at Mullins Way and Hicks Way has been re-routed.

All of the detour signs to the Campus Center Garage have been removed, and all drivers are expected to be able to enter and exit the Campus Garage through Campus Center Way.

Major construction continues on both sides of Commonwealth Avenue and immediately adjacent to the Campus Center Way intersection. Pedestrians are being asked to mind fence lines.

Work continues simultaneously in several different venues related to the Central Heating Plant.

The Mullins Way detour route is up and here to stay until winter of 2007-08. Signs are expected to be put in place directing traffic onto the detour. The paved detour runs from the current Mullins Way near the Amherst Wastewater Treatment Plant, passing the tennis courts behind the Mullins Center, and onto the lower Mullins parking lot and loading docks. Live video feeds of the construction at the Mullins Center and Commonwealth Avenue are available at MassTraveler.com.

Also available on the Facilities and Campus Planning Web site are several pictures taken of campus from locations not accessible by the public.

These areas include the top of Kennedy Residence Hall in Southwest Residential Area, Webster Residence Hall in Orchard Hill Residential Area, Brown in Sylvan Residential Area, Lederle GRC Highrise, and the Student Union. There are also plans to update the photographs once the fall foliage is at its peak.

Toddler gets stuck in vending machine

ANTIGO—Three-year-old Robert Moore went fishing for a stuffed replica of Sponge Bob and ended up trapped in a vending machine. The toddler's adventure began with a Saturday evening shopping trip with his grandmother, Fredricka Bierdemann, and three siblings.

Bierdemann ended the trip by giving each child a dollar and telling them to have fun in a retailer's game room.

A stuffed Sponge Bob in a vending machine's bin caught Robert's eye. He tried without success to fish it out with a plastic crane.

"I told him I could get it for him," his grandmother said. "He's a character. He said, 'Oh no, I can get it.'"

When she turned her back to get another dollar for a second try, Robert took off his coat and squeezed through an opening in the machine. He landed in the stuffed animal cube.

"I turned around and looked for him, and he said, 'Oma, I'm in here,'" Bierdemann said. "I thought I would have a heart attack."

Store employees couldn't find a key to the machine, so Robert waited while the Antigo Fire Department was called.

"He was having a ball in there, hugging all the stuffed animals," Bierdemann said. "He was so good-natured, but I was shaking like a leaf."

Firefighters broke one lock but then spotted two latches inside the plastic cube. They passed a screwdriver to Robert.

"He stacked up all the stuffed animals and used that screwdriver to open the latch," his grandmother said. "You should have seen him go."

Eventually, Robert freed himself. But his mother, Marie Moore, and grandmother said they were lucky that he remained calm when another child might not have. He went home safe — but without a stuffed Sponge Bob.

Blind web surfers sue for accessibility

BY SETH SUTEL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK—"Links list dialogue." "Links list view." "Your Account — Two of 164." This is what the Internet sounds like to Chris Danielsen. Danielsen is blind. He's using a software program called Jaws that converts the text on a Web page into a computer-ized voice that comes out through a speaker, allowing him to surf the Web using keyboard commands instead of a mouse — the same way lots of blind people use the Internet.

In this case, his computer is listing all the Web links on the page he's on and telling him that the highlighted link his cursor is on now will take him to the "Your Account" section on Wal-Mart's Web site.

Danielsen, who writes a blog called "The Voice of the Nation's Blind" for the National Federation of the Blind, says accessing the Internet has been a "huge boon" for blind people. It's allowed them to accomplish a great number of tasks on their own that would otherwise present difficulties or require the help of a sighted person, such as banking, buying plane tickets and shopping for things like groceries and music.

But like any evolving technology, accessing the Internet has hardly been a smooth ride for the blind. Some sites can be difficult to navigate, particularly if they contain relatively few text links and rely more on graphics and other visual elements that screen-reading software such as Jaws can't interpret.

That's why the NFB, an organization that represents blind people, is suing Target Corp., saying that its Web site is inaccessible to blind Internet users.

Last month a federal judge in California allowed the NFB's case to proceed, rejecting Target's argument that its Web site wasn't subject to the Americans With Disabilities Act, a 1990 law that requires retailers and other public places to make accommodations for people with disabilities. Target argued that the law only covered physical spaces.

The case, which is entering a pretrial phase called discovery in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, could set an important precedent for applying federal accessibility law to the Internet.

Target said in a statement that its Web site was "committed to providing an online experience that is accessible to all of our guests. Despite the lawsuit brought forward by the National Federation of the Blind, we have always and will continue to implement new technologies to our Web site."

John Pare, a spokesman for the NFB, said most Web sites are far easier to navigate than Target's. In a demonstration of screen-reading software for The Associated Press, Danielsen showed that many links on Target's side were unintelligible to the Jaws software, and that the final purchase required the use of a mouse, something even the most sophisticated blind Web surfer would have trouble with. However, he was able to navigate other sites and purchased a CD from Amazon. Jaws, made by Freedom Scientific, is a popular kind of screen-reading software, but there are others, including Window-Eyes, made by GW Micro, and Hal, made by Dolphin Computer Access.

Many Web sites already have made major progress in becoming accessible to the blind, and some, such as those run by the government, are required to do so by law.

Yet surfing the Internet is not always worry-free for the blind. Crista Earl, the head of Web operations for the American Foundation for the Blind in New York, said graphics that don't contain textual labels — which can be read by screen-reading software — are a common obstacle for blind Internet users, as are "forms" that are unlabeled. Forms are the little boxes where you insert data, such as a book title you wanted to search for.

The decision to hold Target's Web site to the same standards of accessibility as its physical store under the Americans with Disabilities Act was considered a victory by many advocates for the blind, but at the same time others worry that the ruling could be read too narrowly.

Not every business or Web site is subject to the Americans with Disabilities Act, said John D. Kemp., a lawyer with the Washington law firm Powers, Pyles, Sutter & Verville P.C. The ADA applies mainly to public places such as restaurants, retailers, movie theaters and health care institutions, explained Kemp, who has long worked on compliance issues related to disabilities, employment and technology.

For an electronic retailer such as Amazon.com, which has no physical store, the law is unclear, Kemp said. "There is no well defined policy in this area at all."

However, Kemp noted that many businesses, such as banks, see a strong business rationale for making their sites accessible, and have moved aggressively to do so.

Meanwhile, other retailers are also moving to adapt their Web sites to screen-reading software. Kelly Groehler, a spokeswoman for Best Buy Co., says the company has made a number of changes to its site since late last year, including incorporating "alt tags" — or text that labels items like graphics — into its site.

Best Buy also moved code for drop-down menus to the bottom of the page, where it's less likely to duplicate other elements on the page. "We're trying to be proactive here," Groehler said. Walmart.com spokeswoman Amy Colella says the site has made sure it is "reasonably accessible" to the blind.

'Big Brother' in need of male volunteers

tant it was to ensure that kids were entering the program as young as possible so that their big brother or sister would have more time to serve as a role model before the child aged out of the program.

It isn't just the length of the waitlist that has Moss and her staff concerned. There is a strong and growing need for big brothers to volunteer for the program.

Currently, less than half of the children served by Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County are male, and more than 80 percent of the children on the waitlist are boys. Fifty-three percent of these boys are from single-parent homes and lack a positive male role-model.

The problem stems from a lack of male volunteers, which perplexes Moss and others.

"If we go out and set up at a volunteer fair on campus, 80 percent of the people that show up are women," Moss said. "We bang our heads against the wall trying to figure out why they are so few men looking to volunteer because the ones in the program have a wonderful experience."

The problem of getting male volunteers isn't just one in Hampshire County, it exists nationwide. While it is possible to match up boys with big sisters to make up for a lack of male volunteers — in Hampshire County almost one third of the boys in the program are matched with a big sister — Big Brothers Big Sisters tries to match up young boys with brothers so they can have that positive male role model and friend that they're lacking.

"A lot of guys think that they can't do it, that they're not good enough role models or don't have the time," Dolan said. "It's really such an easy thing to do and it makes a world of difference in these kids' lives."

Dolan spends a few hours each week with his little brother just hanging out and playing video games.

"These boys have been disappointed by men and father figures who have just disappeared from their lives," Moss said. "They need a big brother to show them that they can grow up to be honest and reliable."

To start to address the problem, Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County has increased the proportion of photos of big and little brothers in their promotional material and always has a male volunteer come to events that they are invited to speak at so that he can share his experience and break the ice.

College students make up the bulk of the volunteers taking time out of their schedules to help out Big Brothers Big Sisters in Hampshire County, and of the 125 college students volunteering in the area, 77 are from the University of Massachusetts.

Big Brothers Big Sisters has developed and very flexible program and offers a lot of support for their volunteers to help them balance their school and their weekly commitment to their little brother or sister. While the need for big brothers and big sisters is spread throughout the county, Moss and her staff are more than willing to help make matches locally, especially to encourage more male volunteers.

Over 43 percent of the program's activity takes place in Amherst in spite of its smaller population compared to Northampton. Still, towns like Ware and other areas of the county are in need of volunteers.

Volunteering with Big Brothers Big Sisters is a great chance to be a positive influence in someone's life. It's also a good way to get away from campus and learn about the wider community and the problems that often go unnoticed in rural and suburban communities.

"You do it because you want to give back, but you get a lot out of it. It makes you feel good about yourself, giving your time, it almost becomes selfish more than philanthropic," Dolan said.

For more information about volunteering, call Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County at (413) 253-2591 or visit their Web site at www.bbbshamp.org.

Convict executed in student deaths

Dianna Hoyt, who stepdaughter was slain, said the execution marked "the final chapter of this book."

"This man brought this outcome to himself, and the law of the land carried through to show us justice," Hoyt said.

Outside the prison, death penalty opponents stood in a circle singing "Amazing Grace" after Rolling was pronounced dead.

Other onlookers supported the execution. "They're doing a good thing," said Randy Hicks, 35, a truck driver and former prison guard who occasionally watched over Rolling. "This guy deserves it. It's very overdue."

Death penalty protesters said the execution only served to provide Rolling additional attention.

"The state of Florida is giving this psychopathic killer just what he wanted," said Mark Elliott of Clearwater, spokesman for Floridians for Alternatives to the Death Penalty.

The attention surrounding Rolling's execution reopened old wounds in Gainesville and for the families of the victims.

The victims' families ran an advertisement Thursday in The Gainesville Sun, thanking the community for its support. "We hope you will remember August 1990 and the years that followed without any sense of community shame for what has happened here. You turned a blemish into a rose."

UMass makes huge donation

Services.

"A number of campus agencies were honored by this award, and it reflects the campus commitment to sustainability," said Robinson.

Ken Toong, head of UMass Dining Services, was also present for the award ceremony.

"It was a proud moment for all of us there when Joyce received the award from commissioner Perini," he said. "I could sense pride in UMass Amherst."

The annual awards acknowledge exceptional work in purchasing environmentally preferable products and other sustainable practices by public sector entities and businesses. The other two recipients of the awards were the city of Cambridge and the public school systems in Boston and Milton.

UMass was recognized as the state agency, authority and public higher education institution in Massachusetts with the greatest achievement in water conservation initiatives, purchasing programs for locally grown produce and seafood from sustainable sources, and environment-friendly cleaning practices.

Thanks to a multi-year energy service contract, UMass has been able to execute three major projects to help conserve water and energy, including using a new Reclaimed Water Treatment Plant (RWTP).

The RWTP, a "one-time water pass-through" piece of equipment, takes treated wastewater from Amherst's wastewater treatment plant and provides a sanitized water supply to the UMass stream plant. The project hopes to recover about 9 million cubic feet of water with a collective cost savings of approximately $400,000 for water and fuel.

UMass is also planning on updating campus plumbing equipment in residence halls and other buildings on campus. This will preserve an average savings of approximately 10.5 million cubic feet of water per year, and save another $400,000.

The third project involves new recirculating chillers for laboratories, food service dishwashers, garbage disposals, and pass-through water cooled equipment. These changes will result in about 5 million cubic feet of water savings and a lower energy demand.

All three projects are expected to be fully operational in fiscal year 2007.

UMass Dining Services has also been a big contributor to helping the campus' conservation programs. Two years ago, Dining Services began participating in the "Be a Local Hero, Buy Locally Grown" agriculture program operated by the non-profit Community Involved in Sustaining Agriculture (CISA).

Dining Services has also donated about $150,000 — 15 percent of its annual produce budget — to support local farming. In addition, it is partnering with Seafood Watch, and has already eliminated Atlantic cod from its menu and substituted Pacific cod, haddock, and tilapia. It is also dropping the use of farmed Atlantic salmon and serving wild Alaskan salmon instead.

"Dining Services will continue to support sustainability," said Toong. "I think we can make a difference by working together with students and vendors."

UMass Auxiliary Services, which includes Dining Services, has also been recognized for its environmental help. Auxiliary Services has taken up a new cleaning process that follows a standardized cleaning method that is resource-ful while using green certified cleaning products rather than bleach or other possibly harmful cleaning products.

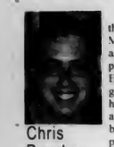
The Ghettoization of UMass



Chris Reardon

Last winter the University of Massachu-setts announced its plan to expand Epoch, the program meant to house freshmen all in the same buildings. This program hopes to help ease these new students into campus life and also prevent some fallout from alcohol abuse by quarantining the underage students off from those who could buy them liquor. The plan calls for 14 buildings to house every freshman on campus by 2008, most of which lay in the city expanse of Southwest.

On the surface, the plan makes sense. UMass has received a lot of attention recently for its alcohol policies and for violence on campus (much of it alcohol or drug related). In a similar move last year, UMass made having alcohol in the dorms much more difficult even for those students who are of age, severely limiting the amount of booze that can be brought into the buildings and also enforcing a stricter guest policy.

If the freshmen, who are supposedly inexperienced and can't hold their alcohol as well the upperclassmen, have no access to older students in order to obtain booze, then of course there will be fewer alcohol-related problems on campus.

It's really not that simple. I agree that Epoch has its advantages, but only as far as conditioning incoming freshmen to dorm life is concerned. I feel the same way about TAP (Talent Advancement Program), which places incoming students of the same major in the same halls. This way, the freshmen can meet people that they have class with and ease the discomfort that can come with the transition to college life.

But where TAP ends, Epoch begins, taking the idea to an extreme that is sure to lead to further discomfort and inconvenience down the road.

The freshmen may be ghettoized into their own living space, but that still leaves them plenty of room for destruction and general mischief-making.

First off, while Epoch is hailed as a wonderful social program for freshmen, nothing is said of the older students who are being displaced from their dorms because only freshmen can live there. While some may have planned to stay with their friends in their current dorm, they are forced to move.

Now, the likelihood of living with people they know is pretty low. As a member of Psych TAP in 2003, I met many of the people I am still friends with now. These friendships were strengthened over the years because many of us still lived together in John Adams, not forced to move to different dorms across campus our sophomore year.

There's also the glaringly obvious fact that freshmen who want alcohol will get alcohol, even if they have to pay a pretty steep price to get it. Keeping older students in different buildings will in no way prevent underage drinking. If anything, it will become an even bigger problem. The freshmen may be ghettoized into their own living space, but that still leaves them plenty of room for destruction and general mischief-making. Without the influence of older students who have been around the block, the younger freshmen are more likely to cause a ruckus.

You can almost always count on an upperclassman to pop his or her head out of a single room in order to tell the noisy freshmen to shut the heck up. Will all this responsibility be placed on the poor RAs that have to try to wrangle in the youngsters, or is UMass actually going to pay to have increased security in these freshmen dorms?

The first option is unlikely unless UMass increases the RA staff in these dorms, and the second option is unlikely unless UMass decides to spend money usually allocated toward high-priced administrators.

Southwest is crazy enough as it is, simply because there are so many people living there. It stands to reason that if UMass lowers the average age of the students living in Southwest, the school will in turn lower the average maturity level of the students here. This is never a good thing. Already known for its violence levels and crazy parties, Southwest will only get worse.

The social aspects of a program like Epoch are desirable, but not worth the consequences that result from forcing every incoming freshman at the University to participate.

The freshmen class will continue to get bigger, and it's likely that all of Southwest and many other buildings on campus will soon be under Epoch's wing. Just because the problem is concentrated in one general area does not make the problem go away. If UMass wants there to be less alcohol abuse and violence on campus the answer is in education, not ghettoization.

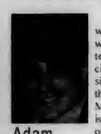
Professorism 101



Adam McGillen

Personally, I would never want to be a teacher, especially at a massive school like the University of Massachusetts. It is just way too hard of a job — trying to educate 300 students all at once is a formidable challenge. I know I'm not alone when I say that I have trouble just standing in front of a class of 10 and educating them with a five minute presentation.

Over the last year and a half, I have had my fair share of professors, and I carry a great deal of respect for all of them. But, with all due respect, I've noticed many things that a lot of professors do wrong, or that they need not do at all.

If you're going to teach 300 students in a lecture, the reality is you are on stage and you are a performer.

So here it is, the ultimate abridged guide to being a fan-favorite professor at UMass:

First off, don't intimidate your students, ever. For me, nothing kills a class more than when the first day consists of the professor reprimanding students for things they haven't done yet.

"There will be absolutely no exceptions. If you're family dies in a plane crash, I will need an official note signed by President Bush with both the insignia of the United States and that of the University imprinted on 20 pound paper." Honestly, we understand you're in a position of power and you control the fates of our lives, but take it easy. When trying to balance work, five courses, and a little bit of a life on the side, it is nice to have a professor who understands and is willing to bend the rules a bit for the sake of a student's education.

As for the intro professors, don't overload the work. You're teaching a 100-level course: that means the game is on easy mode. I can't stand jumping into an intro course for the sake of satisfying general education requirements and discovering that I have more reading and work to do in a 100-level class than I do in a 300. If you're teaching 100-anything, take the intensity down a notch, OK?

Don't treat your class like it is the only one your students are taking. It's not, and we don't have time for a hundred pages of intro reading when we have much more important classes to do work for — no offense, but why do you think they created a tiered level of courses?

When we're actually in the class, make the most of our time. Some professors assign readings, and then they just regurgitate what you read last night in their own words. That doesn't get us anywhere, and it certainly doesn't encourage attendance. This advice applies mostly to big auditorium lectures. It's hard enough getting students to show up, but I find that when professors actually effectively expand upon readings and give their students a little something special in lecture, more people will show up.

In my own experience, I had one professor who always brought something new and interesting to lecture and truly inspired attendance and participation in a 250-student auditorium — it was nearly full every day.

On the other hand, I had a professor who simply gave a dull PowerPoint presentation (at most we got a little music or a sound effect — ohhhh, ahhh) and always wasted the last five minutes of class reprimanding students for packing up early so they don't get trampled by the waves of students that just can't wait to escape. Clearly, time would be spent more efficiently lecturing straight through the last five minutes so that the few students that are listening actually get something out of it — as for the ones packing up, they aren't listening to the professor anyways.

And if you really want to get student's attention, take some acting lessons. I know you studied to be a professor, but if you're going to teach 300 students in a lecture, the reality is you are on stage and you are a performer.

The most effective teachers I have had were not only professors, but entertainers. They loved their job, and they made a show of teaching. Whether it's cracking jokes or just being eccentric and excited about the subject, the best actors and actresses make the best professors. An entertained and happy mind is always more open to learning.

Lastly, be prompt about getting work back to your students. I can't stand putting a lot of work into a paper and handing it in on time, only to have a professor slack off and take his or her sweet time in correcting it and getting it back to me. I understand some classes are bigger than others, and I expect it to take reasonably longer, but some professors demand deadlines and then they don't follow their own policy in getting work done in a timely manner. The most absurd is a Scantron exam: if the test is graded by a computer, just feed the machine and get it over with. Students don't like hanging in limbo after big exams and papers, we want to know.

In high school we all generally expect classes to suck, and we really only learn how to find loopholes and beat the system. Having committed the rest of my life (at least) to paying off loans for going to UMass, is it wrong for me to expect a little more out of courses here? Getting an education is the most important aspect of attending a university, that's no mystery to me, but I've always felt I learned a lot more from classes I actually enjoyed going to. The best professors are those who motivate their students rather than just pound them with information.

Parrying Parking Services

S.P. Sullivan

Seventy-five dollars for a parking infraction is a little excessive.

Yet that's what I was expected to pay for parking in yellow lot 13 with my yellow lot 11 parking permit. Of course, being a first-year student, I didn't know the difference; I thought a yellow lot was yellow lot.

For those of you who don't know, yellow lot 13 is located somewhere around Detroit, Michigan. Yellow lot 11 is a little bit closer to Costa Rica. As for the individual who thought it prudent to place three $25 tickets on my improperly parked automobile, I pass no judgments. They were just doing their job. (Yet this was also the No. 1 excuse heard at the Nuremberg Trials.)

Because the University has a monopoly on parking spots, they can feel free to behave much like the oil and gas companies, so often demonized in our society, and charge astronomical prices.

The relevance my own trivial parking experience has to the rest of the student body is minimal. But it does reveal serious problems with the parking policy and the manner with which parking infractions are handled on campus.

While at Parking Services contesting my three $25 tickets (and changing my pass so that I may permissibly park in the Great Lake state), I had ample opportunity to speak with other victims of the parking policy and its inherent bureaucracy. One gentleman had received the wrong parking permit unknowingly. He had no idea he was improperly parked; as far as he knew he had the permit he paid for in the lot he requested.

Pay attention to the key, it might mean you can't use that pass anywhere.

A different individual told me that all the spots in his designated purple lot were taken. So he opted, however unwisely, to make his own spot. A little unorthodox, yes, but one can't help but sympathize.

Another girl neglected to arrive back from her trek to scrape an incorrect pass off her window. She never returned with the scraper they had leant her, either. An act of absentmindedness, maybe, but perhaps it was her way of exacting revenge on the Parking Services that had in her mind done her so foul.

Among the complaints the unfortunate (yet surprisingly courteous) victims voiced to the desk clerk was the prices. Two hundred plus dollars for a parking spot 10 minutes away is ridiculous, some said — especially after paying full tuition.

I got a sad laugh out of this lament: "I've given this school $800 dollars for parking permits thus far," balked that purple-lot parking space trail-blazer. "Now they want another forty dollars."

The fact that all, if any, of these complaints are justified is irrelevant. The general consensus of the hapless folk (who happen to be the tuition-paying students Parking Services is supposed to "service") in that trailer that they call the Parking Services office was this: Why is the system so esoteric and monotonous (one could argue it is made to resemble the RMV) and, more importantly, why do passes cost so much?

The answer to the latter is economic. And although I'm not very well versed in economics, I do understand the concept of scarcity. Parking spots on campus are a finite resource, much like fossil fuels. Therefore, because the University has a monopoly on parking spots, they can feel free to behave much like the oil and gas companies, so often demonized in our society, and charge astronomical prices.

This is also why the $210 pass I purchased permits me to park in spaces designated by what appears to be the same technology employed to designate baselines for little league games. The University has us at an advantage. They know this and capitalize on it.

What they fail to realize, (or refuse to acknowledge) is that the majority of parking policy offenders are college students. College students will rebel against anything, no matter how petty, me and the fellow who makes his own parking spots included. Whether or not he or I (or any of the other morose automobilists in line that particular day) are justified in our contestation is moot.

What is borne of this combination of arbitrary policy and the classic "it wasn't my fault" attitude that everyone, myself included, possesses is this trailer-bureaucracy of RMV proportions. If Parking Services is going to insist on dishing out tickets at a speed faster than the frequency with which students visit their cars and discover them, then we are going to be clogging up the Parking Services office with contestations.

And although the bereft and angry parking-offenders hate to admit it, Parking Services does serve some purpose. However, this purpose is too often clouded with all these citations and contestations that get in the way of their more important functions.

So I'm proposing a compromise with the Parking Services Office on behalf of UMass students the campus over. We will stop parking illegally, ignoring meters, and making our own spots if you agree to make it economically feasible to do so (and tell the lowly first-year students about lot-number designation). I don't mind the walk to yellow lot 13 too much, so long as there aren't three parking citations there awaiting my arrival.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

NOT BY THE BOOK

Your article ("Digital textbooks lessen student expenses") about textbook prices failed to provide an accurate understanding of the changing nature of today's college textbooks and the course material choices publishers already provide.

To help every student succeed, publishers offer thousands of options for textbooks and instructional tools at a wide range of prices. This variety of choice, which can range from one or two-color editions, workbooks, or complete learning packages, allows faculty and students to select the course materials best suited to their needs. It also includes e-books that are offered at a significant discount to the traditional text.

Research shows that students who use these advanced textbooks and learning tools earn better grades and graduate sooner. Student success should be everyone's concern. Today, 54 percent of four-year college students do not graduate in six years, dropping out and incurring increased debt.

According to college admission testmaker ACT, only 22 percent of students entering college are prepared in reading, math and science. Publishers are responding to this need by creating new instructional tools to help college students succeed, a role that traditionally belonged to postsecondary institutions.

A Zogby International survey found that 75 percent of professors require or recommend that students use textbooks with these types of supplementary materials. According to Student Monitor, a student research service, the average college student spent $644 on textbooks during the 2005 — 2006 academic year, a cost that has remained generally steady over the past three years.

As the cost of higher education continues to escalate, America's publishers are helping students get the most out of their tuition dollar by responding to changing needs and helping them do their best. Contrary to the image created by your article, today's college textbooks may be the best long-term investment a student can make.

Barenaked Ladies return

BY ALLIE ROTH, TIM MCCALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Tuesday, we were all brought back to a time when flannel T-shirts and baggy jeans ruled the world. Barenaked Ladies performed at the Mullins Center with a set full of old material and new material alike.

For those who have never seen the band before, their performance is more of a stage show with musical interludes mixed in between. For those who have seen the band before, their performance was exactly as it always has been with "Grade 9" humor and the band's classic songs mixed in.

Barenaked Ladies opened up with "Wind It Up," a song from their latest album, "Barenaked Ladies Are Me." With its electric guitar riffs and energetic vocals, it served as an excellent opener to excite the crowd. Next, they played "The Old Apartment."

Following the song, singer-guitarist Steven Page erupted into a tangent about riding his bike around the hills of campus. Surrounded by beautiful fall foliage, Page expressed fear when he came upon a steep incline. He compared this experience to riding down an amusement park slide on a cloth sack and without control of speed or direction.

However exhilarating, Page explained that he found this experience terrifying as he screamed the whole way down. Ed Robertson and Page free-styled about the experience. Robertson added that, like Page, he also exercised — by playing intense games of ping-pong on his Xbox 360.

Page then took the spotlight and sang "Sound of Your Voice" as Robertson harmonized through the song's backing vocals. Robertson and Page showed their age when they introduced "King of Bedside Manner" as "a song older than most of [the fans]."

"King of Bedside Manner" is from their first album, "Gordon," released in 1992. This song is very similar to their popular single "One Week," with its fast-paced lyrics and even faster instrumentals.

The band tossed their political agenda into parts of the show. The song "Fun and Games" is a fine example of their movement towards a more politically-conscious sound and bio-friendly attitude.

Another way the band is working towards a cleaner environment is through teaming up with Reverb. Reverb works with musicians by providing them with alternative tour equipment such as diesel-free tour buses. This equipment allows them to be more bio-friendly while on tour. Dave Matthews Band's tour this past summer also followed this path.

Don't let the politics mislead — Barenaked Ladies are still a band who knows how to entertain. During the song "Angry People," the sound system took over playing the song as all five members of the band left their instruments and ran out to center stage. They began to snap in unison, similar to the fight scene in the musical "West Side Story." Page even went as far as smashing a glass vase over Robertson's head. They scampered around stage as sound effects dramatized their every move. The band event went as far as dancing in unison following the fight sequence.

All five members came together again behind one microphone with their instruments in hand to sing "New Kid (On the Block)." Sounding much like the Beach Boys, they harmonized the lyrics.

"Break Your Heart" highlighted Page's skilled vocals. This epic ballad focused attention on the softer side of Barenaked Ladies' catalogue.

When the lights went down after "Brian Wilson," the audience didn't believe the band was gone for good. A few minutes later, they came back and performed "Easy" and "Another Postcard." Even after this encore, fans were still not satisfied because one of the band's most pop-

Beware of the danger of jealousy

Jasmine Monteiro

Jealous boy/girlfriends are a devestating problem among young adults. I thought this problem only existed in high school, but somehow it trickled its way into college. I personally have never understood the wrath of a jealous girlfriend or the controlling behavior of a jealous boyfriend. However, there are a number of different reasons why we act so jealous, some that are not so obvious.

Everyone has been a little jealous from time to time. It's how we interpret the power of our emotions and how they can get carried away. This isn't always the problem though — it's the way we handle our jealousy that is.

In my opinion, girls are more annoying when it comes to jealousy. Have you ever had the opportunity to browse through some profiles on, let's say, MySpace? Well you should, because it's rather amusing. Girls are always considered backstabbers and boy stealers, which is why most of them don't get along.

But it's the constant need for respect from these girls that doesn't make sense to me. So many times I've seen girls trying to act tough; claiming their man like their property and threatening any girl who dares try to make a move on him. If he's your boyfriend, and you both have this mutual understanding, what does it matter what other girls are doing?

There's no need to give them the satisfaction of knowing they have you worried. Obviously that's what they want. If other girls are trying to get with him, you need to let him know how you feel about it. If he respects your feelings, he will do what he can to set their mind straight. Let your man do the talking. All you have to do is sit back and enjoy it.

One thing you have to realize is that if you have yourself a good looking man, guess what? You're not going to be the only girl who thinks so. So let the girls hate on what they can't have. You'd save your relationship a lot of trouble if you did.

Guys are just as guilty of being jealous as we are, but, as always, they handle it differently. I understand that many guys take it personally when another guy hits on his girlfriend. It's like a challenge. In my opinion, I see it more as a compliment.

Be confident in what you and your girl have together. Let them look if they want. However, if someone disrespects your girlfriend, it is appropriate to say something. But don't forget, it's not just about you. Let your girl get a word in. I'm sure she has enough sense to take care of herself.

Most importantly, there's no need to quarrel over it. All you have to do is warn him that he could be making a terrible decision and if he's not looking for trouble, he'll back off. You don't need to turn it into a battle of the brawns because contrary to what you think, it doesn't help.

People are often jealous because they are insecure about themselves, and sometimes it's hard not to be. However, it's your job to speak up about how you feel. Your boy/girlfriend should be openly willing to give you the attention that you need. After all, we're not born insecure, there's a reason we feel that way.

Try not to let it overwhelm your relationship, though. Recognize what you have to offer as an individual. The more you realize this yourself, the more likely someone else will see it too.

If you do everything you can to prove your faithfulness, you shouldn't have to get stuck in a jealous relationship. And if you're the one who's being jealous, you should take some time to think about what made you that way.

If you're willing to admit there's a problem, you should be honest with your boy/girlfriend. You are not doing anyone a favor by letting your jealousy run your relationship. If you can't fix it immediately, you need to learn how. There's no shame in realizing that you're wrong. There's always a lot to learn from our faults.

Leo rocks arts benefit

BY COREY CHARRON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Ted Leo donated a portion of the profits of Tuesday's concert to support the Flywheel Arts Collective. A venue he's been playing since 1999.

Pearl Street was given an early Halloween treat Tuesday night when Ted Leo and the Pharmacists performed one of the most energetic and entertaining shows found in music today at the Pearl Street Ballroom. Ted Leo and the Pharmacist's astonishing blend of punk ferocity and pop perfection is taken to the next level when introduced to a concert setting. Their studio recordings are mostly at a high tempo, but live, the songs are even faster.

Middle-school sensations Bullseye started out the night with a solid set of well-written and tightly played garage rock tunes. High school kids gathered around the front of the stage, while the usual college age hipsters stood in the back. Grandparents and small children were milling around with parents of the youngster's band. Once their performance was over, it was fairly obvious that each faction was impressed with the determined Bullseye.

The five-piece band, consisting of the normal bass-guitar-drums combo along with two keyboard players, meandered onstage rather confidently, considering the Ballroom was already more than halfway full.

Luckily, the trials and tribulations of the music business hadn't yet disillusioned these young rockers, as they enthusiastically played fantastic catchy garage rock to perfection.

Lead singer and bass player Lucas Kendall, sporting braces and long blond hair, started the band off with a rollicking punk number. Each member of the band was well acquainted with the instruments, especially for their age.

Their cover of the Kink's "I'm Not Like Everyone Else," made it obvious to who Bullseye's major influence was. The highlight track of the night was the name-dropping "Mick Jagger's Birthday Bash," which included lines about Snoop Dogg and Jimi Hendrix.

The band brought along a lot of their fan base, who enthusiastically clapped and danced throughout much of the half hour set.

Ted Leo and the Pharmacists were introduced to the crowd by a member of Flywheel Arts Collective, thanking the band for donating part of their earnings to the venue. He also pointed out that Ted Leo had been playing there since 1999, showcasing the importance of places like Flywheel that allow young bands to flourish and mature.

Ted Leo and the Pharmacists jumped into their set with "Little Dawn," a highlight track off of their last record, "Shake the Sheets." The energetic performance was enhanced by the over-the-top enthusiasm from the playful crowd. At one point Ted Leo announced that the audience was in the top five best he had ever seen. The younger kids did as much singing along, jumping and hand-clapping as they did for Bullseye during Leo's set. Their energy certainly played off of the band's, making for an incredible thing to participate in or watch.

It was rare to find the arms-folded apathetic stare usually found at indie rock concerts.

A good portion of the show came from "Shake the Sheets," including songs like "Me and Mia," "The One Who Got Us Out" and "Walking to Do." Popular song "Timorous Me," from 2001's "The Tyranny of Distance," was dedicated to warm-up band Bullseye. "Where Have All the Rude Boys Gone?" was another crowd-pleaser, from album "Hearts of Oak."

Fans who were expecting new songs from the band weren't disappointed. "Hootie Love" featured an intense guitar solo from Leo, transforming Pearl Street into a Clash concert. Politics play a big part in Leo's life and music. His new, previously unperformed song about the CIA was as good as anything they produced all night.

The intensity of the main part of the show climaxed during the encore. Ted Leo started it out playing a solo rendition of traditional song "Dirty Old Town" made famous by The Pogues. Requests for "Since You've Been Gone" were ignored, as Leo stuck by his declaration that he wouldn't be the guy who did the awesome Kelly Clarkson cover.

Leo's backing band The Pharmacists came out to help finish the night with "Ballad of a Sinner Eater." Leo was forced to do his best Iggy Pop impression after his two guitars weren't functioning properly. Fortunately, it came as the highlight of the night, as he writhed and jumped around the stage like a man possessed, tossing the microphone to the crowd.

After the crowd returned the microphone, Leo started bashing his forehead with it, drawing blood. Despite faulty equipment forcing the show to end early, the crowd was pleased with "Ballad of a Sinner" as the final song.

Stewart gets memorial stamp

BY RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A man who had a wonderful life, went to Washington and later was accompanied by a giant white rabbit will be a highlight of the Postal Service's new commemorative postage stamps for 2007. James Stewart will be featured on the 13th Legends of Hollywood stamp.

The actor, who took time out to become a decorated hero in World War II, appeared in more than 80 movies including starring roles in "It's a Wonderful Life," "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" and "Harvey."

Next year's honoree in the Black Heritage series will be Ella Fitzgerald, widely known as the first lady of song for her great vocal range, flexibility and the joy and excitement she brought to music.

As usual, a Love stamp will mark Valentine's Day. This year it features the famed Hershey's kiss candy, introduced in 1907 and still popular.

Since Valentine romance can be followed by marriage, there will be special wedding stamps decorated with heart-shaped vines.

So, does all that lead to the new birds and bees stamps? Not exactly.

These stamps call attention to the important service such creatures perform in pollinating plants. The set of four will feature hummingbirds, bumble bees, a butterfly and a bat.

From comic book heroes like Hulk and Spiderman to the beautiful northern lights and stately lighthouses, there's something for just about everyone planned for next year's stamps.

Among those scheduled: The centennial of Oklahoma's statehood, featuring a painting of a sunrise over the Cimarron River. Oklahoma became the 46th state Nov. 16, 1907. The International Polar Year 2007-2008 features stamps of the aurora borealis the northern lights and their southern counterpart, the aurora australis. These stamps will be issued in two denominations, one at the first-class rate and the second at the rate for international mail.

ular songs, "If I Had a Million Dollars," had not been played. Seconds after returning to the stage, BNL did not disappoint the audience. They came back and performed their biggest hit, complete with tangent interludes about the enigma of American car names, improvising in the first verse and updating the song by inserting "Hybrid" in place of "Reliant automobile."

"Blending serious music talent with a unique sense of humor, BNL continues to put on one of the most purely enjoyable shows out there," said Mike Clapp, a longtime Barenaked Ladies fan. Their live show never disappoints. Old and new songs never fail even the casual listener.

Just like Phish used to do, Barenaked Ladies allow fans to buy individual concert recordings on MP3 format. This allows fans to come away with a memento of the band with one of the most electric shows.

Cruise and Holmes to marry

By Martin Booth
Associated Press

Several headlines and one daughter later, Hollywood heartthrob Tom Cruise and his actress girlfriend Katie Holmes have decided to tie the knot on Nov. 18 in Italy. The 44-year-old "Mission: Impossible" star chose this date to marry his 27-year-old muse as it falls exactly 19 months after they first went out on a date.

Confirming the development, Cruise's publicist Arnold Robinson said: "Those details are correct. Proper security measures are being taken to keep the vows private." Holmes' trousseau and Cruise suit are being designed by renowned Italian designer Giorgio Armani, who has been the actor's longstanding friend. "When I am asked by a friend to make a wedding wardrobe, it goes straight to my heart. It really is an honor to play a small role in that milestone moment," the designer said.

The wedding jewelry will be courtesy David Orgel. "It will probably have 150 diamonds on the wedding band," a source said Cruise said he was very excited about the wedding and was busy leafing through wedding mags to get the best for the ceremony. "It's going to be really beautiful. It's going to be a lot of fun, and I'm actually getting into it. I'm having a great time," he said.

The story of Cruise and Holmes dating first came out in April 2005, when the two were elicked together in Rome.

In June the same year, Cruise proposed marriage to Holmes atop the Eiffel Tower in Paris, a proposal she accepted. Since then, the two have remained engaged despite rumors of break-up and fights, and Holmes delivered a baby girl, Suri, in April this year.

Earlier in June, the "War Of The Worlds" actor had said the two hadn't married when Holmes was pregnant because they wanted Suri to be present at the wedding. "In many ways, we feel like we already are married. I know I'm with the woman I want to spend the rest of my life with. So the wedding — that's just the party," he had said in a magazine interview.

The actor has earlier been married to actresses Mimi Rogers and Nicole Kidman, with whom he shares two adopted children — Connor and Isabella. This would be Holmes' first marriage, but she was previously engaged to actor Chris Klein.

Halloween is around the corner

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

There's a chill in the air. Darkness assaults the remnants of sunlight earlier and earlier with each passing day. Leaves perform what amounts to a glorified death rattle, a final spectacle before blanketing the earth in a brown, slippery carpet. Menus reflect changing tastes of the new season. Soup, after a long lay-off, suddenly seems appealing again. Apple cider becomes a staple at farm stands. Mums and their unremarkable cold-weather brethren dot porches and gardens, a last salute to floral life before a long, barren slumber. Baseball reaches climax, with or without the Red Sox. The Bruins and Celtics embark on their requisite campaigns of mediocrity, while the Patriots play like champions. It's October in New England.

What is it about October that makes us sit up and take notice? Could it be the not-so-subtle hints that winter is around the corner? The foliage that nobody our age seems to care about?

For those of you still pondering the question, you should probably give up now. Or continue on ... I get paid the same either way, and in this case, not at all. The moment the word October appears, any self-respecting college student thinks of one thing: Halloween.

If I haven't lost you by now, then you probably know that Halloween falls on a Tuesday this year, and while any night is a good one for substances and celebration, Tuesdays are not worthy of such an important holiday. So, for all intents and purposes, Halloween will be a 48-hour jaunt of debauchery and all-around excess lasting through the weekend.

For the unprepared, get on that immediately. The Student Union Craft Center has a free Halloween Mask Making Extravaganza running right up to Oct. 31. Located in the basement of the campus center, across from the Hatch, the Craft Center will provide all the necessities to make a critical piece of equipment that completely absolves the wearer of accountability. Thanks go out to Byron Bullock at the Center for Student Development and Marjorie Valdavia, assistant director at the craft center, for coming together and providing students with this valuable service.

In many ways, the evolution of Halloween represents a microcosm of the American experience as a child, adolescent and young adult. As wide-eyed children, the holiday was a mystical and wholesome night of dress-up and sweets, marred only by disappointing macaroons and parental fears of razor-filled cookies and hallucinogen-laced lollipops. Some time later, the night became more about the trick than the treat. Armed with eggs and shaving cream, suburbia became a war zone, with "big kids" looking to dish-out some misdirected vengeance against their younger counterparts, perpetuating a cycle of vandalism firmly entrenched in town lore.

Today, in our waning years of this great celebration, we can be participants in the holiday's best form: Halloween offers college students a chance to play out fantasies that have matured with adult interests, but still remain firmly rooted in the dreams of our youth. While our actions are not without consequences, Halloween provides a rare opportunity. Hidden behind the guise of a mask, we can all be somebody else for a night or two.

Effort to save 'Studio 60' failing

By Frank Barnako
MarketWatch

The critics seem ready to be preparing to write an obituary for NBC's inside-TV series, "Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip." Tom Shales, in Tuesday's Washington Post, wrote that it is "also known as Aaron Sorkin and Thomas Schlamme's revenge on NBC for not renewing 'The West Wing' through the year 2525."

The San Francisco Chronicle's C.W. Nevius was more generous and supportive of the show at the start of the season. "Sadly, it isn't working out. We've hung in there, but it is starting to have the feeling you get on NFL Sunday when it becomes clear that the home team isn't going to be able to stop those slashes off tackle," he wrote.

Although I am an episode behind, and, after the last show, I thought they've got to wrap up this head-writer-loves-show-actress-but-they-broke-up-but-they-have-to-work-together-and-they-really-want-to-make-up storyline. It is, or maybe was, getting tedious.

One reason I've been rooting for the show is that NBC really was aggressive using new media to promote the show and build buzz. The premiere episode was on a Netflix DVD weeks before it aired. I think you could download it, too. Apple's iTunes is selling shows now: five episodes in a $9.95 package. The show's producers did a live blog after the premiere. And the NBC Web site for the show has been firm and packed with blogs and video.

Now, NBC has chosen to play an episode of a great show, "Friday Night Lights," in the "Studio 60" time slot next Monday. An NBC spokesman told the New York Post that "60" was slated to have a repeat then, anyway, and "Lights" deserves a shot at the upscale audience the Sorkin-Schlamme show is drawing.

offense during the last two games. It has to get your attention. And they're playing pretty competitively on defense. They're finding ways to win and finding ways to get off of the field."

The Minutemen (6-1, 4-0 A-10) are rolling as well. They are in the midst of a five-game winning streak and their only loss was in the second week of the season at Navy when the Midshipmen (the only Division I-A opponent on UMass' schedule) edged the Minutemen, 21-20.

UMass is averaging over 35 points per game on offense thanks to a tremendous start by sophomore quarterback Liam Coen, who amassed a 188.19 pass efficiency rating through seven games.

"I thought that this was going to be our best year offensively because we just had so much depth at all positions — wide receiver, tight end, tailback, offensive line, quarterback," Brown said. "To say that you think you're going to average over 35 points per game would be unfair. But at the same time, I felt that we were going to have a year where we could be extremely explosive with all of the playmakers that we have."

The Huskies scored 36 points against the Wildcats last week and 27 points against Delaware on Oct. 7. NU won both games at home, and Parsons Field is a renowned deathtrap for opposing teams.

"There's no visitors' locker room," said Brown, who came to UMass in 2004 after four years as the Northeastern coach. "Fan base-wise it's been a continuous struggle. They've talked about building a stadium for three years and unfortunately that hasn't occurred for them.

"It is a tough place to play," he added. "I can remember being on the other side of that coin when we had a winning streak that was in the double digits. It's a tough place to play and it's just like anything else: When you're a good football team and you're playing well, usually you're going to defend your home pretty well."

Northeastern is 2-0 in the only two games at Parsons Field this season. The Huskies began the year with a brutal non-conference schedule that featured road games at Virginia Tech (38-0 loss), No. 5 James Madison (52-14 loss) and Richmond (12-7 loss). The Huskies beat Holy Cross on Sept. 9, the only win of the year on the road.

"I thought it was an extremely difficult start [for Northeastern], one that I certainly would not be looking forward to," Brown said. "Usually, as a coach you have no control over it, so you just have to play it and do the best you can with it. It certainly helped them when they got back home to be competitive."

needs to be really disciplined."

For the Minutemen, the pressure will be on goalie Jon Quick to keep them in the game. Tonight is just his second game this season after being held out of the opener against SIU.

Against Clarkson, Quick made 27 saves on 30 shots, earning the tie. He allowed three goals, including two on the power play.

"Jon's a real good athlete," Cahoon said. "His ability to keep his focus is an area we've been working on he'll improve as he gains experience. On the ice, he's a very talented young guy. We're hoping that he can grow emotionally and grow his focus to become a more consistent player."

Junior forward P.J. Fenton scored his first goal of the season on Saturday against Clarkson. He now has two points in two games.

good for a gaudy 215 points — in just three seasons.

What's more, the two feed off each other. Micflikier is the dynamic playmaker while Hemingway is the sniper.

"Hemingway is just a pure scorer and Micflikier is one of the most creative guys [in college hockey]," Cahoon said. "[Micflikier] can just buy time and create space with the puck."

The two are coming off down seasons. Each had point totals lower than their sophomore campaigns when the pair had a breakout season. But that statement must be put into context.

Last season was a down year for Micflikier and Hemingway. The numbers would constitute a stellar season for many other players in the nation. Micflikier turned in 16 goals and 26 assists, while Hemingway had 19 goals and 22 assists.

UMass is no stranger to the Wildcats' premier players. In three games between the two teams a season ago, Hemingway and Micflikier combined for seven points. The former recorded two goals and an assist while the latter added four assists.

Stopping the pair takes more patience than anything. Cahoon says shutting down Micflikier and Hemingway means not giving them the opportunities the duo so often capitalizes on.

"Just don't be too risk oriented," the coach said. "You can't give them numbers, you can't give them transition opportunities in crucial areas on the ice.

"You just have to be cognoscente of when they're on the ice. You try to create a matchup that's reasonable, and make sure that people are not looking to take a lot of risks. You don't want to give them those advantages."

UMass has had plenty of time to prepare for the Wildcats. The Minutemen haven't seen game action in nearly two weeks. The last time they were on the ice was their 3-3 overtime tie with Clarkson on Oct. 14. Cahoon says time off this early means an opportunity to work on the fundamentals.

"A lot of systems work and team play needs to be put in place," he said. "You're trying to get all the fundamental pieces of your game in place. From that standpoint it's not a bad time to have a break. You can always make a case for taking a break."

Cahoon failed to speculate whether or not the long layoff helped his team's chances tonight. But one thing is certain — no amount of preparation can prepare a team to face two players with pure hockey skill.

Not an automatic win for Minutemen

But it wasn't. The Wildcats got caught up in the hype and looked past the Huskies, focusing more on what they needed to do in order to get back on track.

This week UMass should have taken a long, hard look at the game film from last weekend. The Minutemen can learn from the mistakes laid out by the Wildcats — never overlook an opponent.

It's the message UMass coach Don Brown has pounded into the heads of his players and the media — all year long, each game is a separate entity, there's no looking ahead. This game against the Huskies, more than any other, will test if the Minutemen are listening to their coach.

"I think there were opportunities along the way that we could have lost focus, but I really don't think that's an issue," Brown said. "We're ready to play on a week to week basis maturity-wise, and we've showed that. With Northeastern winning its last two games, and beating the former No. 1 team in the country — I don't know what more motivation you need.

"I really think when you look at it, we just need to remain focused on a week-to-week basis and take care of the task at hand."

This game is the perfect test for a team that hasn't had many of them this season. Let's face it, the Maroon and White hasn't exactly played the best competition the past few weeks. It's outscored the last four opponents 172-30 — cave and point.

This weekend, UMass faces a tougher test than it did against Navy, and will face UNH. Going in, you have to think that if it can happen to the Wildcats, it can happen to anybody. No conference game in the A-10 is a lock. Top-to-bottom it's one of the premier 1-AA conferences in the nation. After each game it's like the coaches are set to "repeat" — each one preaches about the stiff competition in the league. A team is never safe, no matter whom it plays.

It may sound crazy, but the Minutemen are the underdogs going into Brookline on Saturday. UMass has beaten cellar dwellers, while the Huskies just knocked off two of the best teams in I-AA.

"It gets your attention," Brown said of NU's recent success. "They're finding ways to win and finding ways to get off the field."

The Maroon and White has a lot to look forward to past this Saturday's game.

It takes on UNH the following weekend to continue the two schools' border battle, the surprising Maine Black Bears the week after, and then has a rematch against Hofstra — the team the bounced them from the playoffs a year ago — to close out the 2006 regular season. Not to mention the fact that the Minutemen are quietly being considered national champion contenders.

But the team can't be caught in the trap. UMass has too much at stake to overlook the Huskies this weekend. The schedule mentioned above doesn't exactly fall into the category of cup cake. It will be tough to recover from a loss this weekend in Brookline and still remain atop the A-10.

If they come out of the weekend with a solid victory, it will be a true testament to the caliber of team the Minutemen are.

UM lets UNH end losing skid

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was a game the Massachusetts field hockey team should have won.

The Minutewomen (6-13, 3-3 Atlantic 10) fell in an embarrassing fashion to the New Hampshire Wildcats on Wednesday, 4-1.

Despite the loss to UNH (2-15, 0-4 America East), UMass still controls its own destiny in whether or not it advances to the A-10 Tournament. The Minutewomen host the Rhode Island Rams on Senior Day this Saturday.

The Wildcats' offensive surge was led by freshman forward Megan Shea, who had her first career hat trick, scoring three of the Wildcats' four goals. Yesterday's win snapped a 10-game losing streak for UNH.

UNH	4

Last night's forgettable contest may have had no implications in the A-10 standings, but a chance to carry the momentum from last weekend's two come-from-behind wins over West Chester and La Salle went by the wayside.

UMass could have used some of that comeback magic Wednesday.

The Minutewomen continued their habit of coming out slow in games. Yesterday was no exception to that season-long trend. UMass found itself trailing the Wildcats 3-1 at halftime and conceded six penalty corners to the Wildcats at the conclusion of the first half. The Minutewomen have been outscored 27-10 in the first 35 minutes of games this season.

It was more of the same in the second half, as UNH tallied an insurance goal just three minutes into the half, and was on its way to its second win in an otherwise dismal season.

"We played horrible and I give credit to UNH," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "[UNH] plays on emotion and they always compete. UNH beat us to every ball and stepped right in front of us.

"We didn't execute well at all," she said. "We didn't execute our individual skills, nor did we execute our game plan at all."

UMass was given a golden opportunity to stake an early 1-0 advantage when awarded a penalty stroke 1:40 in. Junior backfielder Erin O'Brien did the honors, but her shot went wide to the left, leaving the game scoreless.

From then on, UNH showed no signs of a team having nothing to play for.

The Wildcats' first goal came when UMass turned the ball over deep in its own zone, allowing Shea to blast a shot past freshman goaltender Sarah Williams.

Twelve minutes later, UNH's Jen Mooney took a cross pass from Sam Geary and hammered the ball home after UNH's initial shot off the penalty corner was saved by Williams.

UMass scored for the first and last time Wednesday when O'Brien fed a long pass from midfield to sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie. Gillespie took O'Brien's feed and shot the ball past UNH goalie Marguax Shute, who had come out of the net, cutting the lead in half at 2-1. Gillespie leads the Minutewomen with 13 goals this year.

JEN KIESS – MASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior forward Gina Sanders has three points on one goal and one assist in 2006. She has started in all 19 games this season.

UNH lit up the scoreboard one more time in the half, when a long pass from UNH's Emily Colton glanced off Shea's stick and found the back of the cage, giving the Wildcats a 3-1 advantage at the break.

"We didn't make the changes we needed to make early enough," O'Brien said. "We came out strong in the beginning of the game, but then stuff we talked about at halftime we didn't fix."

Two minutes hadn't even ticked off the clock in the second half before the Wildcats extended the lead to three goals. UNH's Colton made a pass that found its way through a cluster of UMass defenders, and Shea one-timed Colton's pass into the net.

UMass fails to show up against Wildcats

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Remember when the Patriots lost that Monday night game to the Dolphins in 2004? The Patriots strolled into Miami as winners of six straight, and a week away from a key matchup with the New York Jets. Tom Brady imploded, the defense fell apart, and a fourth-quarter lead evaporated.

The Patriots lost 29-28.

A trap game, for those not in the know, is a game before a more significant contest that a team could potentially lose if it doesn't focus on the task at hand.

When the Massachusetts field hockey team took on the New Hampshire Wildcats Wednesday afternoon for a non-conference showdown, the trap was set.

UNH has been horrendous this season. The Wildcats dropped 15 of 16 before arriving in Amherst — including their last 10.

The Minutewomen are slated to host Rhode Island this Saturday to decide the postseason fate of each team. While consistent success against UNH is key to re-establishing the regional dominance of the UMass field hockey program, qualifying for the Atlantic 10 Tournament is of the utmost importance.

"We have to get back to being the team to beat in New England," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "Today was a perfect opportunity to do that and we didn't."

Leading into Wednesday, the Minutewomen won three of four — all four were conference games, and all of them were both physically and emotionally exhausting. However, Shea preached to her team the significance of playing well against UNH for the sake of improving before Saturday's game.

"This is a big game for us," Shea said before yesterday's game. "We need to win going into our last conference game. If we don't play well tomorrow, against UNH, we won't play well Saturday, against URI."

Apparently, the Minutewomen didn't listen. The game plan for UMass is always to make clean passes and establish its sets to properly impose its offensive will on its opponent.

Too often against UNH, Minutewomen players showed either reluctance or unwillingness to make the passes necessary to produce scoring chances.

"Something happened to us mentally," senior forward Gina Sanders said. "We started playing very individually instead of trying to win as a team."

The players were hesitant to say whether or not they took yesterday's match lightly due to UNH's dismal record and the circumstances surrounding Saturday's contest.

"That could be a thought I guess," Sanders said when asked if the team was too focused on URI. "I don't know. I don't want to answer that question."

UNH was by no means a pushover for UMass, but it is certainly a team that UMass should beat. Its poor record aside, UNH is a very inexperienced team and has very few bright spots, if any.

"[UNH's] record is very deceiving," Shea said. "But this is certainly a game we can win."

The improvements the Minutewomen made in their last four games were reasons to be optimistic about their playoff aspirations. They displayed a feisty style of play, and had the emotion necessary to win crucial late-season games.

On Wednesday, there was no sense of urgency, no must-win mindset — just 11 girls scattered on a field trying to do everything themselves.

"We aren't good enough individually to dribble through people," Shea said. "Today should have helped us to get where we wanted to be for Saturday. Unfortunately, it was more of a step back."

Passes were off-target. Loose balls weren't gathered. And the multitude of offensive opportunities provided by a weak Wildcat backfield did not translate into goals for UMass.

"[At halftime] we talked about playing more together," junior defender Erin O'Brien said. "We just weren't able to make any of the changes we discussed."

UNH provided the Maroon and White with every opportunity to score goals. The possession for the game was pretty much even. However, when UNH gained control of the ball, it was not only able to convert scoring chances into actual scores, it was also able to process these chances into further opportunities by forcing penalty corners — it forced nine, while the Minutewomen mustered only four.

The Minutewomen actually had two penalty corners with no time left on the clock in the first half. On both attempts, they appeared to be disorganized and couldn't capitalize. The officials even awarded UMass a penalty stroke just a minute and a half in, but O'Brien missed, wide right.

"That's a hand that's dealt to you," Shea said. "You have to be able to compete with what you are dealt. You can't fold. I thought we folded a little too much today."

The Minutewomen better know what hand they hold this weekend because when URI rolls into town, they're all in.

Minutewomen may fall short of playoffs

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (10-5, 4-3 Atlantic 10) put itself in a difficult position after its 2-1 loss to Rhode Island this past Sunday.

"This makes next weekend so critical now," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We have two games left to get points. I'm pleased we made a game of it today, but we made it tough on ourselves."

The Minutewomen are in real danger of missing out on the A-10 Tournament for the second consecutive season. Rudy expects that both upcoming weekend games, against two tough conference opponents in Saint Louis and Duquesne, will each be virtual must-wins if the team hopes to get a berth into the postseason tournament.

SENIOR DAY

Compounding the tough loss to URI was the fact that it came on Senior Day, as senior Elizabeth Weinstein, and senior co-captains Nadia Villarroel and Stephanie Barrett came out on the losing end of their last home game while playing for UMass.

"It was a really emotional experience," Villarroel said. "It was the last time all three of us will be together at Rudd Field, as well as the entire team. We've been here four years together, working hard, and it has meant a lot. Stepping on the field I didn't realize it would be my last game here and now after the game it sunk in."

UMass Soccer

Although it was an emotional game for the seniors, Villarroel didn't believe that the added pressure bothered them or the rest of her teammates.

"Once the game started that exited my mind," she said. "I didn't let that affect my mentality or state of mind during the game. It was upsetting that we lost, but we worked hard and turned it around and made it real close at the end."

Rudy thought that it may have been a bit of a distraction for his team.

"People are looking at signs and I worry about the focus," he said. "I think we've won one Senior Day."

POSSIBLE LINEUP CHANGES

With just two games remaining now for the Maroon and White, Rudy is thinking about the possibility of shaking up his playing rotation, but isn't thinking about doing anything drastic.

"On the one hand you want to make some changes, but on the other hand we're in the last weekend of the season," he said. "Do we have the time in which to make those changes? I'm not sure. We won't change anything drastically, but there will be adjustments."

TEAM TIDBITS

Junior forward Britt Canfield scored the lone goal in the Minutewomen's 2-1 loss on Sunday. It was her team-leading seventh goal of the season... Redshirt junior goalkeeper Kristin Walker had her career-long shutout streak (three games) snapped against the Rams, but still has only allowed 1.02 goals per game ... Walker, who had surgery in the off-season on her knee, has decided to keep her knee brace on for the remainder of the season, instead of taking it off as originally planned. She is keeping it on to be on the safe side and she has become more comfortable with it as of late ... Junior defender Tina Rodriguez, who is out for the rest of the season with a knee injury, has become an "unofficial coach," roaming the sideline and cheering on her team.

Hot Huskies host Minutemen

NU in hunt after two-game win streak

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Northeastern football was in the dumps just three short weeks ago, when the Huskies dropped their third straight game, losing 12-7 to the Richmond Spiders on the road to drop their overall record to 1-4.

Since then, Northeastern's season has turned around.

On Oct. 7, the Huskies edged a Delaware team that recently cracked the Sports Network's Top 25 in Division I-AA. A bye week came next, then No. 7 New Hampshire at home.

Northeastern (3-4, 2-2 Atlantic 10) took care of the Wildcats in a 36-35 overtime thriller after NU coach Rocky Hager decided to go for a two-point conversion instead of settling for the tie.

"That was a tough loss for [UNH]," UMass coach Don Brown said. "After [New Hampshire's] win over Delaware, Northeastern had a bye, so they had two weeks to prepare. If you're not playing your best football, in the Atlantic 10, you're going to get beat."

Now Massachusetts goes to Boston for a Saturday battle set for 1 p.m. at Parsons Field in Brookline.

"[Northeastern has] won two games in a row," Brown said yesterday. "They're averaging over 31 points per game over the last two games and well over 400 yards of

Northeastern should not be overlooked

This was not supposed to happen. Northeastern wasn't even supposed to be in overtime with New Hampshire. The Wildcats were the No. 7 team in the nation and the Huskies were nothing more than Atlantic 10 bottom feeders. But it did happen.

NU quarterback John Sperrazza threaded a pass to Kendrick Ballantyne to bring the Huskies within one point of UNH in overtime. The play was on a 4th-and-5 situation — a last ditch hope for the Huskies to pull off the upset — and they converted. Northeastern coach Rocky Hager wasn't satisfied with the tie. He wanted it all.

Hager kept his offense on the field to go for the two points, and the win. Once again Sperrazza completed a clutch throw, this time to Alex Broomfield to lift the Huskies to victory.

The win was surprising to many around I-AA football. UNH, a once unbeatable machine, just lost its second game in a row. At least James Madison was expected to challenge the Wildcats, but not the Huskies. UNH should have gone into Brookline, taken care of its business, and jumped on the bus back to Durham, simple.

Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen (12) leads the nation in pass efficiency with a 188.19 rating. Coen has completed 69.4 percent of his passes, and has thrown 15 touchdown passes and just four interceptions in seven games. The Minutemen travel to Northeastern this weekend.

Mass Attack to be tested early

Sophomore goaltender Jon Quick allowed three goals and made 27 saves in Saturday's 3-3 tie to Clarkson University. The Minutemen open Hockey East play this week. They take on No. 8 New Hampshire tonight, and No. 1 Maine on Saturday.

Things are heating up quickly in the ice for the Massachusetts hockey team. The Mass. Attack faces No. 8 New Hampshire (2-0) tonight to open Hockey East play. UMass then travels to Orono, Maine, to take on the top-ranked Maine Black Bears.

The Minutemen (1-0-1) should be well rested after a two-week break. They opened their season with a 5-2 win over Sacred Heart on Oct. 13, followed by a 3-3 tie against No. 17 Clarkson.

This is the first of three meetings between the Hockey East rivals, the final two coming in a home-and-home series on Jan. 19-20. Tonight marks the first conference game for both teams.

New Hampshire has started quickly, winning its first two games, both on the road.

"They just went out to Colorado [College], and they swept them," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "They're 2-0. I know that they will be all we can handle on Thursday, so we're going to have to play our very best to win."

"New Hampshire has always been a team that likes to take chances, and they capitalize on the other team's mistakes," junior Patrick Dineen said.

The Wildcats now return for their season opener against the Maroon and White, a team they have developed a heated rivalry with recently.

"We beat them at their place last year," Dineen said. "We've had their number lately. We always play them tight, no matter what the records are."

"I think the kids look forward to playing in that environment," Cahoon said. "It's going to be a sold out event, and it'll be very loud."

The Mass Attack went 1-2 against UNH last season. After dropping the first meeting at home, 4-1, the Minutemen fell to the ninth-ranked Wildcats in Durham, 3-1. The next night, UMass stunned UNH, winning the series finale 4-3 in overtime.

"They've played solid teams already this year, so we just have to play solid defensive hockey and take advantage of their mistakes," Dineen said.

UMass is 14-68-5 all-time against the Wildcats, and is 2-6-2 in its last 10 against the conference rival.

"They have a real good goaltender in Kevin Regan," Cahoon said. "He gives them the backstop that they look for."

Regan is 2-0 this season with a 2.64 goals-against average. The junior allowed five goals in the victories at Colorado College last year, he played in 22 games while splitting time with Jeff Pietrastik. He went 8-8-5 with a 2.63 goals-against average, a .914 save percentage, and two shutouts.

Four of UNH's five goals this year are on the power play, so the UMass penalty kill will need to be at its best. It has allowed two power play goals in 12 tries this season.

"They have a high-powered offense," Cahoon said. "They play a wide-open style of hockey. They're very comfortable with that format. They have good special teams with [Jacob] Micflikier and a cast of veterans like [Jerry] Pollastrone."

Pollastrone is tied for second on the team with four points on two goals and two assists. Micflikier, a senior and team captain, has tallied three points on a trio of assists.

Trevor Smith is the Wildcats' leading scorer with five points. He has three goals and two assists in two games, including the game-winning goal in the season opener. On Monday, Smith earned his first career COMBIK Hockey East Player of the Week honors.

"We can't focus on any one player," Cahoon said. "We'll certainly look to the special teams to handle them on the power play. Our five-on-five

UNH duo continues to dominate in '06

For the past three years, New Hampshire's top line has been terrorizing Hockey East and all of college hockey. Year in and year out, Daniel Winnik, Jacob Micflikier and Brett Hemingway had represented one of the best threesomes in the nation.

The three entered the Wildcats program at the same time and meshed immediately.

But the big three is no more. Winnik left UNH last season after his junior year to sign with the Phoenix Coyotes of the NHL. Hemingway and Micflikier remain, but much else hasn't changed. The two are still some of the best players in the nation, on one of the best teams in the nation.

Entering UMass' matchup against UNH tonight in Durham, coach Don Cahoon realizes how — if given the opportunity — Hemingway and Micflikier can take a game over.

"All you have to do is look at the numbers," Cahoon said. "They measure up with some of the best players. They're very productive. There's no hiding that and no disputing that."

The coach is right, the numbers don't lie. Over their three years, Hemingway and Micflikier have combined for a total of 95 goals and 120 assists. That's

See UNH on page 7

UNH senior forward Jacob Micflikier is second on the Wildcats in assists with three. He had two helpers in New Hampshire's 7-2 win on Saturday.

Civil Rights activist Moses speaks in UMass lecture series

Civil Rights activist Bob Moses (above) addresses U.S. educational issues in his second lecture of a three-part series at Mahar Auditorium yesterday, saying education is the key to improving the status of the poor in the country.

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Renowned Civil Rights activist Bob Moses spoke to a throng of history professors and students at Mahar Auditorium last night about educational issues in the United States.

It was the second lecture in a three-part series that the UMass history department sponsored this fall. This year, the department dubbed the lecture series, "Politics and Protest: The 1960s and now."

Moses was a prominent figure in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in the early 1960s and emerged as one of the leading activists from the organization.

Now, Moses has a new theory on how to improve the status of the poor, and that is through education. His new book, "Radical Equations: Civil Rights 1964 Mississippi to the Algebra Project," highlights new methods of teaching math and literacy to the urban poor.

For his work, the National Science Foundation gave Moses a $2.75 million grant to further pursue his research.

Students taking UMass Civil Rights classes attended last night's lecture, as well as local teachers and professors who shared their opinions on local education throughout the night.

Moses didn't speak all that much. He put microphones at the front of each aisle lining the auditorium, and encouraged everyone to bring issues to the table and respond to questions posed by other audience members.

The topics ranged from the increase of the MCAS test passing requirement from 220 to 240, to the correlation between the nation's high school dropout rate and low-income housing.

The open discussion also touched on public education funding, the relationship between poverty and education, and America's trend toward anti-intellectualism.

At times, when an audience member spoke passionately about a topic, he or she received an ovation from the crowd. One student, in the midst of a discussion about the value of the MCAS test, said, "I think

Majors Fair held at Campus Center

By Nate Geier
Collegian Correspondent

Just as quickly as pre-registration approaches, the annual Majors Fair has come and gone for the season. Indications of the success from the event could be seen from the roughly 1,000 people that attended the fair on Wednesday in the Campus Center of the University of Massachusetts.

"Having done this many years, I thought this was the most engaging," Undergraduate Program Director for German and Scandinavian Studies, Harry Seelig said. "Interactions with the students went very well. The organization was flawless; hats off to the organizers."

Similar departments and groups were deliberately placed close together because of suggestions from students who attended last year's event, according to Suzanne Polizzi, Majors Fair Assistant of Commonwealth College. This year, the fair was held in the Campus Center instead of the Student Union to give people more space to interact.

"I think I found what I came here for — and more," freshman Latania Lafontant commented. "I found out about Microbiology, which seems pretty interesting."

According to Caroline Gould, Assistant Director for Career Planning, the supplemental workshops held in addition to the fair were also successful. She said the groups attending the workshops were relatively small, but it's helpful to talk with a smaller audience to see what interests the individual students have. Gould, who led three of the workshops, encouraged confused students not to be limited by their major, but to get down to the basic idea of exactly what they want to do and seek it.

"It was helpful for me," freshman Brett Willey said of the workshop he attended. "We learned that businesses don't necessarily look at the major you have as the decisive reason to hire you. They look more at experience like internships and co-ops offered here."

Gould also emphasized the fact that there is no downside to doing internships. These students show their initiative, they get to try new things, and they get a chance to start networking sooner. A person may end up liking the field related to their internship, but if not, Gould believes it is better to find out sooner than later.

MTC announces $3M investment for new apoptosis center

By Nicole Boonpraguakul
Collegian Staff

In an effort to increase research in clinical treatments for diseases, The Massachusetts Technology Collaborative (MTC) announced on Tuesday that they will invest $3 million towards a new Center for Excellence in Apoptosis Research in the Pioneer Valley.

Apoptosis is the process of programmed cell death in human tissues to remove defective or surplus cells. Defects in apoptosis underlie about 70 percent of human disease, according to Dr. Lawrence Schwartz, director of Pioneer Valley Life Science Institute (PVLSI) and UMass faculty member.

"Understanding apoptosis on a tissue-specific basis will open enormous opportunities for treating, preventing or delaying the onset of various types of cancer, cardiovascular disease, neurodegenerative disorders, and autoimmune diseases," said Schwartz. "The hope is that new therapies can correct defects in apoptosis that underlie disease, while leaving healthy cells alone."

The center, which will be based in Springfield, will draw upon the expertise of the PVLSI, which is a non-profit organization dedicated to biomedical research of breast cancer, diabetes, metabolic disorders and apoptosis. The University of Massachusetts Amherst and Baystate Medical Center will also be involved in identifying and regulating signaling pathways of the biological process of cell death that may lead to new discoveries. The center will also provide support for the research, technology, and workforce needs of more than 20 statewide companies currently involved with apoptosis research and product development.

"This investment from MTC's John Adams Innovation Institute will stimulate new research in the life sciences and lead to medical innovations that we hope will also spur economic development in the Pioneer Valley," said Mitch Adams, Executive Director of MTC, in a press release.

As a statewide economic development agency that focuses on strengthening the state's innovation economy, MTC is also responsible for nearly a quarter of all jobs in Massachusetts. The agency, which is based in Westborough, strives to improve the state's competitive edge in the innovation economy by stimulating new job creation and retention in knowledge- and technology-based companies.

SGA holds first meeting of the year

By Samantha M. Frontiera and Sarah Syed

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts held its first meeting of the year on Wednesday evening, where President Elvis Mendez swore in and addressed the new Senate.

Each of the six remaining seats of the Senate was filled by tie-breaking votes. Jessica Parker was sworn in for the final Northeast seat. Caleb Gallus and Rachel Linso for Commuter seats; Rebecca Friddling and Karina Martinez for Southwest South.

President Mendez discussed the changes in administrative structure. "We must adopt a different mindset, one in which one is willing to take criticism, willing to build from the bottom up, and willing to engage with the student body and community," Mendez said.

The most visible change is the decrease in the number of Senators in the house from 90 to 49.

"The SGA is an organization for students and by students in that it also serves as the legitimate student body," Mendez said. "I urge you all to go out and begin the building and repairing of bridges to the UMass community." Mendez also described the SGA as the "primary mechanism of empowerment on campus."

Speaker of the House Peter Barros reinforced the guidelines for Senators to follow and stated the importance of being a Senator, since the administrative changes allow for more participation and involvement by Senators.

Speaker Barros also announced that the gubernatorial democratic candidate Deval Patrick will be speaking at UMass on Tuesday, Oct. 31.

Student Trustee Mishy Feiblum explained her role as trustee since July 2006 and congratulated the newly sworn in Senators. Feiblum invited any interested Senators to get involved in cluster meetings and welcomed them to accompany her to the next meeting in February, which will vote on budget.

"I am here to encourage participation in this trustee process, as well as an on-campus process, and to encourage student participation," Feiblum said. She told the Senators, "You are in a unique position to participate in this process. What you get out of this will have everything to do with your participation. We will be able to go to bat with the trustees and the State house."

The meeting ended with the Senators' first vote of the semester to establish a SGA Select Committee on Statewide Student Organizing. By passing this motion, Mendez hopes to decrease tuition fees for both in-state and out-of-state students. Mendez said that this motion is meant to empower the UMass student body. All were in favor of passing the motion.

SGA President Elvis Mendez speaks about the changes in administrative structure and Senate at the association's first meeting of the year.

education is losing its life when you teach to a test.'" Moses stood quietly on stage while the discussion floated between students and teachers.

Moses interjected once in a while with his own opinions, including some personal stories about his teaching experience in Jackson, Mississippi, for the last 10 years.

"Our country has the kids at the bottom rung geared to be the serfs of the information age," he said. "Any kid with an 8th grade education in this country is headed for serfdom."

Moses – unlike other civil rights leaders like Martin Luther King Jr., Malcolm X, and Stokey Carmichael – is reserved and quiet. What allowed Moses to have an open discussion was his ability to stay out of the conversation when the audience members had their own opinions.

Michael Thelwell, Moses' friend and Afro-American studies teacher here at UMass, opened the night with a few words about Moses.

"Bob Moses is famous for getting people to do things they thought they'd never do," Thelwell said. "He is the most extraordinary leader and social organizer that this country has produced in my lifetime."

Thelwell also read a quotation from Carmichael, a prominent figure in the SNCC and in the Black Power movement, which praised Moses and his talents as an organizer.

Moses spoke quietly throughout the night and was hard to hear at some points during the lecture. He began with a miniature Constitution in his hand, and asked the audience to repeat after him as he read the preamble to the Constitution.

Moses explained his reasoning afterwards.

"[The preamble] does not say, 'We, the President.' It does not say, 'We, the Congress.' It just says, 'We the people take responsibility for the Constitution.'"

He went on to say that contemporary education "does not teach us that we have to be public people and discuss public issues."

For that reason, he argued, the United States should pass a Constitutional amendment guaranteeing all children a quality, public school education.

While Moses played a definitive role in the student protests of the early 1960s and participated in the Freedom Rides of 1961, the discussions last night remained devoted to contemporary issues like politics and education.

Moses was well educated about the plight of Massachusetts students. He stated that while Massachusetts students are well above the national average for testing, they can't go to colleges around the country because of the expensive out-of-state tuitions.

He also made a powerful parallel when he compared voting in the 1960s to voting today. When Moses and the SNCC tried to get black people to vote as an avenue towards more power, he said that someone asked him why he allowed the illiterate to vote.

Moses compared that to modern society's education dilemma with the poor and their lack of representation.

"You can't limit citizens from literacy through the political system and then deny them access to politics because of their illiteracy," he said.

Bob Moses was granted $2.75 million from the National Science Foundation to further study the relationship between poverty and education.

College degree worth $23,000

By Stephen Ohlemacher
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — How much is a bachelor's degree worth? About $23,000 a year, the government said in a report released Thursday.

That is the average gap in earnings between adults with bachelor's degrees and those with high school diplomas, according to data from the Census Bureau.

College graduates made an average of $51,554 in 2004, the most recent figures available, compared with $28,645 for adults with a high school diploma. High school dropouts earned an average of $19,169 and those with advanced college degrees made an average of $78,093.

"There appear to be strong incentives to get a college degree, given the gaps that we observe," said Lisa Barrow, senior economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago.

Eighty-five percent of people 25 and older had at least a high school diploma or the equivalent in 2005, according to the Census Bureau's 2005 Current Population Survey. In 2000, 80 percent had a high school diploma or the equivalent, and a little more than half did in 1970.

Twenty-eight percent had at least a bachelor's degree, compared with about 24 percent in 2000 and 11 percent in 1970.

"I think we've done a very good job of getting individuals into college," said Cecilia Rouse, professor of economics and public affairs at Princeton University. "But we don't fully understand why we don't do as good a job of graduating them."

Chester Finn, president of the Thomas B. Fordham Institute in Washington, said too many high school graduates are unprepared to succeed in college.

"If you don't emerge from high school having done at least the equivalent of advanced algebra, you are not going to be ready for college math," Finn said. "You can make similar points about English."

According to data from the U.S. Census Bureau, the average gap in earnings between college and high school graduates is $23,000 a year.

UMass students reflect on success of annual Majors Fair

Although things seemed to go smoothly and interactions were effective between students and representatives, there were also aspects of the fair students might have changed. Freshman Jessica Dautruche commented it would be nice if the tables had better visual representation to make it easier to identify the different departments.

Given the fact the event was held in a more spacious location than previous years, there were still enough students present during the peaks in attendance to create significant clutter in the Auditorium. The roar of conversation in the air was just enough to make some students feel it would have been beneficial to designate separate rooms to make communication easier.

One option students had an opportunity to learn more about at the Majors Fair was the Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration major (BDIC). The BDIC is one of the few interdisciplinary majors at the University. This means it allows students to combine classes from several different majors to form a major that isn't formally addressed at UMass. This route allows students to have their required classes focus more strictly on an area of particular interest to them.

As students were leaving the fair, they were asked to fill out an evaluation of the event. Those who participated were entered into a drawing for one of six gift certificates for $25 to the Campus U-Store. The winners of these prizes will be notified Nov. 1 via email after the drawing.

What the life of a conservative is like on a liberal campus

By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Staff

In a state dominated by liberal political views, it is no surprise to many people that various Massachusetts college campuses are composed of mainly liberal-minded students, and UMass Amherst is no exception.

"I started college at Tulane University in New Orleans, where a large percentage of students are conservative, although not the majority. I transferred here after Hurricane Katrina and was very wary of the constant challenges that might arise with being a conservative in an overwhelmingly liberal setting," explained Mary-Frances Heck, a UMass junior.

With a majority of faculty members and students who consider themselves to be liberals, and the presence of numerous liberal-leaning student groups like VOX: Students for Choice, a pro-choice advocacy group, UMass Amherst Democrats, and Students Against the War, some conservative students believe they are unable to openly express their opinions without scrutiny.

"Often times when I voice my conservative opinion, my friends' reactions range from rolling their eyes to verbal arguments that end in frustration and anger," said Mary-Frances Heck, a UMass junior.

"I definitely let people know how I feel but I'm pretty sure they don't receive my ideas with an open mind. I think it is important to remain constant in my beliefs even though they are not often received well," Heck added.

Some students feel the campus' dominant liberal views have worked their way into the academic curriculum. Heck said she feels like her conservative values are unwelcome, and that the voices of conservative students. She even went as far to say that assigned readings bare a liberal slant.

While some conservative students are angered by what seems like a strong liberal presence in the classroom, others are able to keep an open mind in these situations. "In almost every class, I listen to my teachers make negative comments about [President] Bush and the way he does things," said Jason Hatchell, a conservative UMass senior. "I would say in three-fourths of the classes I've had there have been professors who openly make remarks about our government and openly express their personal feelings. Maybe the first time it bothered me a little, but now I kind of just laugh about it."

Some students feel that many organized events held throughout campus neglect the opinions of conservatives, and are supposed to appeal mainly to liberals. One example, said Heck, is John Kerry's speech on Sept. 8. She wonders why a conservative like Mitt Romney isn't welcomed to campus during his presidential campaign. "The other day, the quad outside the Student Union had hangers with pro-abortion signs. I almost threw up," she added.

The most prominent student organization on the UMass campus involved in representing the conservative voice is the UMass Republican Club. The UMass Republican Club was founded in 1983, and currently consists of over 100 members. Despite being a minority group at UMass, the UMass Amherst Republican Club is one of the largest chapters in the Massachusetts Allegiance of College Republicans.

The major objectives of the UMass Republican club are to bring college students into the Republican Party, to provide an opportunity for them to find political expression and recognition, to train college students as effective political workers and give them an opportunity to meet the candidates of the Republican Party and work for their election, and to promote the ideals of the Republican Party.

In an effort to support conservative views on campus, the Republican Club has hosted many prominent conservative speakers including Ben Stein, Dinesh D'Souza and David Horowitz.

Last year, the club organized a Veteran's Day memorial service that took place at the Amherst Town Common. "This was the only event of its kind that was organized for that day in downtown Amherst," according to the UMass Republican Club Web site.

Another main event organized by the Republican Club was hosting Chief Justice Roy Moore for a speaking event. "His speaking topic addressed the controversy involving Moore's Ten Commandments statue in the Supreme Court of Alabama. He also spoke about the role of God in our legal system within a historical context. He spoke at length on our nation's founding and the intent of the framers of the Constitution," according to the UMass Republican Club Web site.

Some groups and organizations here at UMass may be considered to have conservative views, despite what members actually believe. This can lead to misconceptions and misjudgments of these organizations. The UMass Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) is one such organization.

The Army ROTC is an elected curriculum which trains students to be Officers in the United States Army, Army Reserves, or Army National Guard. Due to its connection with the military, many people automatically believe that the ROTC program is a conservative organization. Many liberals and conservatives view the ROTC programs in this way, and even the Republican Club has a link to the UMass Army ROTC Web site on their Web site. However, participants within the program disagree with their association with conservatism.

"I believe this is a false association with a false impression," said Lieutenant Colonel David T. Vacchi, Professor of Military Leadership at UMass. "The military is not conservative or liberal in approach as it is not a political organization. The military is an element of power and defense at the disposal of the Federal Government."

The UMass Army ROTC program attracts students of all backgrounds, and consists of both conservative and liberal students. This diversity creates various viewpoints within the program. "ROTC is much more a cross section of the host university at large than it is of anything else," added Vacchi.

The ROTC program focuses on the success of their students, and does not let political opinions affect their interactions with students. "It is my values and ethics as an officer that impact the program and solid values and good ethics are what I look for in my Cadets," said Vacci.

Many UMass students, despite their individual opinions, want to look past the biases that can be found on campus, and keep their political views from being the main focus of their college experience. "I don't think there are any problems being in ROTC or being a conservative here at UMass. I ask, Who will come out of their four years here more intellectually tactful? The liberal or the conservative?," said Eric Hanft, a UMass junior and member of ROTC.

"I'm the kind of person who seeks out challenge, and surrounding myself with my ideological peers presents no challenge to the mind," he added.

The involvement of college students and young adults within United States and world politics has been an important element of American society throughout the history of the United States. From the social and political movements of the 1960s to the most current war in Iraq, the opinions and actions of the young adult on college campuses has given a voice to the young adult population. While certain views may be more prominent than others, it is the presence of these different opinions that makes college campuses more diverse.

CASUAL FRIDAY

Coverage of our partying not worth the attention

UMass is the North-East flavor of the month. Newspapers and television can't seem to get enough of our seemingly overwhelming need for alcohol. Reports of student pervasiveness have filtered to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, Fox 25 News and even the front page of the Boston Globe. The main gist of it is that UMass needs to attend one big AA meeting.

From this comes the obvious question of why all the hype. The reason is two-fold. Townspeople want a crack down, as do University officials. There is discussion about closer collaboration with UMass and Amherst police, while dorm regulations and reprimands have been stepped up a notch.

Basically, the policy-makers have begun to mobilize, and are getting ready for a war that will cover this valley in sobriety and civility. It seems like we're out of control, but here's an obvious question: have things really changed that much?

Coming back at the beginning of this year, UMass seemed to be right in stride with past precedent. New students were moving in, old friends were reuniting and the police were throwing up speed traps.

But soon, students found these speed traps were accompanied by checkpoints. Every weekend, you are sure to see cops stopping incoming cars, and checking drivers for sobriety. Around the same time, the arrest statistics started with a bang at the infamous Townhouse weekend and have been going strong ever since. Reformers are afoot, and change is coming with them.

It began with the replacement of the beloved (yet violent) swans with the snowy egrets and culminated in the appointment of Stephen P. Tocco as Chairman of the UMass Board of Trustees. One of Tocco's main initiatives is to once and for all destroy the UMass party school image.

Right now, if you were to Google "UMass" and "party," you would immediately be led to headlines of "Neighbors decry UMass drinking." Looking up "Tocco" and "party" you will easily find a CBS 4 news report drawing readers with "UMass Trying to Curb Wild Parties."

Catchy, but we at the Collegian find ourselves wondering where we can find these "Wild Parties."

UMass is the same as it has always been. The only real change is the authoritative response to our normalcy. Reactions from below, by neighbors, are fusing with mandates from above, by high-minded reformers. These streams have crossed to create a total protonic reversal of blue lights, gangling keys and paddy wagons.

All this seems to be doing is furthering the already stigmatized UMass stereotype. Despite what any of us students will tell you, UMass has always been thought of by the outside as ZooMass.

Even the Princeton Review reports us as the "Number Seven Party School in the Nation." We agree this is an ugly image to shake, for it only inspires idiocy and calories yet, we are forced to question the methods.

Is stepping up police involvement the right solution? Even if this means it can achieve its hopeful end to "curb wild parties," it can only be in a negative way. There aren't going to be fewer parties because students feel they can do better on weekends, but rather, because they fear the repercussions. Now how does this police state look to potential students?

By stepping up strict police action in a crusade against our image, the powers that be have only succeeded in the opposite. This action only seems to be fueling the fires of the printing press. Arrests make news. Forcing someone to dress up in a toga makes news. This news then turns around and makes us look like congregated animals, much like those you see at the zoo.

It also makes people think of UMass as a battlefield. The police stand uniformly against the barbaric horde of undergraduates. This is not an image anyone wants to be a part of. No student will want to attend, and no parent will make them.

Be ready, because change is in the air. The wrath of the swans has been replaced by the wrath of policy. No longer will UMass allow its students to sully their image, they're ready to do it themselves.

Happy Oct. 27th students

Halloween weekend is upon us, and that can only mean two things: themed parties and massive reruns of the "Jason" movies and the entire Halloween series. Most college students (me included) will party like they do every weekend, but this time, they will go to the party dressed in a costume.

I love this time of year because it brings out people's creativity or lack thereof. Of course, there will be those guys who dress up as their favorite athlete and those girls who dress up as maids or nurses. What I really like are those who come to the party dressed like John Stewart, a horse, or a Rubics Cube. Now those are creative.

It bugs me when people show up to the party sans costume and then claim they are a coat or a sweatshirt. Why do you even bother to show up? At least try to throw something together. You are just embarrassing yourself if you don't. It's one thing to not want to celebrate Halloween, but it is completely another thing to try to get into a Halloween party without a costume.

Spending that extra few minutes on your Halloween costume can pay dividends for you. Say you are a tag-along to a party your friend's friend is throwing. You don't really know the people who are having the party, but you feel like you have a really creative costume.

You may feel awkward at first, but before you know it, people will be introducing themselves to you and asking you interesting questions like, "How did you get that laundry basket to stay on your waist like that?" Because of your costume, you just made a new friend.

Now, let's assume you loosen up a bit and decide to play a game of Beirut (or Beer Pong, whatever you prefer). Your new friend invites you to be his or her partner in the next game, so you walk up to the table. Across the table from you is the team that just won four games in a row.

Do you think they are going to be intimidated or distracted by you if you are dressed like a football player who doesn't even have pads to go with their jersey? I don't think so. They would definitely be thrown off their game if they looked across the table at a slice of cheese or a shower (trust me, I saw it in "Karate Kid").

It bugs me when people show up to the party sans costume and then claim they are a coat or a sweatshirt. Why do you even bother to show up?

Since Halloween is on a Tuesday this year, I know this Friday and Saturday are going to be the prime nights of celebration. There are certain to be keg parties and beer bottles filled with pumpkin-flavored ale. Here is my guide to having a fun Halloween weekend:

Try to avoid costumes that have a high probability for ripping (see: mummy or anything involving aluminum foil). Nothing puts more of a damper on your Halloween than your costume ripping.

If you do have the misfortune of your costume ripping on you, make sure you are dressed warm underneath. Not only would you be looked at by every passer-by, but walking back to your dorm in your underwear wouldn't be too comfortable. We're not in 80 degree temperatures anymore Todo.

Also, don't dress up like one of your professors. Only a few people will understand who you are, and that just isn't fun. That was funny in high school, when your peers actually understood the joke. If you decide to dress up as someone else, make it a TV character or someone who people will actually recognize.

If your outfit requires props, use them. What's the Grim Reaper without his sickle? What's a pimp without his ladies or his cane? What's a nurse without her stethoscope? What's a laundry basket without the clothes? You get the picture?

Now, pay attention. This next idea is very important: whatever you do, do not try to get the phone number of someone who is wearing colored face paint. They might look cute in their costume, but who knows what he/she looks like when the paint comes off?

Finally, if you don't have the money to buy a fancy costume, use trash bags. You can make anything with those. Tape empty food boxes to the outside. Now, you're trash. Tape white dots to the bag, and you are a die. Make holes for your feet and arms, stuff it with empty bottles, old issues of the Collegian and cans. Suddenly, you're a recycling bin.

The possibilities are endless. Pretty soon everyone will be using trash bags for their costumes. I know I will this weekend.

This Halloween, I hope you all enjoy yourself. Just avoid mysterious figures wearing a hockey mask and carrying a big knife.

Seal of disapproval

BY GREGORY KLECIAK

Gregory Kleciak

I've been hearing through the grapevine the Native American students are holding a rally about changing one of our most beloved symbols here at UMass: the Native American gentleman on the UMass seal. They've been lobbying, for whatever reason to have their culture alienated from this campus for a long time now.

First, they wanted to take down the statue, which was not that big a deal since it's easy to ignore a 15 foot high statue of a guy holding a spear, but this seal goes on so many pieces of UMass merchandise, UMass signs and on almost all official UMass documents; it's going to be very noticeable.

I'm not exactly sure what their complaint is. It can't be exploitation of culture, as we all know Native Americans have been a part of Amherst culture ever since Jeffrey Amherst basically killed them off in the 1760s. But whatever the reason the Native American students are right, we do need to change the symbol on the seal. They, however, want to change it for the wrong reasons.

The first reason we need to change him is because of how outmoded it is. The stereotypical Native American with a headdress has been a symbol of their people ever since the white man took their land and used them for anti-pollution advertisements. But let's be real now, we see people parading down the streets in colonial age militia gear all the time, but when was the last time you saw a guy in a hat made of feathers walking down the street? I see people playing buckets for money more than I see that.

Secondly, our current figure brings to mind images of violence and horror. Not only were they known for murdering dozens, if not tens of dozens, of innocent buffalo, rumors are going around they used to scalp people. On a campus as Liberal and anti-violent as we are, do we really want the murders of virtually hundreds of people and animals on our detractor's minds as they view our seal?

The point I just made even overlooks the tremendous amount of violence the Native Americans bring to mind when Jeffrey Amherst slaughtered so many of them, which segues into point three.

By changing the symbol we can take the country's focus off what a disgrace we are.

A change of symbol will help modify our image for the better. UMass is a very liberal campus. After our fiasco with presidential candidate John Kerry we need a change for the better.

He made the term liberal synonymous with "flip-flopper," "mind-changer," "Indian-giver" and other worse terms. And since its inception, the people of Amherst have done nothing but prove Kerry right.

Jeffrey Amherst killed approximately a zillion Native Americans, and he was loved enough for it to get a whole town named after him. Now only a few centuries later we condemn his acts as cruel, inhumane and disgusting: what a surprise. Liberal minded flip-floppers change their minds on another issue: way to make us look good. By changing the symbol we can take the country's focus off what a disgrace we are.

The final, and most important reason we need to change our precious Native American symbol is due to his, and I say with all do respect to our Native American students, commonality. This guy is a popular symbol, just ask the Kansas City Chiefs, the Cleveland Indians and, the most successful of the group, the Florida State Seminoles. It seems like every team is using the effigy of the proud Native chief as their calling card.

Luckily, I have the perfect solution to this problem. Instead of using the proud, traditional and commonplace Native American chieftain as our symbol, we should use the grim visage of Al Pacino from "Scarface;" Think of the numerous benefits.

Pacino is a symbol the kids can relate to nowadays. This generation absolutely loves "Scarface" for some reason; this is easily proved by all the Scarface posters and glasses, special-edition, high-definition, ultra-director's-cut DVDs and even "Scarface" incense. Plus, it completely cuts out any of the racism found in the Native American symbol, though such nonsense could only be found if one dug really deep. And it replaced it with the very P.C. idea of the Cuban drug dealer.

Now before you say anything about that also being a "stereotype," think about it. We need to have a symbol who may somewhat generalize other cultures. The most successful symbols do. Just ask the Washington Redskins, the Laval Chiefs or the guy on the "Lucky Charms" box.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NOT IN DEPTH ENOUGH

In response to Emily Reynold's article "Psychedelic UMASS," I found a number of statements questionable and misleading. First, the author lumps drugs as radically different as LSD (a hallucinogen), valium (a depressant) and cocaine (a stimulant) under the same overarching category of "recreational drugs," but this is a shallow and ineffective description.

LSD, for example, can be used for a plethora of different reasons besides "recreational use" (including spiritual exploration, for example). However, all drugs are used in different ways by different people, as evidenced by the sheer magnitude of users on campus.

Saying "the use of drugs leads to..." and then oversimplifying/ genaralizing all drugs into one lump category with a list of vagueiy worded side effects is ineffactive and misleading. The writer would do well to explora individual drugs, their unique pros and cons and perhaps tle that to why college students use these individual substances.

I also found it interesting that the title of the article was "Psychedelic UMass," while you neglect to mention or discuss actual hallucinogens (besides a very brief mention of LSD, with no accompanying description). This is a shame because there is in fact an active psychedelic subculture (at UMass especially), and it would have been interesting to explore this.

However, kudos for including the CRC's reform efforts, as this countered nicely the mainly anti-drug nature of the rest of the article. The issue of cops patrolling the dorms has been an especially pressing one lately, with the CRC leading the opposition (they were slated to meet with Gargano on the issue on Monday, but were subsequently ignorad and placated).

Overall, the topic of the article is a noble one, with some valuable statistics and resources. However, when nearly 50 percent of students (in some residential areas) are using drugs, it deserved a more in depth look at the reasons behind such use and the true risks and benefits associated with them.

FOCUS MORE ON ALCOHOL

When I first saw the picture for "Psychedelic UMass" I was appalled. This article seems to indicate that heroine is a common campus drug that is closely associated with marijuana. I have close ties to the campus drug community, and I have never once seen cocaine on campus, and in all my time here I have only heard rumors about one person using heroine.

This article makes the assertion that ma ijuana is the most prevalent drug on campus; however, It seems to me as if the article overlooked alcohol. I have never found a bag of pot on the ground; I wish Sarah Froberg had called me when she found her bag.

Drinking has always been a more widespread activity on campus, and with it comes much more substantial risks than marijuana use does. Drinking poses the very real threat of causing major health problems immediately and down the line. It has been proven to be addictive, and has led to numerous deaths and injuries due to impaired judgment. Furthermore, it is illegal for the majority of UMass students who are under 21.

It is impossible to become violently ill from marijuana, there has never been a single death caused by it, it has been proven to not be addictive and the vast majorities of emergency room visits were not the result of marijuana, but for other reasons involving people that implied connection between pot use and cocaine and heroine.

Scientific studies have concluded that the notions of marijuana being a "gateway drug" are simply not true. Most marijuana smokers are aware of the enormous health risks associated with those drugs and make a point to stay away from them; they are simply not prevalent on campus.

The vast majority of pot smokers at UMass want nothing more than to enjoy their drug without getting arrested. I agree with the Cannabis Reform Coalition, the school needs to expend less energy arresting small time users who pose no threat to themselves or others and, should instead, focus on more substantial threats to public safety, like drunk driving.

Halloween '06 preview

UMass presents many options all over campus for students to partake in this weekend. Other colleges such as Hampshire College are having events of their own this weekend as well. Hampshire Halloween is an annual concert with a costume contest.

By Ally Welch

As one of the most popular holidays on college campuses, Halloween has finally made its way around the cold bend of October. This Tuesday night's festivities will allow students to put down the books and get out of the dorm room because this is a school night for costumes, candy and just plain partying.

With a large population and variety of residential areas, UMass provides no problem in finding something to do for Halloween. If you don't have access to a car or don't feel like waiting for a crowded bus to take you somewhere, there are plenty of things going on right here on campus.

The Southwest area will be having a Halloween dance sponsored by House Council in the courtyard near Melville and Thoreau dorms if weather permits. The dance features a contest with a prize for best costume. This is a great opportunity to get dressed up with a bunch of friends to show off your costume and mingle with other students. If you don't live near Southwest, the lower Central area near Brett and Brooks is holding a Halloween Harvest Festival, including candy apples and pumpkin carving. This provides something a little more low key and still appropriate for the holiday.

If you're over 21 and don't feel like being overwhelmed with crowds on campus, The Pub is hosting a Halloween party, so bring a bunch of friends in costume and grab a drink for your Halloween.

If you want to party for Halloween, but can't make time for it on Tuesday night, Orchard Hill Area Government is having a dance in Orchard Hill's bowl. It is a Halloween themed dance that will run from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. this Saturday. The dance will provide a tent with a DJ, a 50/50 raffle, and a prize for the best costume.

Also, if you want to visit another campus for the weekend, gather a group and go to Hampshire College, where "Hampshire Halloween" takes place outside with holiday festivities and a bunch of bands.

The Dining Commons will also be partaking in the Halloween festivities with their annual Pumpkin Painting contest located in each DC. If you've got a UMass meal plan then you are eligible to win a gift card for up to 100 dollars. The top four pumpkins will receive a prize.

The one thing students have in common around the Halloween holiday is what costume to wear and how to have the best one. After asking several residents what the big costume were for the year, it seems that UMass will still maintain their creative costume shown by students over the years. Some of the more outlandish costumes to be expected are the crazy lumberjack Napolean Dynamite, The "Lanta" girls, a ball and chain, William Shatner and old school WWF wrestlers. More common costumes for the year are the cowgirl, as well as the cowboy, angels, devils, famous athletes and many groups this year will be playing The Village People.

30 Seconds to Mars to play in Boston

By Jeremy Fowler

When we hear the name Jared Leto, roles from numerous motion pictures he has been in spring to mind. From the indie movie "Requiem For A Dream," to high budget epics like "Alexander," Leto is one of those actors that seems to pop up everywhere. However, there is one role many are unaware Leto is conquering. That role is the alternative rock scene. With his band 30 Seconds to Mars, Leto is garnering so much acclaim and support from an incredibly loyal and feverish fan base that some have even taken the name "The Echelon" after one of Mars' songs.

30 Seconds to Mars came onto the music scene in 2002 with the release of their self-titled debut. Lyrically, the album is very futuristic. There are many references made to outer space. An example of this is the song "Fallen," which starts with the lyrics "Yeah I've been to Jupiter, and I've fallen through the air."

One can name several bands with a song called "The Last Song" (Theory of a Deadman and the Foo Fighters are just two that come to mind), but how many bands have songs called "Echelon," "Oblivion" or "Buddha for Mary"? These are just three tracks off the album that leave the listener with a feeling of curiosity and enlightenment.

Three years ago the lineup consisted of only Jared and his brother Shannon. With only two members, Leto had to take on the responsibilities of most of the instruments played on the album, with Shannon playing drums. Every other instrument from bass to synthesizer to guitar(s) was played by Leto.

Leto even did the arrangement for the album. For touring they hired two guitarists Kevin Drake and Solon Bixler, along with bassist Matt Wachter who helped out on the first album to take some of the pressure off of Leto. After conflicts in the touring schedule, Drake and Bixler left the band, leaving Mars hovering in hiatus. However, Leto's his brother and Wachter quickly found a more than suitable replacement in guitarist Tomo Milicevic, who joined the trio before recording the 2005 smash hit "A Beautiful Lie."

This album is pushing its second hit Mars from Jared Leto's mouth as its third rock single. The first two Leto's goal from the beginning: releasing an album consistent to use his name while marketing the band to audiences Leto makes everything in the band equal and does

Jared Leto, who has been in movies such as "Requiem for a Dream" and "Alexander" created the band 30 Seconds to Mars back in 2002. The band has released two albums to date and is slowly making a name for themselves on the alternative music scene.

As the air gets colder, fashions get warmer

Fashion

Krista Cosco

Take a look around. What are your peers wearing? What are fall's hottest fashions and do they transcend onto our campus? Some may see certain trends while glancing at your fellow students – others may say individual style is much more prevalent.

So, what is in and do we care? Walking to class, waiting for the bus, journeying to DC, one may see hundreds of students filing through campus. It appears that flip flops have been replaced by Uggs and tank tops have been replaced by sweaters. Fall is here and the weather certainly has changed the clothes we wear.

The cold weather brings obvious change to the attire of any individual. One trend that is common among many girls on campus, is winter boot. Whether they are the famous Uggs or traditional leather, boots can be seen everywhere throughout campus. The Australian-made Uggs, marketed famous by celebrities such as Britney Spears and Cameron Diaz, have been well known to grace this campus. Uggs are often seen with jeans tucked into them, with sweatpants, or even with a mini-skirt. Uggs or any kind of warm, furry boot, are everywhere. Another option for girls is the more traditional leather boot that may come out on the weekend for a dressier look. In the winter, boots with heals, flats, knee-highs, or ankle-highs are the trends that will always be practical and fashionable.

Just when you thought the '80s were over, they're back. Leggings cover the naked leg of summer and bangle bracelets adorn the tan-fading wrists of girls. The leggings have become a very versatile look over the past few seasons. They are worn under skirts or long dress-like shirts. Now that fall is here, leggings are being worn under long sweaters in many different colors and in many different ways. Big earrings and bright colors always liven up the dulling attire of the oncoming winter season. Headbands are essential for a bad hair day and ripped jeans are seen all around campus. Belts now buckle around the waist not the hips, and before you know it girls will be wearing their ponytails to the side again.

Let's not forget about the guys. They are wearing the typical attire of a college male, which includes sweatshirts, jeans and tee-shirts. On weekends, a polo shirt may get pulled out of the closet to dress their look up a bit. Guys do not have to stress about what to wear or what is in. They just throw on a pair of jeans, a UMass sweatshirt and a Red Sox hat and are ready to go. They don't worry about matching, doing their hair or putting on makeup. A guy's style is much more relaxed and easier to maintain than most girls' style.

Pressure is often put on girls to look their best. This may include the way they dress, do their makeup or style their hair. Many girls feel unable to leave the house in the morning without eyeliner or a cute outfit. Girls are often pressured to look pretty to get the guy or even at times, to get the job. The stress on what people look like has played a major role in almost every college around the country, including our own. Do we fit a certain criteria? Are we "in" with the new trends and do we respond to the fashions around us?

Style and trends, however, seem to be much more individualistic among college students. Seeing the diversity at UMass, one can recognize that there will be diversity among dress. Many do not care what fashion magazines say or care if they are following trends. Some dress according to their religion. Others simply follow their friends. No matter what the case, the clothes you wear define you in some way. If you're wearing a band's tee-shirt, or a college sweatshirt, you're being more self-expository than if you were wearing jeans and a plain tee-shirt. Whether you know it or not, what you put on gives people a sense of who you are.

Fashion has long been a status symbol or a way for people to show what "group" they are in. Stereotypes have long been upheld by the fashions of the groups. The punk-rockers, the jocks, and the preps have all had their own sense of what style is. Looking around this campus, people will see exactly how assorted it is, just by observing the clothes of our peers.

Author explains own personal heaven

By James D. Davis

Neale Donald Walsch has 22 books full of insights from the Almighty, even proclaiming, in one title, "What God Wants."

But don't listen to his God, he insists. Listen to yours.

"God is not what someone has told you," says Walsch, author of the incredibly popular "Conversations with God" books, at a recent publicity stop in Fort Lauderdale. "God is as God is experienced by you."

Walsch wants nothing less than an exodus from formal religion. In his promised land, you won't go to a house of worship for your religion. You'll simply talk to yourself which, he says, is already part of God.

"We want to free humanity from the oppression of beliefs in a violent, angry, vindictive God," he says.

"We want people to embrace their experience, not the God of their forefathers."

With one or two exceptions, that is. He'd like you to see his filmed story of how he learned to hear God, which premieres nationally on Friday. It's the first big production of Simon's Spiritual Cinema Circle, a kind of film club with mailed DVDs.

Half the film, in fact, deals with the poverty Walsch suffered after a car crash broke his neck in Oregon. "What does it take to make life work?" he wrote on a yellow legal pad, and was surprised to hear an answer from a disembodied voice. He began asking questions and recording the answers.

Walsch has founded a chain of centers that he calls Humanity's Team.

Among the activities, Walsch says, are weekly "Celebrations of Life," when members can gather to "fellowship." The teams have 10,000 members in 65 countries, Walsch says.

not use his movie fame as free publicity. The first single off the album, "Attack" was a major success for its signature opening and Leto's distinctive scream. The second single, which is more successful than the first is turning heads on MTV and radio station's nation wide. "The Kill" has become an instant success with a innovative video and chilling lyrics. It won the MTV2 award for video of the year at the 2006 MTV Video Music Awards. They have also received major articles in Alternative Press magazine, as well as several interviews on Fuse and MTV1.

Now Leto and company are on the road again (after only a brief break) for MTV's $2 bill "Welcome to the Universe" tour. However, this is not your average heavy polluting cross country bus tour. Since environmentally-friendly fuel is a priority for the band, all of the buses will run on bio-diesel. They will be supported by Head Automatica, Cobra Starship, the Pink Spiders and more. They will be playing at the Avalon Ballroom in Boston and Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel in Providence on Oct. 28 and 29 respectively.

Black showcases solo material

By Les Riehl
The Massive Cat

Frank Black is all-too aware of the objections to double albums, including the chief one that most every one of them could easily be edited to a single, higher-quality disc. But he isn't buying any of it.

"The two greatest blueprints for me are The Beatles' 'White Album' and (Dylan's) 'Blonde on Blonde,'" says the 41-year-old alt-rock singer-songwriter-guitarist, whose new release, "Fast Man Raider Man," is a two-disc release, the second of his career (his first was 1994's acclaimed "Teenager of the Year"). "So I'm the wrong guy to challenge on the question of single versus double albums."

Black, speaking from his tour bus, which is barreling through North Carolina, adds, "I not only admire (Elton John's) 'Goodbye Yellow Brick Road' and (The Clash's) 'London Calling,' but (George Harrison's) 'All Things Must Pass' and (The Clash's) 'Sandinista!,' which would have made great double albums, although I would defend them as triple albums.

"It's perfectly fine to have silly blues jams (as on 'All Things Must Pass') or a disc of reggae goofing around ('Sandinista!'). I don't mind skipping over them, or playing them once in a while."

The erstwhile frontman for the Pixies (the influential alt-rock band Black formed in the late 1980s, is back on the road after having spent the last several months playing solo as opening act for the Foo Fighters. This time, backed by drummer Billy Black, guitarist Duane Jarvis and bassist Eric Drew Feldman, he is headlining an eight-week tour.

In building their 90-minute sets, Black says he and the band work from a core repertoire of 20 to 25 songs. One that always gets played is "I'm Not Dead (I'm in Pittsburgh)," a rollicking alt-country survival tune that is the celebrated of "Fast Man Raider Man"s' 27 roots-heavy tracks.

Given actress Sienna Miller's recent dustup over an unflattering remark she may or may not have made after being refused entrance to a Steel City bar without an ID, has Black had any feedback about his song?

"Folks seem to like it there," Black replies. "Why? Because it has a certain 'ne ne says quoi'" he adds, tongue in cheek. "Reid Paley, who co-wrote the song with me, has a lot of professional roots in Pittsburgh and I do as well with the Pixies. It was one of our first shows."

Along with two vintage "Teenager" tracks ("Headache" and "Calistan," Black is also including a new song, "Dead Man's Curve," in his shows. "We just played it in Houston," he says. "The subject matter is open to interpretation, but it's a kind of loud, soulful number. We try to channel Eric Burdon and the Animals when we do it."

What people won't hear, Black volunteers, are Pixies songs, "unless I perform acoustic before the band comes on. When I do, I play 'Wave of Mutilation' and 'Cactus' and try to re-interpret them, breaking down the melodies and being more free with them."

Though Black is friendly enough, he shies away from talking songwriting specifics. Asked about certain beguiling lines in "You Can't Crucify Yourself," "Fast Man," "Raider Man" and "In the Time of My Ruin," he is pleased at the inquiries but demurs with, "There's a riddle in most of my songs."

Later, he says, "I'll let you in on a little trade secret. Part of that (songwriting) process is sitting around thinking 'moon,' 'dune,' 'spoons.' You may ask, 'What about that poignant, spiritual moving thing you were doing?' Yeah, we'll get back to that. Now what rhymes with moon?"

Black finally allows that the alcoholic in "Fitzgerald" is a real person. "I was glad to find out he was still alive. He's an old customer at the family bar, The Quarterdeck Lounge in Hyannis, Mass.

"My brother has a fair amount of Frank Black fans who make the pilgrimage there."

Peanuts classic turns 40 today

By Jim Beckerman
The Record (Hackensack, N.J.)

You'd think that selling "It's the Great Pumpkin, Charlie Brown" to CBS back in 1966 would have been as easy as selling ... well, pumpkins on Halloween. Or Charlie Brown at any time.

Not so, animator Bill Melendez recalls.

"We didn't know whether the network would buy it," Melendez says. "I'd always have to do a sales pitch. And I can really do a pitch. They used to say, 'Come on, Bill, do a dance for The Man.'"

And this was after "A Charlie Brown Christmas" had been a huge, Peabody- and Emmy-winning hit in 1965, and after the "Peanuts" comic strip mania was well under way.

Friday will mark the 40th anniversary of the TV special, which has now become, for some, as much of a Halloween tradition as candy corn and soaped windows.

It will be shown at 8 p.m. EDT Friday on ABC, in tandem with "You're Not Elected, Charlie Brown," a later "Peanuts" special with a "Great Pumpkin" subplot.

"We translated the Christmas idea to the pumpkin patch," says Melendez, who had little idea he was creating a small but much-loved new piece of Americana with his yarn of the eternally optimistic Linus, who forgoes trick or treating to spend his night in the pumpkin patch waiting for the Great Pumpkin to arise and bring toys to all the good little children of the world.

Never mind that the other kids laugh at him. Never mind that Linus, otherwise the egghead of the Peanuts bunch, would seem to have rather obviously confused Christmas and Halloween.

Commentators, the kind of people who write books like "The Gospel According to Peanuts," have seen in Linus a symbol of faith, which endures even in the face of doubts and sneers. (Or, alternately, a symbol of religious delusion persisting in spite of the efforts of sensible people to talk the sucker out of it.)

"We threw everything (into) it," Melendez says.

And viewers responded. To this day, every gardener who discovers an oversize gourd in October feels it a civic duty to phone the local newspaper to report that the Great Pumpkin has arrived in his back yard.

"Believe it or not, that's Charlie Brown, above, happily perched inside our version of the Great Pumpkin (a 125-pound North-ville-grown giant)," reads one newspaper caption below a photograph of a toddler peeping out of a giant jack-o'-lantern, reprinted in the book Charlie Brown & Charlie Schulz."

More recently, and more cynically, an episode of the quirky animated cable TV series "Robot Chicken" featured a Great Pumpkin summoned by black magic, who kills off all of the "Peanuts" kids except Charlie Brown, before being destroyed by the Kite-Eating Tree.

This year, in honor of the 40th anniversary, there has been a cornucopia of Great Pumpkin-related merchandise, including an "It's the Great Pumpkin, Charlie Brown" domino set from Sababa Toys, a 500-piece "Great Pumpkin" jigsaw puzzle from USAopoly and a 40th anniversary coffee table book about the making of "Great Pumpkin" from HarperCollins.

"I didn't know at the time that this was going to be anything vital," says Melendez, 90.

Originally from Sonora, Mexico, south of Arizona, Melendez had already been in the animation business for years working for such giants as Disney, Warner Bros and UPA when Charlie Brown and fortune came knocking.

Creators of the legendary TV movie hired children to do the voices of the characters to create a more authentic feel to the movie.

By the early 1960s, he had set up his own fledgling animation studio, where among other things he made several Ford TV spots using animated "Peanuts" characters.

In 1965, Coca-Cola approached the late "Peanuts" cartoonist Charles M. Schulz and independent movie producer Lee Mendelson about doing a "Peanuts" Christmas TV special. Mendelson and Schulz got Melendez onboard, and they proceeded to create a 30-minute show that turned all the rules upside-down.

Instead of professional adult actors, they recorded kid voices. Instead of brassy humor, they kept the warm, whimsical tone of the original comic strip. Instead of standard "cartoony" music, they used jazz.

"I was at that time doing a lot of work out of San Francisco," Melendez recalls. "That's where I met Vince Guaraldi. He was a very popular musician in the Bay area. You could go into a bar where he would be playing piano. I said, 'We gotta use him.'"

"Linus and Lucy" and the other tunes Guaraldi wrote for the "Peanuts" specials have since become classic. But when Melendez and his colleagues first screened "A Charlie Brown Christmas" for CBS executives, they weren't having any of it.

"Too slow ... the kids don't sound pro ... the music is all wrong ... the story kind of wanders" are some of the comments Mendelson recalled hearing from the CBS brass.

"They questioned it for a simple reason: they wanted something that would be guaranteed to succeed," Melendez says.

They needn't have worried. "A Charlie Brown Christmas" was such a hit that the network went ahead with plans for other "Charlie Brown" specials. Of the six earliest ones, only "Christmas" and "Great Pumpkin" are regularly revived probably because unlike, say, "He's Your Dog, Charlie Brown," they revolve around holidays.

"If it was tied up to Happy Dog Day, that would be something," Melendez says. "But that show and the others don't have a strong link up to anything. We don't have any means or chance to expose them."

By now, Melendez has done fifty Charlie Brown specials, and four Charlie Brown feature-length movies. And he's ready to do more.

"Even if he has to dance, once again, for The Man."

"I can now, we always go job to job," he says. "I have things, stories, and I'd sure like to do some more. But it depends. First, I have to get a network to agree with the idea."

Cats no match for Mass Attack

sent a screaming one-timer into the back of the net.

Mike Radja controlled the puck behind net looking for a play. He wrapped around the net, right to left, and slid the puck out front. In the blink of an eye the puck was off Micflikier's stick and rolling around the back of the net, 1-0 Wildcats.

But UMass didn't stay down for long. Just five minutes later, it came down the ice and tied the game on Mark Matheson's first goal of the season, and first since Feb. 24. The assist on the goal, at 18:48, went to freshman forward Will Ortiz.

Ortiz put a nifty move on the UNH defender and broke away just inside the blue line. Regan deflected Ortiz's shot directly out front to Matheson. The goalie remained frozen on the right side of the net, and Matheson shifted it to the left – easily putting it in the net.

"It surprised everybody in the building, maybe even Will," said Cahoon of Ortiz's toe drag. "The best part of his move was the ability to get the shot off. Getting that goal back and getting to start over again with everything level was probably as big a play in the game as the winning goal."

UNH had the slight advantage in the third, but couldn't get the tying goal past Quick. The Wildcats put the pressure on the young goalie once again, but this time he stood up to the test.

Quick and the Minutemen found themselves on the short end of a Wildcats' power play to begin the period, and yet another shortly after the first infraction expired.

Kevin Jarman gave the Mass Attack an insurance goal late in the third period which sent the fans looking for the nearest exit.

On the power play, junior P.J. Fenton controlled the puck at the right face off circle before feeding freshman Justin Braun. He got the puck and ripped off a slap shot, which Jarman tipped by Regan.

The Wildcats added a goal to bring game within a goal with 24 seconds remaining, but were unable to tie the score with Regan pulled and the extra attacker on the ice.

Defenseman David Leaderer tallied two assists last season while playing in all 36 games.

Weekend will determine postseason fate

said. "We know what we have to do. You can't worry about the name on the shirt. You've got to realize that it's just a name; it's just another set of uniforms. Once we get by that, we'll be fine."

UMass is the A-10's top defensive team, and it will face two of the top-scoring teams in what should be an excellent pair of games. Duquesne, in particular, is leading the A-10 with 86 points in 14 games. They are tied for second in goals with 24.

"Duquesne is the highest scoring team [in the A-10], well we've got the goalie who has the most shutouts, so I think it's a good matchup," Koch said.

UMass leads the conference in every defensive category. The Minutemen are tops in goals allowed (13 in 16 games), goals-against average (0.78), saves (75), and shutouts (10).

"The first 15 minutes of the game is key," Koch said. "We've got to make sure we're settled down and stick to the game plan. If we do that, I think we'll get a good result."

"The midfielders have got to make sure that they keep the shape. Our backs have to make sure that we're covering for each other, and we're putting good pressure on them right away. It all comes down to communication and discipline."

With such a tough pair of games to close out the regular season, Koch and the Minutemen are glad to be playing at home, where, since the construction of Rudd Field in 2002, the team has a winning record. The Maroon and White is 5-2-1 this season at home, and are 27-13-5 all-time at Rudd Field, including a 13-4-5 A-10 record.

"I think we're much more comfortable playing at home," Koch said. "You don't have to worry about traveling. You don't have to worry about the extra things you've got to take care of when you're on the road. It's nice to be able to wake up, roll out of bed, come down here, and play."

While the defense for UMass has been stout all season, the offense is just beginning to pick up. The Minutemen are next to last in the conference with just 12 goals, but three of those goals have come in the last two games.

One of the biggest factors for the offensive boost has been the improved play of sophomore Prince Ofosu late in the season. He has scored a goal in the last two games for the Minutemen. His only other goal in 2006 came in the season opener – a 2-0 victory over Maine.

"I think Prince is playing better," Koch said. "He's putting the ball on target. He's making good contact with the ball. We've been creating chances, and I think we've used up all our misses. The law of averages says we can't miss anymore, so they're going in now."

UMass is currently tied for ninth place in the A-10. They have seven points along with La Salle. To earn a playoff berth, The Minutemen must reach sixth place by the end of this weekend.

Xavier, with 10 points, is currently sixth. Fordham and George Washington are tied at seventh with eight points.

In order for the Minutemen to extend their season, they must earn at least four points this weekend, via a win and a tie. They would also need Xavier to lose both its games and Fordham to do no better than tie both of its final games.

If UMass earns two wins, the road becomes easier. Xavier could earn two ties and Fordham could win and tie, and the Minutemen would still reach the postseason.

La Salle and George Washington have just one game remaining on their schedules – against each other. Only GWU could still reach the playoffs with a win, but it would need everyone else to lose all their games, so it is very unlikely.

It's a long shot, but the Minutemen are still alive. And that's enough for Koch.

"It's a great challenge," said Koch. "We play better against the better teams. This is a tough challenge so we'll see what happens."

"Have we accomplished what we think we can, and have we been able to learn everything and put it together for 90 minutes? That's what we'll find out on Friday."

Matheson steps up physical play in upset

UMass coach Don Cahoon. "He quarterbacks our power play and then he does a great job up front."

After scoring his first goal against Army on Dec. 30, Matheson scored in back-to-back games on Feb. 18 and 24 against Vermont and Northeastern. Now, just three games into the season, Matheson has tallied two points on a goal and an assist.

Matheson made the transition forward a few months into the 2005-06 season. But entering this year, Cahoon was unsure of just where Matheson would spend most of his minutes.

"I knew I was going to have him on the ice," Cahoon said. "Then we just tried to fit him in as the preseason unfolded."

Matheson has now played a considerable amount of time at both positions. At this point, however, he hasn't decided which spot on the ice is his favorite.

"I kind of like where I am right now because I can play defense on the power play," Matheson said. "It's tough to say. On defense you get to control the puck, but right now I like where I am, playing a little bit of both."

Wherever Matheson ends up this year, he will be one of the key players on this Minuteman squad.

"I'm real pleased to have Mark," said Cahoon. "I use him in a lot of different situations. He's clearly one of the more valuable players on our team."

Must-win situation for Minutewomen

W. SOCCER from page 10

"We will have to defend very well, which is something we did not do against Rhode Island," he said. "This team has a lot of talent but we need to come up with a win. We're going to have to stop their offensive attack to do it. They will come right at us and we'll have to defend with numbers and come back on the counter and go forward with numbers of our own."

It's not just the offense of Saint Louis that has Rudy's attention.

"They have an All-American midfielder in Courtney Hulcer," he said. "They are skillful, athletic, deep, and haven't lost at home all season."

On Sunday the Minutewomen travel to Pittsburgh, Pa. with their playoff hopes hanging in the balance to play the Duquesne Dukes.

Although Duquesne (4-8-2, 3-3-1 A-10) finds themselves beneath UMass and eighth in the conference standings, Rudy refuses to overlook the Dukes.

"They've had uneven results, but they're also very dangerous at home," he said. "As a team they are on the opposite side, and they beat Dayton, which indicates what clino they're in. They have two great players in [forwards] Audra Mathews and Faye Rasmussen and are a good, balanced team."

UMass holds the upper hand between the two schools, winning seven of the 10 meetings, including a 3-0 victory a year ago. Rudy will need this trend to continue if he hopes to coach in the playoffs.

"This will be a big game and a big bump to get over," he said. "They play really well on field turf and it's tough to beat them there."

Both games loom large for the Minutewomen this weekend, but a loss on Friday may turn the game against Duquesne into a meaningless one. The Maroon and White need Sunday's game to matter. After all, Rudy isn't looking to go shopping after Friday's game.

Minutewomen one win away from Atlantic 10 Tournament

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

The scenario couldn't be any simpler for the Massachusetts field hockey team when it hosts the Rhode Island Rams (7-8, 3-3 Atlantic 10) at Garber Field in its final regular season game this Saturday on Senior Day.

If the Minutewomen come away with a win Saturday, they clinch a spot in the A-10 Tournament for 17th time in the last 18 years. A loss for the eighth time at home this season means UMass will be watching Rhode Island in the A-10 Tournament online via Gametracker.

UMass (6-13, 3-3 A-10) has fared well against its conference rivals this year, most recently winning two games in Philadelphia last weekend against West Chester and La Salle in the only way the Maroon and White know how to win: the come-from-behind, edge of your seat fashion.

When UMass came home Wednesday to face the New Hampshire Wildcats it looked as if the non-conference meeting would award the Minutewomen a chance to build on the momentum of a two-game winning streak against a team riding a ten-game losing streak.

Not so fast.

The Minutewomen allowed a one-win Wildcats team to walk all over them in a 4-1 loss.

"I thought the UNH game was going to really tell us about the character of the team," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "It's easy to come back in that La Salle game, your back is up against the wall and you want to go to the A-10 Tournament."

In what has been a season characterized first and foremost by inconsistency, Shea doesn't need to be reminded her team has some old habits to kick before Saturday's season finale.

"A lot of the problems we've been having are our heads are down when receiving the ball and we don't know what to do with the ball when we get it," Shea said. "One of the biggest ones is just not moving off the ball and not thinking about what can happen next. Another big thing is there has been no communication. We need to not only communicate offensively, but defensively as well. When we sink into those habits we're not going to be successful."

Shea, however, has her team looking forward, knowing full-well the Minutewomen can't afford to glance in the rearview mirror at Wednesday's lethargic performance come Saturday.

"Rhode Island is a team that plays with a lot of emotion," Shea said. "It's the exact same situation as last year, we knocked them out on their home field last year so they're coming up here looking to do the exact same thing."

The Minutewomen solidified a spot in the A-10 Tournament in last year's final regular season game with a thrilling 2-1 win over the Rams.

The Rams are a steady 4-4 away from home this season and have proved to be a strong team in the A-10 this year. The Rams defeated a tough Temple Owls team 3-1 and limited the defending A-10 champion Richmond Spiders to just one goal in a 1-0 loss. The Spiders had been averaging 4.46 goals a contest.

"They're really strong in goal," Shea said. "We will see probably the strongest goalkeeper we've seen all year. She's done a great job for them all year. She saves the savable shots and that is what you want your goalkeeper to do."

Shea is referring to Rams goalkeeper M.J. Britt, who has played every minute this year for Rhode Island. Britt has allowed fewer than two goals per game, while allowing just 28 goals on 190 shots taken by opponents, good for a .794 save percentage.

On the offensive side, the Rams present multiple scoring threats. Rhode Island has five players with three or more goals this year, including two players with six goals, midfielders Jen Cetenich and Jill Powers.

UMass has taken the last eight games from Rhode Island, the last loss coming in 1998. The Minutewomen lead the all-time series 30-2-0 vs. the Rams.

The Minutewomen have posted a solid 3-3 record against conference foes this season but will not make an appearance in the postseason without a win over Rhode Island on Saturday.

Top-ranked SLU awaits UM

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team (10-8, 6-1 A-10) wraps up its regular season schedule with a game versus Duquesne (4-8-2, 3-3-1 A-10) on Sunday. Before they square off against the Dukes, however, the Minutewomen must match up against the A-10's defending champions in St. Louis (5-2, 9-4-2 A-10) tomorrow.

The Maroon and White still has a chip on its shoulder as a result of last year's rendezvous with the Missouri-based team.

After almost 70 minutes of scoreless play, Billikens' junior Courtney Hulcer took a corner kick that went to Caroline Sweeney who fired it past UMass goalkeeper Kristin Walker.

The Billikens, who finished with a record of 13-4 overall and 8-0 in the A-10, earned their first trip to the NCAA tournament with a 1-0 over Rhode Island on Nov. 6, 2005, and seem to be making similar progress this year.

They're undefeated at home (6-0-1) and have a fair share of players with the potential to overwhelm any adversary.

Junior forward Cassi Winchell has seven goals and two assists for a combined total of 16 points on the season.

"She's a pretty dynamic kid," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "She's had a good streak of scoring goals but she's got a good supporting cast to put the ball on her foot."

The cast of characters that makes up Winchell's team includes senior midfielder/forward Dee Guempel, freshman forward Kelly Waeckerle, senior midfielder/forward Maureen Hughes and freshman forward Julia Bradenberg.

Guempel (five goals, seven assists) and Waeckerle (seven assists, seven goals) are tied with 17 total points each.

Hughes is the team's runner-up in the total-points category with 18. She has six goals and six assists so far, including a pair of tallies in the 4-3 win over Saint Joseph's on Oct. 20 – the second two-goal game of her career.

Bradenberg is the St. Louis' points-leader. With her six goals and seven assists, she has recorded a sum of 19 points on the season.

But Rudy stressed that his players shouldn't focus on any particular person, but rather on the Billikens as a whole.

"I don't think any of them are the top-guns," Rudy commented. "Their strength is their team and it was last year, too. They had some good players in there, but I think their strength is definitely in the team, rather than just individuals and the fact that they're going to come at you from a lot of different directions."

Freshman goalkeeper Hannah Koesterer is no exception to the list of solid Saint Louis players.

She has started 13 of the Billikens' 15 games this year, while having amassed just over 1,183 minutes in net. During this tenure between the posts she has allowed 17 goals and 40 saves with a .702 saves percentage. She has also accumulated an 8-3-2 record, which includes three shutout games.

To assure a playoff spot UMass must beat the Billikens, and the Duquesne Dukes two days after, and Rudy hopes that is enough incentive to put some fire to his players' bellies.

"We're almost at a do-or-die situation," Rudy said. "We might very well be at that point and you just don't hold anything back. My point is that if we play anyone like we played UConn and BU and Yale, then we have a good chance to win. Less than that and it's up in the air."

"I think the atmosphere is going to be really great," senior co-captain Nadia Villarroel said. "It's [the seniors] last night game."

Villarroel and co-captain Stephanie Barrett won't except anything less than everything, and anticipate the same resilient effort they have seen all year.

Revenge on the mind for UMass

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Reprisal is on the mind of the swimmers, divers, and coaches of the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams, as they look to avenge last season's losses to Army.

The Maroon and White host the Black Knights in a dual meet tomorrow at the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. Pool in Boyden Gymnasium at 2 p.m.

Both squads are coming off dominating wins over Stony Brook last weekend. The two teams combined for 23 first-place finishes out of 32 events. The men (1-0) swam to a 185-112 victory, while the women (1-0) won 190-110.

However, Army should provide more of a challenge for both the men and women. Despite swimming in their own pool, the Minutemen lost to the Black Knights last November, 178.5-64.5.

UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth knows that last year's meet was not his team's best effort.

"We got beat last year—and the guys know, we just didn't show up to play," Yarworth said. "It was probably one of our weaker performances as a team."

It bodes well for the Minutemen that several swimmers enjoyed success in their events last weekend. Senior Evan Swisher and sophomore Nate Bromage won two races each.

Swisher took first place in both the 100- and 200-yard backstroke, while Bromage won the 200-yard freestyle and 100-yard butterfly.

But Yarworth and his players are certainly not taking Army lightly this time around.

"Army is a great team—they've got that Army training mentality and a new coach who has a good reputation."

The women, on the other hand, fared much better last year against Army. They lost by a minuscule three points, 123-120.

UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb hopes his team will be able to defeat the Black Knights this time around.

"We stack up differently [than last year] and I like the way we stack up," Newcomb said. "I think it's going to be a different meet, but just as close. Hopefully we will be ahead by three this time."

The Minutewomen had strong performances in almost every event last Saturday against Stony Brook. Newcomb expects his athletes to perform well in several key areas.

"I think the butterfly is always a good event for us," he said. "The backstroke will be a good event and the diving."

Senior Liz Lovejoy earned UMass Co-Athlete of the Week honors for her success against Stony Brook. She won three individual events, including the 200-yard butterfly, and both the 100- and 500-yard freestyle events. She also anchored the final leg of the Minutewomen's winning 400-yard relay team.

One of six seniors on the team, Lovejoy leads vocally and through her success in the water.

"The thing with Liz is that you never have to guess what's on her mind," Newcomb said. "I think that's a good quality for a leader – she'll come out and say what she's thinking and what's going on. She leads very much in the pool by example. She's very tough in workouts and [her teammates] see that and it raises the level of those around her."

Diving should be one of the strengths for both teams in tomorrow's meet. Against Stony Brook, junior R.J. Rappe and sophomore Karen Upperco won both the one- and three-meter dive events for the men and women, respectively.

Regardless of last weekend's success, both coaches know their swimmers and divers will have to be focused if they want to win tomorrow.

"One thing you know about West Point teams is that they are always ready to play," Yarworth said.

UM set to run away with A-10s

By Steve Games
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams will be in Pittsburgh, Pa., home of Duquesne University, this Saturday for the Atlantic 10 Championship race.

Fourteen teams from the Atlantic 10 are in the running for a title – Dayton, Duquesne, La Salle, Charlotte, Fordham, George Washington, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Richmond, St. Bonaventure, Saint Joseph's, Saint Louis, Temple and Xavier.

The 29th annual Men's Cross Country Championship will begin at 10:45 a.m. at Schenley Park's 8,000-meter course.

Last year, Duquesne won its first-ever A-10 Championship, defeating La Salle, which won the previous five years from 1999 to 2004. La Salle is the favorite to win the race. The A-10 preseason rankings placed La Salle at No. 1 and Duquesne at No. 2.

Last year, the Minutemen finished sixth overall at the A-10 Championships. The top returning runners from last years race are junior Nils Fischer, who finished 26th overall, sophomore Jesse Regnier, who placed 39th, and junior Ryan Durkin who finished 72nd.

The Minutemen have not won the A-10 Championship since 1995 (their only championship). The team looks to race right behind La Salle and Duquesne for third place.

"We picture ourselves in a dogfight for a position somewhere between third and sixth," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien. "In recent years there seemed to be four or five schools that are consistently fighting for the third place spot and on a good day we could get that and if they didn't run just a shade better than they're potential they could fall all the way down to sixth."

After the New England Championships, the elite runners did not race the following week in Albany and with no meets last week the men have had two weeks off.

"Two weeks at this time of the year is a really nice optimal amount of time for the kids to recover from some of the racing and the training through the months of September and October," said O'Brien. "It really is optimum to get a break for the best performance for this time of the year in the big meets."

The Minutemen have tried to simulate Schenley Park course in order to prepare for the Championships. The course features an uphill finish but the team prepared for the hills with intense workouts.

"The course is basically a strong uphill finish and it's the type of workout that you have to have some time to recover," O'Brien said. "Earlier this year on two occasions we tried to get a course workout that is designed to run over a course that's very similar to Schenley Park, we had both those efforts earlier in the season when we had breaks between meets."

O'Brien prepared his team for the A-10 Championships and now it is up to the runners to secure a victory.

"We did those workouts a couple weeks back and hopefully they will pay off," O'Brien said.

The 18th annual Women's Cross Country Championship will start at 10:00 a.m. the same day.

Last season, La Salle defended its title and made it four championships in five years. In the preseason rankings La Salle ranked No. 1 while Umass was picked to finish eighth.

At last year's A-10 Championship, the Minutewomen finished ninth overall. Junior Christina DeRosa led UMass with a 21st place finish, senior Cuisle Kierans and junior Amanda Bodette finished second and third for the team, respectively.

The Minutewomen have not won the A-10 Championship since 1999. The Minutewomen dominated the 90's with seven titles. They won five consecutive titles from 1995 to 1999. The seven victories are the most of any team in the 18-year history of the event.

Mass Attack stuns the Wildcats

UMass pulls off upset over No. 8 UNH

BY JON PELLAND

UMass	3
UNH	2

DURHAM, N.H. – The first upset of the Hockey East season is officially in the books. Last night the Massachusetts hockey team went up to Durham and stunned No. 8 New Hampshire, 3-2.

Though the game was the Wildcats' (2-1, 0-1 HEA) home opener, the win means that much more to UMass coach Don Cahoon.

"This was a big effort by our team early in the season, to be able to come into the [Whittemore Center] and be able to compete and win. It's only a start, but it's a good start," Cahoon said. "It's a terrific win in October, and you have to remember it is October."

Next up for UMass (2-0-1, 1-0 HEA) is a trip further north to take on top-ranked Maine Saturday night. The game at Alfond Arena is slated to begin at 7 p.m.

With the score tied and play even halfway through the second period, UMass took control of the game for good at the 14:20 mark. While pushing the puck up the ice, most of the Minutemen peeled off for a line change, except Chris Davis.

The sophomore fought through four UNH defenders before he got a shot off on goalie Kevin Regan. Davis mustered just a weak wrister with all the defenders bearing down on him. Apparently shielded by all the traffic in front of him, Regan didn't see the puck fluttering by his hip on the left side.

"I came in [the zone] and picked up the puck. It was almost like a one-on-four," Davis said. "I was just trying to get the puck on the net, so you could say I was surprised that I scored. I didn't get everything I wanted to on the puck, but I put it where I wanted."

As always, the Wildcats came out ready to play last night. With the Whittemore crowd of 6,501 in full force, UNH put the pressure on UMass goalie Jon Quick early. The Minutemen were put an early hole, having to play shorthanded early in the first period.

The Wildcats finally broke through at 13:23. After Quick stood up to a flurry of shots, Jacob Micflikier

Matheson steps up physical play

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

DURHAM, N.H. – Senior Mark Matheson has found himself a new niche on the Massachusetts hockey team – and so far, he has filled it nicely.

A former defenseman, Matheson scored his first goal of the year in the first period of Thursday's game against New Hampshire. Much like last season, Matheson, a natural defenseman, has been playing forward to compensate for the team's needs up front.

At 18:48 in the first, freshman Will Ortiz skated past a UNH defenseman and sent a laser from the top of the right circle. UNH goaltender Kevin Regan stopped the puck with his right pad, but Matheson collected the rebound and carried it across the crease.

"I was at the end of my shift, and I saw the opportunity to take the puck up," said Ortiz. "It was just instincts. I didn't think of anything. I tried to get the shot off for a rebound. The goalie had been kicking out rebounds all night. I took a shot, and we had a guy driving. That's how we practice them."

"I had just jumped on the ice, and Will Ortiz made a nice play to get around the guy," said Matheson. "I beat my guy to the net, and I knew I had the goalie sliding one way."

Regan appeared totally frozen as Matheson skated across from left to right and easily pushed the puck into the net, tying the game at 1-1. After UNH jumped out to the early 1-0 lead, the Minutemen were glad to have responded quickly.

"I was a little surprised at how badly [Regan] went the other way," Matheson said. "It was a good goal, we needed that one."

With his performances of late, it appears Matheson has made a smooth transition. After two goals late last season, he has kept the momentum going.

"It hasn't been too bad [changing positions], because throughout the game I still go back on defense," Matheson said. "I play the point [on the power play], and tonight I played center and wing. I'm getting used to it because I played [forward] half of last year."

"We have the luxury that few teams have of being able to comfortably put a player back on defense if we have an injury or a series of penalties," said

UM has slim shot at playoffs

One more shot. That's all any team can ask for when it comes to extending its season, and getting another chance to play.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team has that shot this weekend. The Minutemen (8-6-3, 2-4-1 Atlantic 10) play two of the teams in the Atlantic 10 standings, with a slim chance of still making the conference tournament.

Today, Saint Louis (10-3-2, 6-0-1 A-10) comes to Rudd Field in a tie with Richmond for first place in the A-10. UMass caps off its regular season on Sunday against Duquesne, the team's Senior Day.

The Billikens come in having already clinched a playoff spot, but UMass coach Sam Koch feels, for a young UMass team still searching for an identity, this is a chance to make an impact in the A-10.

"It's a huge statement game for us," said Koch. "All the work we've done this year will come out on this field on Friday. I respect Saint Louis, their tradition, the things they've accomplished over the years and the national championships that they've won. But I think it's important that – and I believe our guys understand this – we've got to respect ourselves.

"They've accomplished some good things this year, essentially being a young team. Now here's a chance to show just how good we can be. I think the guys are ready for that challenge."

After practice on Wednesday, Koch spoke to the team, telling them not to be intimidated by the reputation of Saint Louis – a new team to the A-10 last year – as a perennial force.

"We've got to get over the anxiety of [Saint Louis and Duquesne] being the top teams [in the conference], and to be honest I think our guys are ready," Koch

Minutemen seniors bid farewell to Rudd

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While the Massachusetts men's soccer team needs a lot to happen in order to advance to the Atlantic 10 tournament in Charlotte, the team hopes its technical "farewell" to the graduating class of 2007 means nothing but a departure from Rudd Field.

The Minutemen are ranked ninth in the conference, and still hold a glimmer of hope that they will be playing in November. Regardless of its postseason aspirations, Rudd Field will be the home for UMass's annual Senior Day on Sunday.

Michael Donnelly and Jason Scudamore have been the team's only seniors this season, and will be honored before the final regular season game against Duquesne, along with Graduate Student Brendon Ferullo.

Scudamore has been at UMass for five years, Donnelly has been a Minuteman for four, and Ferullo is finishing his last season of eligibility with a one-year stint in the Maroon and White.

With two games remaining on the schedule, and a "glass-half-full attitude," UMass coach Sam Koch will try to keep the day's emotional value to a minimum.

"[They've] been a pleasure to have on the team," Koch said. "I'm not going to miss them because they're still here. We got two games to play, so I'll let you know after our last game. Right now, they're a big part of us getting prepared to play and trying to get two wins this weekend."

UMass dressed only seven upperclassmen this year, as opposed to its 18 freshmen and sophomores. So needless to say, the seniors played an important role on and off the field.

"You need good leadership," Koch said. "You need guys the other players can look up to, and guys that have been in the tournament hunt who know what the pressure is like, and know how to handle that pressure. If you don't have good leadership and a good senior presence, it makes it awfully difficult for teams to get through tough times."

"[The freshmen] look up to us, and they see what we do in practice, and that is a reflection of how they then act," Donnelly said on being a leader. "As a senior, all the freshmen definitely look up to you, and hopefully so far we've made a good impression."

Donnelly has seven points in four seasons with UMass. He has totaled two goals and three assists in 57 games. His ability to help maintain defensive balance has helped the Minutemen maintain their lead in every defensive category in the A-10.

"Donnelly has a good vision of the game," Koch said. "He sees the field well. He understands defensive shape well, and he has a very positive influence on the team defensively, to make sure that we aren't unbalanced or not getting pulled out of positions. He does a very good job with that, better than most of the players that we have."

The other senior, Scudamore, has 13 points in his five-year career at UMass. Scudamore sat out the 2004 season due to injury, but has compiled two goals and nine assists in 73 games under Koch.

"Scudamore is a fierce competitor," Koch said. "There's no question he wants to win. He has a strong will to win, and you see it in games. The hunger that he has for that, you can't coach it. It's something that's within him."

Donning the Maroon and White has been a great experience for both seniors. And whether it was Scudamore's game-winning assist in overtime against Fordham last year, Donnelly's second career goal that led to a 3-1 upset over Michigan last season, or even seeing Scudamore beep at his teammates as he cruises by them in the bus that he drives to make a little extra cash, the memories will never be forgotten.

"It was a good experience," Scudamore said. "You have to have a blue-collar work ethic. You have to come to work everyday, but if you give it your all, you'll get a fair shot."

"It's bittersweet," Donnelly said. "It's nice that we had good years here, but it's disappointing obviously that we're never going to play for UMass again [after this season], especially on Rudd Field."

Minutewomen poised to extend season

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If the Massachusetts women's soccer team finds itself focusing more on new fall fashions than Sunday's opponent, it doesn't bode well for its playoff aspirations. A loss on Friday would render Sunday's game virtually meaningless.

"I have no plans to go shopping at the mall this weekend," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

The season enters the stretch drive for the Minutewomen (10-5, 4-3 Atlantic 10) as they embark on a pivotal two-game road trip against tough conference opponents Saint Louis and Duquesne this weekend. The final pair of games on the docket for the season will go a long way to determine if they are playoff bound.

The Maroon and White will first have to contend with the Saint Louis Billikens (9-4-2, 5-2-0 A-10) on Friday, a team that was previously ranked 17th in the country (their highest ranking in school history).

Rudy knows that coming back to Amherst without two wins will likely not be enough.

"We're playing for our tournament lives," he said. "We put ourselves in a bind. It would have been difficult playing this weekend anyway, but now we've got additional pressure. Depending on what other teams do we're probably going to need both of these games."

"Right now we pretty much have to win the next two games," senior co-captain Nadia Villarmel said. "If we don't then there's still a possibility we'll make the A-10 tournament, but we would be relying on other teams to lose."

Friday's opponent will cut UMass no slack as they too are looking to move their way up a crowded smorgasbord of teams atop the conference standings.

"They're the defending champions," Rudy said. "They have a very high pedigree and are top heavy with older players. It's a tough package to handle."

The Billikens have played a terrific all-around game this year, outscoring their opponents 40-17. They feature a balanced attack with seven players scoring four or more goals. Earlier this year Saint Louis ripped off a seven game undefeated streak and they have manhandled teams, winning games 7-0 and 6-0, against Temple and Duquesne, respectively.

Rudy knows his team has their work cut out for them.

University of Massachusetts students can reduce the risks of war and advance world peace by befriending young people in diverse communities and advancing three principles of peace, a Nobel Peace Prize winner told students and faculty Friday.

The Nobelist, John Hume, who shared the peace prize in 1998 for achieving the agreement that reduced hostilities in Northern Ireland, told a group at the Isenberg School of Management Friday that honoring human difference is the essential first step to building a structure for world peace.

Human difference, Hume said, "is an accident of birth. Did any of you choose to be born?" he asked the audience. "Did any of you decide to be born? Did you decide to be born into any community? Into any race? Into any religion? Any nationality? No?"

In turn, Hume said, reducing animosity is a simple matter.

"It's quite obvious," he said. "If you're from one community, you can make friends with young people from the other community – the more we can get young people together, mixing in sport and in education, then the better, because it becomes more normal and the divisions become eroded."

In fact, just such efforts at honoring difference – what at UMass is known as promoting and appreciating diversity – is the first principle of three Hume said are fundamental to every peace process in the world.

"Principle No. 1: Respect for Difference," Hume declared. "Difference is natural. So why should it be a source of hatred or conflict? There's no two people in any country that are the same. There're no two people in the whole of humanity that are the same. Difference is the essence of humanity," he said, and therefore must be respected as being fundamentally human.

The second principle for building peace, Hume said, is creating "institutions that respect those differences." In Northern Ireland, for example, he said, the Northern Ireland Assembly is elected by proportional representation. (In contrast, the United States uses winner-take-all districts.)

The proportional system is more democratic, Hume said, because it insures that all sections of the people are fully represented in the Assembly, which in turn, by proportional representation, then elects the government of Northern Ireland.

The third principle in building peace, Hume said, is a "healing process" by which the parties work together in their common interest for social and economic advancement.

"In other words," Hume said, "instead of waving flags and guns and bombs, they're instead working in their common interest ... in other words, they're spilling their sweat together, not their blood."

Hume said he learned these principles when he visited the grave of Abraham Lincoln. "I saw written there a summary of that philosophy, which in my opinion could create peace in the entire world. It said, 'E pluribus Unum.' From many we are one. The essence of our unity is respect for our diversity."

It's a reminder that's printed on U.S. currency, Hume noted, and which perhaps underscores its role in helping the United States to achieve economic success.

In fact, he said the three principles of peace are identical to those which helped Europe to heal by creating the European Union. Hume recalled being elected to the European Parliament in 1979 and taking a walk over the

UMass holds annual Women in Engineering Career Day

BY SUSAN KING
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Female engineering students at the University of Massachusetts will be able to explore their career choices at the annual Women in Engineering Career Day, today at 9:00 a.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Representatives from over 140 towns throughout Massachusetts including Amherst, Northampton, Springfield and Boston will be in attendance, including approximately 200 students, teachers and guidance counselors.

The students will have the opportunity to meet with current undergraduate engineering students as well as listen to a panel presentation of women engineers in the industry.

His program was started in 1988 by the I Must Attend Women in Engineering Program and the campus chapter of the Society of Women Engineers.

"I realize an extremely underrepresented [as students in the engineering disciplines] and the workforce," said Kathleen Kavet, Assistant Dean for College Outreach at UMass, about why the program was started. "There are a lot of girls who are very interested in all about, and we want to give information so they can make a decision as to whether engineering is or is not the right major for them."

Also, she said, it is important to reach out to high school students because [illegible] and [illegible] because [illegible] can impact their choice of college major later on. Engineering, Computer Science and other science majors in college normally require students to take chemistry, physics and [illegible] years of math while in high school.

Corporate representatives, including Raytheon," "Tighe & Bond," Westinghouse," "General Dynamics" and "Camp Dresser & McKee" will have interactive displays at the event.

There will also be hands-on activities, like building a Puff Mobile, a car powered by a puff of air made with lifesavers and straws, or a Hoop Glider, a straw with paper strips curled into hoops and thrown in the air to get the furthest distance possible.

9,500 lbs of lobster to be served

BY LORAINE BURGER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Dining Services at the University of Massachusetts will be holding its fifth annual Trick's, Treats 'n' More dinner tomorrow at all dining halls on campus to celebrate Halloween.

The dinner will run from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. and lobster, clam chowder, strip steak, and vegetables will be served to over 12,500 students. Students will also be able to participate in pumpkin painting and costume contests in which portable DVD players and gift cards will be issued to the winners. Magicians and fortune tellers will be entertaining students, as well as guests, while they dine.

Director of Dining Services Ken Toong expects to serve 9,500 pounds of lobster for the event, which, according to the Maine Lobsterman's Association, is the most servings of lobster at one sitting than any other college on the East Coast. In addition to lobster, many other fall favorites will be served including strip steak, native potatoes, locally grown [illegible], corn on the cob, clam chowder, apple cider, and candied apples.

"Every [illegible] would be popular [illegible] traditional fall [illegible] Toong. "[illegible] we will have [illegible] dinner are up to [illegible] that [illegible] should be a lively event. From mid-term studies [illegible] staff members are [illegible] mid-semester [illegible]."

"I [illegible] students wearing costumes, relaxing and enjoying themselves," said Toong.

Massachusetts named second smartest state

BY EDEN UNIVER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The state of Massachusetts has been named the second smartest state in the nation, according to the results of the 2006 Smartest State Award.

Morgan Quitno Press, an independent private research and publishing company, ranked all 50 states with one being the smartest in its fifth annual ranking. Vermont was ranked the first smartest state, and Arizona was ranked the fiftieth smartest state – both for the second year in a row.

"It looks like at first glance that these figures might not be adjusted for the age and socio-economic status of the population which would make a tremendous difference," said Professor Douglas Anderton, director of the Social and Demographic Research Institute of the University of Massachusetts.

According to Anderton, the states with more funds to be put towards education will have more money for school supplies, higher salaries to afford better teachers and an overall advantage to states with fewer funds to spend on education. If the majority of a state's population is families, there is more focus on spending more tax dollars on education and expenditures for schools.

The methodology of the ranking system is based on 21 different factors. These factors are categorized as either positive or negative and are then plugged into a formula to be compared to the national averages of different categories. The farther below the national average the state falls, the lower the state is ranked.

According to the Morgan Quitno Press Web page, a few "positive factors" include: percent of public elementary and secondary school current expenditures used for instruction, percent of population graduated from high school, percent of public school eighth graders proficient or better in reading, average teacher salary as a percent of average annual pay of all workers.

A few "negative factors" include percent of school-age population in public schools, high school drop-out rate, special education pupil-teacher ratio, average class size in public elementary schools and median pupil-teacher ratio in public high schools.

One reason that Arizona has done so poorly is because of the legislation of the state, said Professor Al Kaszniak, the head of the psychology department at the University of Arizona.

"Here in Arizona we have struggled for several years with inadequate legislative appropriations for both K-12 and higher education," he said. Legislations in any of the 50 states will have different priorities according to their majority demographics.

Although the Smartest State Award research does not include college students – other than within the amount of high school students going to a college after graduation – it does seem that colleges and universities factor into this study as well.

UMass freshman, Marissa Speranza, said, "Massachusetts is the second smartest state because we have a tradition of excellence in education that draws people to our state."

Massachusetts was ranked the first smartest state in the 2003 and 2004 ranking.

In an annual ranking done by Morgan Quitno Press that determines the smartest state, Vermont takes the lead while Massachusetts takes second place.

bridge between Strasbourg, France, one of the locales for the meetings of the Parliament, and its neighbor along the Rhine River, Kehl, Germany.

It was in the middle of that bridge, he said, between the two countries whose enmities most defined a divided Europe, where he paused to meditate on what's been achieved through the three peace principles.

Hume recalled that meditation, thinking to himself, "If I stood on this bridge 30 years ago, at the end of the Second World War – the worst half-century in the history of the world – in which...45 million human beings were slaughtered, in the first half of the last century. And if I had said then... 'Don't worry. It's all over. The wars of Europe have ended forever. And in 20 to 30 years you'll have a completely united Europe of all those countries.' I thought, 'If anybody had forecast that then, they would have been sent to a psychiatrist!'"

"But it has happened," Hume continued. "And the European Union is the best example in the world of conflict resolution. And for that very reason, it should be studied, and studied carefully."

In fact, he said, the great opportunity now is for the United States and the European Union to join forces to set up a united body to promote peace and end international conflict.

In ending the conflict in Northern Ireland, Hume said, two Massachusetts politicians, the late Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives Tip O'Neill and Senator Edward Kennedy, were instrumental in bringing together Irish Nationalists and Unionists together with the British government for negotiations. The efforts by O'Neill and Kennedy made the Anglo-Irish agreement possible and laid the foundation for further economic progress, Hume said. "Given what they did for peace and justice in our streets. We owe them an eternal gratitude for what they've done. Thank you for creating leaders of that nature."

The same principles of peace can be applied to the Middle East, Hume said.

"The people [of the Middle East] are divided, not the territory," Hume said. "When people are divided, would you not agree that violence has not only no role to play at solving the problem, but it makes the problem far deeper and more difficult to solve? Instead of sending troops to solve the problem, send the philosophy (and principles, of peace)."

Hume was the featured speaker at ISOM for a symposium on "Business Development in Post-Conflict Economies: The Case of Northern Ireland." But UMass-Northern Ireland links date to 1988. At the time, now Graduate Dean John Mullin connected through a UMass Boston event with people in Derry, Northern Ireland, and later developed an internship program, and a student exchange.

The effort developed with former ISOM faculty member Craig Moore, and most recently Dennis Hanno, former ISOM undergraduate studies dean, now dean at Babson College, who introduced Hume on Friday. Such exchanges continue to be vital to ISOM, according to interim Dean Soren Bisgaard, who introduced the program on Friday.

"Peace is the necessary foundation for anything, really," not simply the ability to executive business contracts, Bisgaard said.

"I think the most important thing we can do for our students here is to teach them that sort of tolerance and understanding of other cultures, other nations."

Dean Soren Bisgaard introduced an internship and student exchange program on Friday which allows students to connect with people of Northern Ireland.

Black cat adoptions banned

By Rebecca Boone
Associated Press

BOISE, Idaho – No black cat will cross your path this Halloween, not if a northern Idaho animal shelter can help it. Like many shelters around the country, the Kootenai Humane Society in Coeur d'Alene is prohibiting black cat adoptions from now to Nov. 2, fearing the animals could be mistreated in Halloween pranks — or worse, sacrificed in some satanic ritual.

The risk may be remote, said the shelter's executive director, Phil Morgan.

"It's kind of an urban legend. But in the humane industry it's pretty typical that shelters don't do adoptions of black cats or white bunnies because of the whole satanic sacrificial thing," Morgan said. "If we prevent one animal from getting hurt, then it serves its purpose."

Out of 97 cats at the shelter, 28 are black, Morgan said.

However, some animal experts say the practice does more to hurt animals than protect them.

"Black cats already suffer a stigma because of their color," said Gail Buchwald, vice president of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals shelter in New York City. "Why penalize them any more by limiting the times when they can be adopted?"

The Kootenai Humane Society is prohibiting all black cat adoptions for Halloween, fearing the animals could be mistreated in Halloween pranks.

Black cats tend to be adopted less often than other felines, Buchwald said.

"Behaviorally, there's no difference from the color of the cat. It's tied into this whole mythology about the animal – don't let it cross your path or some foreboding or foreshadowing of evil – and that's an outdated superstition," she said.

It's not clear how many shelters still seasonally ban black cat adoptions, said Kim Intino, director of animal sheltering issues for the Humane Society of the United States, but the trend seems to be fading – along with the once-common bans on bunny adoptions around Easter or puppy adoptions as Christmas gifts.

"If there were people out there performing rituals with animals, then I would think that Halloween would be a time for that, but a good adoption process would tend to weed that out," Intino said. "There's going to be incidents of weird abuse that happen no matter what. The remedy is not banning black cat adoptions."

Inmate charged in killer's tattooing

COLUMBUS, Ind. – An inmate accused of forcibly tattooing a slain 10-year-old girl's name onto her killer's forehead in an Indiana prison was the victim's cousin, a family friend said.

Jared Harris, 22, is a cousin of Katlyn "Katie" Collman, family friend and spokesman Terry Gray told The Republic newspaper. He said he did not believe they knew each other well.

Harris, 22, who is serving time on a burglary conviction at Wabash Valley state prison in Carlisle, has been charged with battery and accused of tattooing "KATIE'S REVENGE" across Anthony Ray Stockelman's forehead.

Harris told prison officials the attack was in revenge, according to an affidavit.

Stockelman is serving a life sentence after pleading guilty to abducting, molesting and killing the fourth-grader, who lived about 70 miles south of Indianapolis. She was missing for five days before her body was found Jan. 30, 2005, in a creek about 15 miles from her home.

The affidavit said that prison officials transferred Harris to the same prison wing as Stockelman on Sept. 19, three days before the attack, and that Harris subsequently threatened Stockelman's life several times.

Harris slipped into the open cell Stockelman shared with another prisoner on Sept. 22 and, when Stockelman returned, Harris closed the locking cell door, according to the affidavit.

Stockelman told investigators that Harris put his right hand around his throat and told him, "I'm either gonna stick you and leave you bleeding or I'm gonna tattoo you." After applying the tattoo, Harris discarded the tattoo gun in a prison trash can, he told investigators.

It was unclear how he had gotten the tattoo gun.

The number one question

Chris Eckel

So, the Massachusetts general election is about a week away. If the polls are any good at predicting results (and we know from 2004 they are not always good), then the gubernatorial race will be about as competitive as a game between the Patriots and the Amherst High School Junior Varsity Football team.

With that in mind, many people are turning their attention to the referendum questions on the ballot, some of which are being very hotly debated. The most intriguing debate may revolve around Question One, which would allow grocery stores, supermarkets, shops, gas stations and other food retail outlets to sell wine.

As a public service, I decided to provide indecisive UMass voters an opportunity to make a decision on where they should stand.

If you enjoy purchasing 20 bars of soap at the local superstore for $7, and think that bigger is better, then by all means vote "Yes" for Question One. If convenience stores and supermarkets are allowed to sell wine, then it is a safe bet that prices will go down. Increased competition inevitably means lower prices, as any School Of Management student can tell you.

If you enjoy purchasing 20 bars of soap at the local superstore for $7, and think that bigger is better, then by all means vote "Yes" for Question One.

Normally, I am all for lower prices, especially on a product I purchase regularly, but I wonder what sort of effect it will have in the alcohol market. There are many locally-owned small liquor stores in the Amherst area, such as "Russell's Liquors" or "Spirit Haus."

Both of them have been traditions for UMass kids for decades, and I find it hard to believe any one of us hasn't started a few Thursday, Friday or Saturday nights by sampling their wares.

Allowing them to be undercut by retail giants would destroy a way of life in Amherst. Think I'm overestimating the case? In the near future, a "Super Wal-Mart" is going to be completed in Hadley.

Even if you're willing to ignore the gross workers' rights violations that Wal-Mart practices, as a consumer, you should be aware of their reputation for practicing predatory pricing.

They move in, undercut the competition and, then, when the competition is forced to close down, Wal-Mart raises the prices again. This means down the road, that box of wine is still going to cost $16.99, and you can buy two boxes of it to celebrate undermining the local economy.

If you are one of those groups which pay rent by throwing parties (i.e. some fraternities and a few others), then definitely vote no on Question One. Everyone knows the vast majority of people going to pay-for-play parties is underage and can't really get booze any other way. Now, think about the typical people who work at grocery stores and convenience stores.

Generally, they are college or high school kids. I mean, if you haven't done it yourself, I'm sure you can name someone who has worked in an establishment like that – it's a pretty common job.

Will this become the new Russell's Liquors?

Now, let's connect the dots, shall we? High school and college kids enjoy alcohol. If this bill passes, high school and college kids will have access to alcohol, and their friends will know that.

It's a pretty safe bet that with the major premise and the minor premise established as such, the conclusion would be; When kids who enjoy alcohol have access to it, through friends who sell it, those kids will inevitably acquire alcohol at a greater rate than they could from liquor stores alone. That's a completely perfect logical syllogism.

Who says my minor in philosophy from UMass isn't worthwhile?

Of course, you don't need any philosophical training to realize that if alcohol is more easily accessible to underage students, it might lead to an increase in correlated activities, such as drunken driving, alcohol fueled fights, sexual assaults and the like. But maybe if we are looking to keep our number one violent school ranking, this would be a good fit.

If you don't fall into one of these two groups, then you might have to make up your mind – sorry I couldn't help you out. On the other hand, if you're not either an avid supporter of Wal-Mart or someone who charges others to have a good time, you are probably doing pretty well with running your life. I am confident you can make up your own mind about Question One without some snarky advice from me.

There is no doubt in my mind that it is a complicated issue, and the ramifications extend far beyond being able to get some "Arbor Mist" with your deli meats or your gas. However you choose to vote, please do vote, because college students are consistently ignored in political campaigns, precisely because we never vote.

Get out there to the local precinct station, which will be on campus this year, or mail in your absentee ballot, and make UMass proud.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

City on a hill?

Katy Bruck

UMass has the reputation of being a city of college students. Though this label can be intimidating, it is certainly well-earned. The number of students on this campus makes it almost impossible to avoid the kinds of expenses that living in a city can incur.

As denizens of this collegiate enterprise, we pay rent, taxes (fees), and we pay to maintain the right of citizenship (tuition). That's about $17,000 total, per year. All in all, if you're spared the extra fees for not being a resident of Massachusetts, it doesn't seem like a bad deal: especially considering the cost it takes to run a place like this.

According to the UMass Budget Office Web site, it costs just under $650 million to run this school. With all the maintenance costs and employee salaries, UMass is out of the red by just a few million each year which, compared to the cost, isn't a whole lot.

Consider one aspect of this University that differentiates it from a real business – there's very little circulation of money within the University. We pay UMass to live and learn here, and UMass pays other people to take care of our needs. The employees don't live here, and don't put their paychecks back into the system.

When you consider the expense of having to compete with private colleges with multi-million dollar endowments, it's no wonder there's so little profit to be made in the higher education business.

At a school this large, it's easy to feel anonymous, as if the University just doesn't care about you or your money. Like many of the students here, I came because I wanted to get a good education but couldn't afford a private college.

There are no real idiots at this school, and for every handful of students who skip class and drink on Tuesday nights, there are 100 students who go to their classes and appreciate the opportunities presented to them. So, when you have to take out a $10,000 annual loan to pay for a state school, it's easy to feel that going to college simply isn't worth the cost.

Vented or not, our frustration often automatically turns towards the administration, and I'm certainly not saying they're blameless when it comes to how confusing it can be to sort through the bureaucracy. The real root of this problem doesn't lie in some secret embezzlement in the highest levels of the University's administration.

But the real root of this problem doesn't lie in some secret embezzlement in the highest levels of the University's administration.

President George Bush's budget proposal for 2007 would cut $3.1 billion from the overall education budget. These cuts are naturally not going to come from high school math and reading initiatives, the main tenets of Bush's No Child Left Behind. They're coming from programs for the arts, state grants for vocational education and loans for low-income college students.

It's funny that the new low-income college student is not just the inner-city student or the child of a single parent anymore. Now middle-class Massachusetts students, hailing from one of the wealthiest regions in the country, are qualifying for financial aid, which they will get less and less of due to these cuts. Schools aren't receiving the aid they need to give their students a break which, in turn, is forcing students to take out loans from private companies, often with high interest rates.

Bush's goal of getting all American students in every high school to have reading and math skills at grade level by 2014 is noble. This is a revolutionary education measure and, theoretically, will produce generations of smarter and more productive students.

What about when all these new American geniuses want to go to college? What will they be left with? The same debt we will be left with if Bush doesn't begin to turn his eye to the domestic front.

Maybe we're making this world safer from terrorism, but it's time to think about the influence of introducing generations of debtors into a society whose economy is already so dependent on floundering resources.

So, next time you want to leap over the counter at the cashier in the Financial Aid office, take a second to think about the real cause of the problem. Feel free to get angry, and express yourself about the cost of education in America. Come Nov. 7th, do something about it. Research and find the candidates who are devoted to promoting affordable higher education. They're out there, and they need your support.

Myths of the DC

Tucker Merrick

The "Omelet Bar" is a plague upon my mind. So many stories flutter about, concerning its mysterious nature – long waits, poor service and distasteful students. Every morning as I'm going down to breakfast, these stories brood over me, tales that cannot be ignored, tales that must be told.

The omelet line is the Bermuda Triangle of the UMass Dining Commons. While approaching, you're tempted by the myths behind it. Some folks say if you wait long enough, a bounty of cheese, egg and warm miscellaneous will be bestowed upon you.

Yet, there are also rumors of fatigue, restlessness and rage. Some students who have entered that line came out only shadows of their former selves. Legends of seizure-inducing waits have been known to scare even the most avid omelet enthusiast into the dry arms of scrambled eggs.

I heard that waiting in that line, your life is paused while the world around you continues. Friends who you once came to the DC with have long finished their meals and the conversations you were once involved in have been long since covered; Mel Gibson of "Braveheart" would love to Russell Crowe of "Gladiator," and margarine can't compare to butter, no matter what the calories say.

These people you once knew, have moved on with their lives. They've finished a crossword, or remarried with two children. All they can offer is to meet you at a better place, perhaps a library where the wicked price of the omelet bar has no clout.

I have also heard tales of senseless punishment from the Gods of the Omelet.

I have also heard tales of senseless punishment from the Gods of the Omelet. Much like the deities of Olympus, these rulers of flame and pan in flower apparel have the fickle personalities of humanity. Like the Trojan Horse, their gift is not to be trusted.

They can become boorish, apathetic and selfish just like us. After a long odyssey for the golden prize, these gods will show their arbitrary wrath by bestowing a less than acceptable omelet on their tired pilgrim. And with their sub-par meal they will show no remorse, only senseless spite, leaving the disciple questioning their faith.

Word has also reached me of the conversations of insanity." Survivors have recounted how inane chatter is placed within the omelet line by the gods in order to test the commitment of the disciples. Students are forced to silently endure attacks on their senses by mindless minions. Few have returned to tell the tale, and all who do are sweating, gaunt and erratic.

Still, some people continuously wait at the "Omelet Bar," despite these tales of woe. That students are able to do this is an impressive feat. They can look at a 40-minute line and face it head-on, while a lesser man, such as myself, will turn away in frustration and fears. They are truly heroes who bear exhaustion, annoyance and cruelty from above.

How can the omelet system be so cruel, and how can the beleaguered undergraduate bear this cruelty? This teller of tales may never know. All I can do is pray for a new Golden Age of this golden food.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

KNOW THY SCHOOL

The unsigned editorial in Friday's Collegian ("Coverage of our partying not worth the attention") was dead on the mark. The author of the piece understands his school better than Mr. Tocco or the rest of the Board of Trustees – but then again one would hope so, because he actually goes to school here and eats, sleeps and breathes UMass, unlike Mr. Tocco.

All the recent media hype, beginning with a sensationalist and blatantly false report on the national news program "20/20," have fueled the image of UMass as a party school.

There is no doubt that we have an active recreational party scene, and one needs to look no further than Puffton or the Townhouses to find big parties on the weekend. But this is nothing new, and moreover, the level of partying has been declining for over a decade, not increasing.

Despite what the chancellor and a sensationalist media want you to think, UMass is having less parties, drinking less and being more competitive in its academic research than ever before.

The author of the editorial is right about the "battlefield" that our school is already becoming. Arrest rates soar as a result of more intrusive and stringent policies ordered by the administration, and a rift of distrust and animosity develops between the students and the police.

Oh, and don't for a minute think these feelings are only harbored by those students who have an altercation with the police. New policies, such as summary suspensions without hearings for any student charged with any drug offense (by UMass – not the police) probably doesn't make much sense to a lot of other people, either. These kinds of broad generalizations are a poor way to deal with the problem.

Driving students off campus to party is insulting the residents of neighboring towns and hurting our relationships with their tax-paying residents.

Is this the ideal environment the chancellor is trying to cultivate for prospective students? What of the alumni who the University depends on for financial support, who see our school becoming a war zone? When an alumnus is called in the future to donate, will they remember the "New Dirt," or will they remember being arrested for smoking a joint by an officer walking up and down their hallways?

It's time for students to stand up and demand their rights back, rights which the administration have been slowly taking away for years now.

NOT O'REILLY

Melissa Garber's column "Of All the President's Men" about Bill O'Reilly is another attack on the most watched TV host on cable news. I know it's hard for many people out there to see that O'Reilly is a well respected journalist.

Garber believes O'Reilly does not deserve an interview with President Bush because O'Reilly coddles President Bush and is not a respectable political pundit. She claims President Bush seeks out interviews with people who coddle him.

She must have forgotten all the broadcast news interviews President Bush did early this fall on the broadcast networks.

Also, President Bush knows O'Reilly will give an honest interview and not smear or attack him. As a regular listener of O'Reilly's radio and TV shows, by no means does he coddle President Bush. He is the first one to point out and address issues with errors and mistakes that are made by the Bush administration.

For example, O'Reilly continually argues that we must secure our borders along Mexico and Canada and blames Bush for turning a blind eye from this issue. It is easy to claim President Bush is coddled by Fox News and O'Reilly when there are multiple sources out there that continually smear Fox News and O'Reilly.

I know Garber does not watch "The O'Reilly Factor" on a regular basis, but if she did, she might better understand his viewpoint and not that of blogs and other Internet sources with no credibility.

I would also like Garber to read O'Reilly's new book "The Culture Warrior." She might find where O'Reilly really stands on issues instead of what she reads from far-Left Web sites.

LIBERATING ISLAMIC WOMEN

I wanted to point out that Ms. Jackie Hai's assertion that the veil (burkha, etc.) are "liberating" is utter bovine scatology. In the United States, if a woman refuses to wear halter-tops, tight jeans and a G-string, she may not garner as many dates as she wants – in contrast with women in most Muslim countries who, if they don't wear "chaste" clothing, are beaten.

Women in Islam are second-class citizens: if they are raped, too bad if there are not enough male witnesses. A woman who dates outside the religion or without male approval is subject to honor killing, somehow. I doubt a western woman dating someone her father disapproves of needs to be overly worried about her father killing her.

Lastly, if she views wearing "modest" clothes as "liberating her" from the worries of the sexualized Western world, one can only wonder how she views clitorectomies – publicly discussed and approved by Muslim scholars in many countries.

Perhaps having their genitals mutilated might be viewed by her as "freeing her" from the worries she might enjoy sex.

COMICAL COMPLAINTS

I would just like to comment on how poor the Collegian's comics are. For one, none of them make any sense, including the sorry excuse for a comic "Elsie Hooper." I don't think I've ever met anyone who knew the storyline of that dumb comic.

Also, often the comics are printed very poorly because the artist did not draw dark enough. I understand "Elsie Hooper" has a long tenure in the Collegian, however, I can't possibly understand why.

Please take these stupid, non-funny, non-interesting, no-talent comics out. Thank you ... p.s. the horoscopes suck too.

Taj Mahal paints Calvin blue

BY LAUREN MODISETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Thursday, Oct. 26, the Calvin Theatre had the pleasure of hosting Taj Mahal Trio.

The Trio's front man, Taj Mahal, is a self-taught musician who has spent his life appreciating the diverse musical styles our world offers. He can play more than 20 instruments, and has a wonderful, deep, raspy voice that is smooth, sultry and scruffy.

Mahal traces the American styles back to the group's roots in Africa and Europe, which give them a unique sound and structure. He has spent time all over the world researching different distinguishing styles from places like the Caribbean, South Pacific, West Africa, South America, Australia and more.

During certain points in the concert, he would drop his voice down to an unsettling raspiness that sounds like a blues-struck toad.

The Trio emerged on stage at around 9 p.m. and began feeding the crowd the blues they craved. The audience consisted of many older fans who have known him well over the past years of his career.

There were younger fans scattered about the crowd, but they were definitely the minority. An occasional youngster would pop up next to his/her parents, clinging to their pant legs as they partook in their first Taj Mahal Trio experience.

They played an amazing and diverse set representative of all the different music styles Mahal practices. He played many of his own compositions, but also played what he called "ancient relatives" of blues such as "Zanzibar."

Mahal's musical style is often described as Afro-Caribbean and folk-world blues. He's been performing for over 40 years.

The Trio performed some of Mahal's own songs, such as "Mississippi Big Butt," "Corinne," "Uh Huh Blues," "My Creole Belle" and, after an obnoxious girl in the back of the theatre yelled out a request for "Queen Bee," (oh wait, that was me), he graciously played it for the audience.

The "Uh Huh Blues" had a resemblance to some of the Allman Brother's blues offerings.

Unfortunately, since the crowd was composed of less energetic old time followers of Mahal, no one was dancing. This was extremely disappointing because it seemed a waste for such amazing music to be absorbed by the house seats.

When they performed "Queen Bee" there were a handful of younger people who left their seats to dance, but they were quickly asked to stay out of the aisles. Even though the Trio works wonderfully together, the crowd was moderately disappointing.

Some radical fans climbed on stage and began dancing in attempts to send out energy and feeling to the crowd. When one fan hollered "let us dance in the aisles," Mahal's response was, "It's like the government. If you wait for them to do it, they'll never get it, don't you got to do it yourself?"

Many of his songs were dedicated to the ladies in the audience and especially those who possessed what he called "a lot in their big back field." This is a man who truly loves what he does and embraces his audience.

His southern style sun hat, Tommy Bahama shirt and white cotton pants almost made you forget about the near zero temperatures that harshly awaited outside.

With some of his last songs he finally got the crowd up on their feet to dance and clap along with him. At this point, his Caribbean influence was shining brighter than any other apparent influence, and the crowd was eating him up.

For the encore he finally busted out his banjo and played a little differently for his fans before exiting the stage for good. Afterwards, several people awaited his tour manager at the entrance of the backstage area in attempts to shake his hand and maybe even for some reminiscence of the good old college days.

Mahal's facial expressions and communication with the audience made the concert particularly entertaining. There were a handful of instances when he would begin playing a song and then stopped so he could address the crowd.

"The blues is a tone that puts me in contact with a lot of things, culturally, spiritually, cosmically. I really enjoy it and I'm not going to let it go because it's that good. I walk with the energy of music every day. I don't have to turn it on to hear it play," says Mahal. "In the end, ultimately the music plays you, you don't play the music."

Offering his soulful brand of world-influenced blues, Taj Mahal pleased the gathering crowd with tunes including "Lovin' in My Baby's Eyes" and "The Blues Are Alright." He was as vibrant as ever and his long-standing talent was greatly appreciated by the audience.

It was refreshing to hear a group whittled down to its essence – just good old drums, bass and guitar. Mahal even swapped out his regular axe to do a little banjo plucking, reminding the audience of his early roots in traditional American acoustic music.

Taj Mahal is a two-time Grammy-winner musician, as well as a composer, producer and a multi-instrumentalist.

New Lennon film too perspective heavy

BY PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Shortly after David Leaf and John Scheinfeld's "The U.S. vs. John Lennon" was released in theaters, it was considered a publicity stunt beyond the wildest dreams of its advertisers. George W. Bush signed the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which effectively suspended all rights to legal recourse for immigrants to the United States who are believed to pose a threat to the country.

After seeing this film, viewers would almost certainly come to the conclusion that had the act been passed approximately 30 years ago, Lennon would have been among the first to be subjected to its ramifications.

It would seem as though "The U.S. vs. John Lennon" was made to remind the country's populace of dissent and quiet revolution in a previous time of national turmoil and to draw comparisons with the country's current administration with a previous one – one that is now usually reviled by history. Given the content and implications of the film, it almost definitely was.

The film documents the life of Lennon from his childhood to his assassination, cross-referenced with the political upheaval of the late '60s and early '70s. It focuses on his views of the Vietnam War, the cult following of his message of peace, his troubled (not that the film presents it as such) marriage to Yoko Ono and his fight against deportation.

"THE U.S. VS. JOHN LENNON"

DIRECTED BY DAVID LEAF / JOHN SCHEINFELD

PG-13

The movie features interviews with people in his life, such as Ono and Black Panther Bobby Seale; noted intellectual folks such as Gore Vidal and Noam Chomsky; G. Gordon Liddy, to add credibility to the stance that the film is objective and Geraldo Rivera, apparently because the filmmakers were feeling silly.

The film comes off as not primarily interested in presenting a biography of Lennon so much as a slice of history that modern-day America seems on the verge of repeating. The movie looks for excuses to slip in themes and events relevant to the cultural climate of the current United States.

Much effort is made to distance the country from an increasingly unpopular war, with the disapproving minority being the nation's voice of reason. Occasionally, a scene goes by where it's painfully obvious the filmmakers are arranging subconscious connections to the present day, such as Richard Nixon refusing to detail the exact timetable for pulling troops out of Vietnam.

Such instances will lead the viewer to feel he/she has figured out the political strategy of the movie. It will play dumb, acting as if any relevance to current issues is purely coincidental. The viewer grows more and more confident in this theory until, with an audible thud, Vidal comments on how Lennon came to represent life, while Nixon and Bush represent death. From there, the film is even more difficult to take seriously as a genuine biography of Lennon, rather than a vessel of political commentary.

Even less forgivable is the glaring lack of warts needed in a warts-and-all presentation of its subject. To only focus on Lennon's life with respect to only one side to him, his Left-wing political activism might seem legitimate, but in practice the film comes off as withholding information.

We never see the less-than-admirable traits of Lennon, of which there are rumored to be many. We never get a chance to judge whether his lifestyle was in keeping with what he was preaching. (A newscast stating he was shot outside his luxury apartment was the only indication in the film he and Ono didn't live in a hippie commune.)

Since the film is never completely open to Lennon's life, the facts given do not seem very trustworthy.

Whether it's taken as a biography or political commentary, "The U.S. vs. John Lennon" seems amateur at best. Among the scenes of the film: A montage of black-and-white photographs from the Vietnam War, including Eddie Adams' infamous photo of a Vietcong prisoner seconds before being shot, set to one of Lennon's peace-preaching songs; and the sound of gunshots over a darkening still of Lennon with his son to segue into the topic of his assassination.

Such techniques smack of trite self-indulgence rather than the work of accomplished filmmakers. It's hard to concentrate on the story of Lennon's life when you keep spotting examples of awkward and clunky filmmaking throughout the story.

But perhaps the rough edges of the film earn it some respect in a certain regard. Had it been given a larger budget, had it been endowed with smooth edits and sharp graphics and exuded an air of professionalism, there would be a chance it would lose some credibility. Such high-quality touches would clash with Lennon's philosophy that "all you need is love" – which seems to be the driving force of the movie as it currently stands.

Professionalism would not easily jibe with the feeling the public got from Lennon, who would undoubtedly enjoy the movie better as it is.

"The U.S. vs. John Lennon" may play more like a tribute than a hard-hitting biography, and a rough-hewn one at that. But at the very least, the attitude of the film is pleasantly compatible with its protagonist.

It's a Fiery Furnace at Pearl St.

A brother and sister duo defies the Osmond's with unique rock

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Hot damn, it's Halloween again and that means weirdness is spreading like the plague across many university campuses. People are getting antsy and music, of course, will always follow suit. Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton had a dose of weirdness last Thursday night, and though it wasn't Oct. 31 quite yet, something in the air was still making us breathe funny.

A young rock quartet called Sue started the night off. Ambient noise filled the room for the first song featuring a guitar and keyboard, and later grew with more of a heavy feel when the drummer and bassist came out.

The vocalist/guitarist had a young face, but tried too hard to be Thom Yorke of Radiohead. He opened his mouth too wide, and didn't quite match what was going on behind him. The bassist jumped all over, and lent sporadic background vocals throughout the show.

Though the drumming was dead-on solid, Sue didn't seem to make much headway with the audience. They seemed to have something going with their style, but they just needed to patch the relationship between the vocals and epic music growing in the backdrop.

The Fiery Furnaces' Eleanor and Matt Friedberger climbed to the stage after a long intermission. They timidly waved, and got situated with their band which featured percussionists Michael Goodman and Bob D'Amico, and guitarist Jason Loewenstein of the indie-rock band Sebadoh.

For many, the performance ended up being a dance party that lasted for several hours, but for other more devout fans, it was something else. The band ripped through their newest album, "Bitter Tea," in a half-hour set.

Of the 13-song album, the band played through bits and pieces of 11 songs without stopping. This is an unbelievable feat but significantly more difficult when considering the bizarre musical assortments of Eleanor and Matt Friedberger.

Communication between the five members was key – and it was painfully obvious when something went wrong. Matt Friedberger took his seat at the keyboard after a long break, and from there he acted as a conductor, for all intents and purposes. With the keyboard and glances, he told every member where to go, at what tempo. If there was any confusion, all eyes fell back on Matt's intense stare.

The Fiery Furnaces feature brother and sister musicians Matt and Eleanor Friedberger. The group has an EP and an album "Gallowsbird's Bark" under their belt.

"It took us a solid month to learn," Eleanor said afterwards, "but we still aren't even close to perfecting it." She wore a small, yellow Nico of the Velvet Underground pinafore dress, and acted shy but excited. She glanced back and forth from her brother to the audience.

Next they went backwards, playing songs from their earlier releases: an EP and "Gallowsbird's Bark." The band got more into a groove, and seemed much more comfortable. It was clear there was more of a risk with stranger music. The more rock-based songs from 2003 had much more consistency, while there were awkward glances and missed melodies with the "Bitter Tea" run through. It's dangerous to try and attempt a live performance with incredibly difficult jumps and tempo changes, especially if the vocals are against the beat and have odd lyrics.

Having heard what they can accomplish in the studio, however, gives a great hope that if anyone could pull it off, the Friedbergers would. They just need more time.

After the show, The Fiery Furnaces told the Daily Collegian they are hitting the studio in January. Dinosaur Jr. member J Mascis offered his studio in the Pioneer Valley to the band.

"We haven't written anything out yet," Eleanor said, "but we have a pretty clear idea of what we want to do."

The Fiery Furnaces plan to release its new album sometime over the summer.

Vocalist Eleanor Friedberger and her brother Matt told the Daily Collegian that they plan to release a new album next summer.

Their musical performance uses tempo changes and odd lyrics combined to create a unique dance infusion.

Minutemen win sixth straight

The NU offense was predominantly featured by running back Maurice Murray, who ran for 134 yards on 34 carries.

"In our league, I don't think it's possible to get a better I-Back matchup than we saw today with these two guys," UMass coach Don Brown said.

The No. 4 Minutemen (7-1, 5-0 Atlantic 10) continued their run of dominance against Northeastern.

Saturday's victory was the 20th in their last 21 meetings. The Huskies lone victory came in 2002 when Brown roamed the Northeastern sideline.

The game's lone score, a three-yard push into the end zone by UMass running back Tim Washington, came with just 2:38 left in the first half. The score was set up by a 47-yard punt return by J.J. Moore, who followed a crushing block by UMass defensive back Mike Meggett.

NU's best scoring chance came with 12:08 remaining in the fourth quarter. Trailing 7-0 and facing 4th-and-2 from the UMass 8-yard line, Murray took a hand-off from NU quarterback John Sperrazza, darted to the right and was tackled for a loss by senior safety James Ihedigbo.

The 33-carry effort was Baylark's 21st career 100-yard game. UMass is now 18-3 in games where Baylark reaches the century mark.

Baylark's milestone comes only one week after eclipsing the 4,000-career yard mark, joining current Arizona Cardinal Marcel Shipp (6,250) and Rene Ingolia (4,624) as the only Minutemen to reach the mark.

"Coming into the game we knew the weather was going to be a factor and it was going to be a day where we had to carry the ball on the ground a lot," Baylark said.

Baylark's day of celebration was inches away from being a day to forget.

Leading 7-0 with just under six minutes left in the fourth quarter and UMass driving inside the Huskies' red zone, Baylark, who had not fumbled in nearly 200-straight carries, was stripped by a horde of Northeastern defenders. Northeastern defensive back Richard Orah swept up the ball and took off down the left sideline.

The only UMass player that could stop Orah was UMass' 6-foot-2, 290-pound center Alex Miller.

Miller made a full dive at the speedy Orah, making a shoestring tackle, halting a 25-yard return and saving a possible disastrous turn of events for Baylark.

"I don't know how he tackled me. I know I just got clipped by my leg," Orah said. "He made the play that needed to be made."

Ihedigbo's interception late in the fourth quarter sealed the victory. The pick was the Buchanan Award Candidate's first interception of the year, and the seventh of his career.

UMass sophomore Liam Coen, statistically the most efficient quarterback in the nation, struggled to move the ball through the rain and wind all day, completing just six passes for 65 yards. UMass came into the contest averaging over 40 points a game.

Graduate student Tim Washington had the only score in UMass' 7-0 win over Northeastern on Saturday. The 3-yard run was his third of the year.

Most of Coen's passes were directed at tight end Brad Listordi. Listordi tied a season-high mark for catches with four receptions for 29 yards, while NU's passing attack was held to a meager 52 total yards.

UMass came close to opening up an early lead after a 14-play drive brought them to NU's 5-yard line.

UMass kicker Chris Koepplin lined up for a 29-yard attempt and missed wide-right.

The shutout was UMass' second of the year. The Minutemen held the Towson Tigers scoreless in their sixth game of the year in October. UMass, winners of six straight, will travel to No.11 New Hampshire (6-2, 3-2 Atlantic 10) to play its final regular season game on Saturday at Cowell Stadium.

Baylark runs through heavy rains, flooding soon at Parsons in a game that featured just one score in 60 minutes of action.

"With the elements today, offense is a tough deal," UMass coach Don Brown said. "When you deal with the elements you have to lean on your defense, and I thought our guys did an exceptional job today."

Weather can significantly change game plans. The ball gets wet and heavy quickly. Quarterbacks lose grip and strength, making it tougher to throw down field or into tight coverage. Tight ends get more looks on these days, and UMass tight end Brad Listorti caught four of Liam Coen's first five passes of the day.

But most of the offensive responsibility falls on the backs. UMass' Steve Baylark and NU's Maurice Murray had a combined 77 carries for 286 yards. Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen went to the air just 12 times.

"If you're going to throw, you have to throw a little bit early because the ball is going to get heavy," NU coach Rocky Hager said. "If we had them then we could have rotated 100 footballs today and they still probably would have been a little heavy. It's really one of those things that you have to face up to and execute the best you can."

Puddles formed inside the 10-yard line by the scoreboard before the game. Referees inspected the area but, aside from scheduling a major zamboni run through, couldn't remove the mini-lake by game time.

On Northeastern's first drive, Jason Hatchell's helmet slipped off, and the Huskies' Ty Sibert lost a shoe on NU's kickoff return to start the game. UMass players jogged up and down the sideline and shook arms and legs trying to stay loose.

The first pass of the game didn't come until the 9:00 mark of the first quarter, when NU quarterback John Sperrazza ran a play-action fake and found tight end Kendrick Ballantyne on an out route.

"I'd say we ended up with more run calls because of the weather," Hager said. "But we weren't afraid to throw it. The ball is less frequently thrown because it was heavy."

When the Huskies went to the shotgun formation with 3:45 left in the second quarter, a wayward snap flew past Sperrazza and deep into the backfield. Sperrazza fell on the ball and prevented a guaranteed score if a Minuteman picked it up, but the 16-yard loss on the play forced an eventual punt.

So with all of the added obstacles provided by the atrocious weather, it came down to two things: field position and ball control.

Both teams controlled the ball despite a shocking Baylark fumble with 5:55 left in the game, his first of the season – but the Minutemen won the field position chess match.

The only score on the day came in the second quarter on a run by tailback Tim Washington. But J.J. Moore, receiving punts on special teams, caught an NU punt at his own 45-yard line and returned it down to the Huskies' 11 to initiate the scoring drive.

From there, UMass pounded it in with a steady dose of Baylark and Washington to finish off the play.

"With the elements, it was a game of field position," safety James Ihedigbo said. "It was a physical, physical game. One of the most physical games that I've been a part of."

Because footing was loose and cutting was difficult, the speed of the game slowed down, even though the game in real time sped up. Because the ball stayed on the ground, there were no stoppages in play – the teams played the first 15-minute frame in 22 real-time minutes.

"Coming into the day, we knew that the weather was going to be a factor and we knew we were going to have to carry the ball on the ground a lot," Baylark said. "I just came into the game doing what I had to do under the conditions."

Baylark got to the 1,000-yard mark for the season Saturday, and became just the third back in Division I-AA history to rush for four straight 1000-yard seasons.

But all that matters to Baylark is the scoreboard at the end of the game. His Minutemen triumphed for the sixth straight weekend on Saturday.

Wind or rain, home or on the road – nothing can derail this train right now.

Northeastern University's Parsons Field was flooded during UMass' 7-0 win on Saturday. Heavy rains did not stop the game from being played.

Pair of losses end UMass' 2006 campaign

wasn't its forte on the offensive side of the ball. As for all the scoring chances it had on Sunday?

"That's what they were, they were chances," Koch said after yesterday's loss. "That's all you can ask for, is to create the chances. I was proud of the way we played in the second half, but we came up short again.

"We talked a lot over the last three weeks about playing 90 minutes," Koch added. "And we didn't play well in the first half. We didn't do the things we needed to do in the first half, and we did in the second half. We have to make sure that we can put that all together."

The Minutemen came into the weekend knowing they still had a shot at advancing to the A-10 tournament. It only took about 22 minutes on Friday to see that it just wasn't meant to be.

Saint Louis senior Casey Spiess redirected a pass over the head of UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons just 22 minutes into the game, giving the top team in the conference an early 1-0 lead. A little less than three minutes later, the Billikens (12-3-2, 8-0-1 A-10) showed UMass why they were the No. 9 team in the nation.

Senior John DiRaimondo took full advantage of a free kick from the top of the box, bending it over UMass' six-man wall and into the top left corner of the net.

The Billikens put the game out of reach with 2:31 remaining in the first half when freshman Kyle Hayes took a blistering shot from the top of the box and into the net. The ball was kicked so hard that a diving Simmons got his hands on it, but the ball kept going into the goal to give Saint Louis a 3-0 lead heading into the half.

UMass finished the first half with no shots on net, and the second half wasn't much different.

The Minutemen only had two shots on goal, both stemming from a Mike DeSantis penalty kick with a little less than 20 minutes left in regulation. Former UMass goalkeeper Nick Billman – who replaced Ross Kaufman at 20:00 – made the initial save on the penalty kick, but DeSantis was there to put away the rebound.

It was too little too late, however, and the flame was put out on UMass' 2006 campaign.

"We didn't play in the first half," Koch said. "I give [Saint Louis] a tremendous amount of credit. They're a good team. They're not ninth in the country for nothing. They move the ball better than any team we've played this year. And for us to play against them we had to play our best game, and we didn't.

"We're a young team that has a lot of promise and a lot of potential," Koch added. "Potential and promise is kind of a scary thing because you have to reach it. I think the future looks good, so that's a positive. We just have a lot of work to do between now and then."

Former UM goalkeeper returns to Rudd

a very good season this year, so things are working out well for them and for us."

Things have worked out a whole lot better for Billman and the Billikens this season. Saint Louis went into the weekend as the No. 9 team in the nation, and stands atop the Atlantic 10 standings with an 11-3-2 overall record.

Friday was Billman's sixth appearance of the season, and came into the game with a 0.99 goals-against average and a .733 save percentage. He allowed UMass' only goal of the game after he robbed Minuteman midfielder Mike DeSantis of a penalty kick. DeSantis was able to get his own rebound and put it into the net.

It may have been a coincidence that Billman was on the field when the Minutemen were officially eliminated from playoff contention on Friday, but the former UMass goalkeeper held strong that it wasn't about beating his old team; all he cared about was coming out with a win.

"I like a lot of these guys on [UMass] and I wish them success, but at the same time, we have to win," Billman said. "And that's what we came here to do.

"They have a very young team," Billman added about UMass' late-season struggles. "In the next couple of years, if they can keep all of these guys here, then they are going to be a very good team."

While the Billikens head to the postseason, UMass will have plenty of time to look at what went wrong in the second half of its roller-coaster ride of a season.

Either way, both sides acknowledged there are no hard feelings.

"Zack's a good keeper," Billman said. "He's very athletic, and he's a great guy. I'm proud of him. I wish Zack all the best of luck. He did well today. Some of those goals were stoppable."

"It's good to see Nick," UMass' Simmons said. "I'm glad he could come back and get some time today. It's a shame he's not getting more time in general. He's a very good keeper, and he's a friend of mine; so, it was great to see him, and I'm glad he got the respect he deserves."

Minutewomen hope for NCAA wild card

Villarroel headed an attempt at a tally.

The shot was blocked, however, by a Duke's defender who had aligned herself on the goal line to cover for an incapacitated Bondi. The ball bounced out of harm's way after deflecting off the defender's arm. No hand-ball was called on the play, much to the disappointment of Rudy.

"That was a great chance in the first half," Rudy said.

The scoreless tie was finally broken in the game's 75th minute with a monumental tally.

With about 15:45 left to go in regulation, sophomore forward Vanessa Patry hit a through-ball to freshman Christina Adams. The pass attempt winded up getting knocked back to Patry, who unleashed a shot from about 20 yards away from the net. The shot deflected off of Adams, past the dive of Bondi, for Adams' first goal of her collegiate career.

The first-year student from Archbishop Williams High School had appeared in 12 games for the Minutewomen this season, but hadn't registered a point until scoring the go-ahead goal.

Rudy said he is very happy for Adams, but admits he did not learn she scored the goal until after the game due to having his vision blocked by a swarm of players around the net.

After the score, the Maroon and White milked the remaining time off the clock by aimlessly dribbling the ball around the field.

"That was our goal – to end with a win," Rudy said. "To go out victoriously, go out in a positive way and put ourselves in the best possible position to maybe get one of those last wild card spots."

One thing that did not work in the Minutewomen's favor was their frustrating loss to the Saint Louis Billikens on Friday.

"We played a very, very good team," Rudy said. "In fact, they were better than their scouting reports."

St. Louis had more shots on goal than UMass, with a final tally of 9-1.

Freshman forward Julia Bradenburg registered the game's lone goal in the 83rd minute.

She fielded a pass from senior midfielder Dee Guempel and fired it from 12 yards out to beat UMass goalkeeper Kristin Walker.

Senior defender Stephanie Barrett assisted freshman Cristina Adams' first collegiate goal yesterday. The score gave the Minutewomen a 1-0 win over Duquesne on Sunday, however, it was not enough for UMass to advance to the playoffs.

UM to miss playoffs after loss to URI

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

With its postseason on the line, the Massachusetts field hockey team (6-14, 3-4 Atlantic 10) played its best game of the season Saturday afternoon in front of a season-high 373 fans.

Every major statistical category slanted heavily in favor of the Minutewomen – shots (27-5), shots on goal (14-4) and penalty corners (11-1). They dominated possession and displayed a rare tenacity.

The Rhode Island Rams won just one category – the score.

The Minutewomen fell to URI 1-0 to end their season. UMass will miss the conference tournament for just the third time in 12 years.

"You can't play a better half of hockey," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "It's tough, but that's the nature of the sport. Sometimes you do everything right, and it just doesn't fall for you."

At the outset, play was back and forth. The ball rarely left the neutral zone, and neither team was able to establish anything resembling momentum. This was due to the inclement weather that comes with fall in the Pioneer Valley.

The weather forced a delay 12 minutes into the game. A delay is never something a player hopes for, but Shea saw the delay as a positive for the team.

"I thought the delay worked to our advantage," Shea said. "I thought we were playing high-energy hockey, but it wasn't a smart energy. When it's not a smart energy it becomes somewhat frantic."

The Minutewomen put together a few good chances midway through the game's first period. An offensive rush gave the Minutewomen a corner, but they could not convert. The officials awarded them another corner immediately after the first, but once again URI's standout goalkeeper M.J. Britt made the save.

The coaches of the A-10 consider Britt one of the best goalkeepers in the conference. Her 1.87 goals-against average is only good enough for fourth in the A-10, but she ranks second in saves and saves per game.

"[Britt] is a very good goalie," Shea said. "We needed to be a little smarter and not crash into her but give some space to force some rebounds. But she does a great job. She saves the savable shots and has been good for them."

Britt was almost solely responsible for the victory that clinched a spot in the conference tournament for the Rams – Richmond, Temple and St. Joe's are the other teams that make up the tournament pool.

The URI score came at the 49-minute mark. Jill Powers had just entered the game as a substitute for Christine Kazmierski when she beat freshman goalkeeper Sarah Williams. The tally was Powers' seventh goal of the year.

The Minutewomen dominated possession from that point on. In the game's final 20 minutes they recorded 13 shots on goal. This offensive barrage saw the Minutewomen receive five penalty corners, but again, they couldn't beat Britt.

Typically when a team controls play, as the Maroon and White did on Saturday, not scoring is the result of poor shot selection and a total lack of patience. This was certainly not the case against URI.

Whenever UMass backed URI into its own zone and forced consistent offensive pressure, URI's defense and goalkeepers met the challenge with equally impressive defensive play. The Minutewomen did appear, at times, to be too aggressive, but even so, their aggression led to penalty corners if not direct quality scoring chances.

"We needed to be a little smarter," Shea said. "But you have to give [URI] credit, too."

The loss is especially tough for the three seniors on the UMass roster. Forward Gina Sanders and defenders Paula Verma and Kwylan Jaggassar's careers came to an end.

Sanders and Verma have been great for UMass this season. Although Sanders scored just one goal, the captain provided the team with a feisty veteran leader – and sportswriters with some great sound bytes.

Verma, although listed as a junior, is academically a senior and will not be returning next season.

Jaggassar was a mainstay in the UMass backfield in her four years until she suffered an injury to her thumb earlier this season.

The loss is obviously tough, but Shea certainly feels as though the legacy that these three left on the UMass field hockey program will not be marred by losing.

"You're not defined by wins and losses," Shea said. "The legacy and footprint left by our three seniors has nothing to do with wins and losses but has everything to with the character of the girls."

Swimming and diving teams split decisions

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

In 2005, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team suffered its worst loss of the season to the Army Black Knights by a score of 178.5-64.5. The women's team fell as well, but lost by just three points, 123-120.

This was certainly not the case in 2006. On Saturday, the Minutewomen defeated Army 162-138. Strong showings from senior Liz Lovejoy and sophomore diver Karen Upperco were instrumental in the Minutewomen win. The Minutemen's performance also improved. The final race of the meet decided the contest and Army prevailed to clinch a 155-145 victory.

The Minutewomen swam well early – winning three of the first four events. Sophomore Taryn Prout got the team started, winning the 1,000-yard freestyle with a time of 10:53.09.

"I think Taryn Prout had a good day," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "She came right around in the next event and she finished fifth in the [200-yard freestyle] but that's a good time for her right now and then she came back and finished second in the [500-yard freestyle]. That's a tough triple to do."

Lovejoy won the next women's event, the 200-yard freestyle, with a time of 154.88 – this was more than two full seconds faster than the second place swimmer. She also proved victorious in the 100-yard freestyle, finished second in the 100-yard butterfly, and swam the anchor leg in the 400-yard freestyle relay. Her efforts scored 33 points for UMass.

Junior Allison Volpe swam well. The freestyle specialist finished first in two of her three individual events and swam the opening lap in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

"Allison Volpe had a good day," Newcomb said. "She won the [50-yard freestyle], didn't swim that well in the [100-yard freestyle], but came out to lead us in our relay and swam the [100-yard freestyle] a second faster."

Upperco won both the one-meter and three-meter diving events for the women. The Atlantic 10 named her Diver of the Year last year for her stellar freshman campaign and it appears as though she is only getting better.

The men's meet ended up a lot closer than the women's. Heading into the final event – the 400-meter freestyle relay – just one point separated the two teams. The race would end just as close. The Black Knights snatched a victory away from the Minutemen – winning the race by .58 hundredths of a second.

The loss did not crush the spirits of UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth. The performance of his side pleased him to no end.

"The team showed up," Yarworth said. "We swam with enthusiasm, intensity, desire, and we gave ourselves every opportunity to win. We couldn't quite pull it out in the end. But compared to last year when we swam Army and we got smashed, I'm just really psyched right now."

Senior Evan Swisher was the star of the day for the men's team. The backstroke specialist participated in four events for the Minutemen. He won all three individual races and swam the first leg of the team's win in the 200-yard medley relay.

One of the conference's best in the backstroke, Swisher won the 100-yard backstroke by more than two seconds – posting a time of 51.76.

"Evan's on fire," Yarworth said. "[Swisher] is having a great senior year so far. He's been training at a different level. I wish I could've had him for the last relay, but he can't swim every race."

The divers deserve praise for the results of the men's team as well – particularly junior R.J. Rappe. The captain continued his dominance of the competition, winning both the one- and three-meter dives. In the one meter, he won by 36.83 points and in the three meter there was a 44.4 point gap between he and the second-place finisher.

The last race of the meet created quite a stir at Joseph R. Rogers, Jr. Pool. The pool room seats just over 200 people, and fans of UMass swimming packed the house wall-to-wall.

The crowd erupted as Army's Efri Ruthenberg and UMass' Trevor Ziegler, a freshman, started the decisive final lap of the 400-meter freestyle relay neck and neck – however Ruthenberg held Ziegler off to prevent the upset.

Baylark opens floodgates

Senior running back Steve Baylark became just the third player in Division I-AA history to rush for 1,000 yards in four different seasons. His 152 rushing yards in Saturday's win put him in the same company as New Hampshire's Jerry Azumah and Georgia Southern's Adrian Peterson.

BROOKLINE — On a day when the pylons in the corner of one end zone inside Parsons Field could prove useful as flotation devices, the football teams of Massachusetts and Northeastern played what both coaches called "the most physical game" of the year, with the Minutemen prevailing 7-0 on a rain-soaked Saturday.

Minutemen senior running back Steve Baylark led the UMass offense, rushing for 152 yards, and becoming only the third I-AA player to have four 1,000-yard rushing seasons. He joined Jerry Azumah of New Hampshire and Adrian Peterson of Georgia Southern.

Both teams relied heavily on the running game winds hitting speeds of 20 miles-per-hour and torrential rainfalls restricted the play calling of each squad.

UMass can't be stopped by rain

BROOKLINE — The weather over the last week was dismal.

A World Series game was cancelled for the first time in 10 years, and rain smothered the entire Northeast for the majority of Saturday.

College football suffered the most. The Massachusetts football team beat Northeastern, 7-0, amidst a rainstorm fit for the movie "Twister."

At Parsons Field, packed into Brookline suburbia, fell victim to the hard rain on Saturday. Despite the turf field, flooding overwhelmed the end zones and the corners of the field near the pylons.

Baseball, tennis, golf, soccer, lacrosse – all would have been cancelled in light of Saturday's rain. Even some high school football games in the area were rescheduled for Sunday.

But UMass and Northeastern played through the mon-

The Massachusetts men's soccer team needed a lot to happen over the weekend if it wanted to live to see past Sunday. But Saint Louis ended any and all hope UMass might have had of making the postseason on Friday at Rudd Field, while Duquesne added insult to injury on Sunday.

Duquesne (11-6-1, 6-3 Atlantic 10) defeated UMass 1-0 yesterday in the regular season finale for both teams, closing the door on a disappointing season for the Minutemen. UMass (8-8-3, 2-6-1 A-10) went into yesterday's matchup knowing there would be no A-10 tournament, thanks to a 3-1 loss to Saint Louis just two days before.

"Were we really here?" UMass coach Sam Koch asked after Friday's loss. "Did this game really happen?"

It happened, and heading into Sunday, the goal for the Maroon and White was simple: finish the season on a positive note.

That theory took a hit with just over five minutes remaining in the first half when junior Travis MacKenzie scored his sixth goal of the season to give the Dukes a 1-0 lead. MacKenzie redirected a South Sabs shot with his head, and into the top left corner of the goal.

The Minutemen had plenty of chances in the second half. Two of the more realistic scoring opportunities came from the DeSantis brothers. Duquesne goalkeeper Zach Varga made a diving save on sophomore Mike DeSantis' wide-open shot with 16 minutes to play, while freshman Mark DeSantis hit the post just 10 minutes later.

That was the theme all season long for UMass. Finishing just Saint Louis goalkeeper Nick Billman had a bittersweet moment on Friday afternoon at Rudd Field.

With 20 minutes remaining in the game, and holding a commanding 3-0 lead, Billikens coach Dan Donigan made a substitution that, in most cases, would be a slap in the face to the opponent. But in this case, the senior backup goalkeeper for Saint Louis received plenty of cheers from the UMass crowd as he made his return to Amherst.

"It was special because I knew a bunch of these guys," Billman said. "I played [at UMass] for two and a half years, so it was good to get in."

Billman stood between the pipes for the Minutemen for two and a half seasons. A shoulder injury last year put him out of action, and eventually led to Billman losing his job in goal. UMass sophomore Zack Simmons took over, and he's been the Maroon and White's go-to-guy ever since.

Billman transferred to Saint Louis last year, and has been the backup goalkeeper for a successful Billikens team in 2006. He started in 18 games for the Minutemen during the two and a half seasons he was in Amherst, posting a 10-7-1 record, and a 1.57 goals-against average.

"There were a lot of family issues," Billman said on his reasons for leaving UMass for Saint Louis. "I wanted to go back home and play with all my buddies. It wasn't that I didn't like UMass, it's just that the situation wasn't a perfect fit for me at the time.

"I got injured in the preseason, and then we had a change of assistant coaches, and we just had different viewpoints," he added. "But obviously they had

Minutewomen down and out of postseason

Despite beating Duquesne by a score of 1-0 yesterday, the Massachusetts women's soccer team's (11-6, 4-4 A-10) loss to Saint Louis on Friday helped lock them out of an A-10 playoff spot. However, all hope is not lost for UMass coach Jim Rudy and his Minutewomen. There is still a glimmer of hope that the Maroon and White could find itself in an NCAA postseason tournament wild card spot.

What may have saved UMass season was yesterday's narrow victory in Pittsburgh.

"Our kids came out and they played hard because they wanted to finish the season with a win," Rudy said. "And 11-6 looks much better than 10-7, and they wanted to get that consideration."

Near-misses were the theme of the contest played under brutal weather conditions yesterday. Rudy said that winds may have reached 25 miles per hour, which, along with the Duke's field-turf facility, did not make for an easy day.

Nearing the end of the first half, freshman Amy Ballew took a free kick from 45 yards out that tried to squeeze itself under the crossbar. Duquesne goalkeeper Virginia Bonds however, made an airborne-save to knock the ball near the goal line.

UMass freshman Sydney Stoll took it from there and scooped it back in where senior Nadia

Black Bears put Mass Attack in its place

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

There was no sequel to Thursday's shocker for the Massachusetts hockey team. After shocking No. 8 New Hampshire to the tune of a 3-2 road victory, the Minutemen (2-1-1, 1-1 HEA) suffered their first defeat of the 2006-07 season Saturday, a 4-1 loss to No. 1 Maine (6-0-1-0 HEA).

The Mass Attack fought hard against the nation's top team for the better part of three periods, but after a power outage delayed the game, the Black Bears pulled away late in the third frame with the eventual game-winner and a pair of empty netters, making the game seem more one-sided than it really was.

Maine struck early in the game, jumping to a 1-0 lead on a breakaway goal by senior Michel Léveille at 16:46 in the first period. Teddy Purcell fed Josh Soares in the Maine zone. Soares sent a pass up to Léveille, who sprinted into the slot and fired a shot past UMass goaltender Jon Quick.

The second period went scoreless, but also went powerless for a short time. Intense weather outside the sold-out Alfond Arena caused all power in the building to go out with 7:51 left in the period. The teams returned to the locker rooms, and the ice resurfaced until the emergency generator started.

The 5,450 fans in attendance waited for play to resume, while the referees tried to figure out how to play out the rest of the game.

The teams returned to play at 17:51 of the game, then returned to the locker rooms for the ice to be resurfaced before the final 10 minutes of play.

In the final frame, however, play picked up for both sides. A trio of freshmen contributed to the game-tying goal, as Will Ortiz notched his first collegiate score on the power play at 4:41. Ortiz is now tied for second on the team in scoring with three points on that goal and a pair of assists.

Freshman Justin Braun passed to classmate Martin Nolet at the blueline. Nolet then fed Ortiz at the top of the right circle, who beat Maine goalie Ben Bishop glove-side to knot the game at one apiece.

The score also marked Nolet's first career assist. He earned his first goal in the season opener against Sacred Heart. Braun was also credited with an assist, his second in two games.

Maine's Bret Tyler scored the eventual game-winner with a wrap-around score at 15:24. Maine would add a pair of empty-net goals in the final minute with Quick pulled from the net for UMass.

Wes Clark and Léveille each grabbed an empty-netter to put the game out of reach for the Minutemen. The final score was 4-1, as the Minutemen took their first loss of the season and first in the Hockey East.

Maine outshot the Minutemen 28-17 in the game, dominating the first and third periods. However, UMass came out strong in the second, winning the shots battle 10-9. The Mass Attack kept the game close for most of the game, but it seemed that Maine finally flexed its top-ranked muscles in the third, scoring the game-winner, and not allowing the Minutemen any chance at a comeback.

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

The Indianapolis Colts became the first team to start 7-0 in consecutive seasons since the 1929-31 Green Bay Packers in last night's 34-31 win over the Denver Broncos.

Patrick and Murray to speak at the Cage

Gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick and running mate Tim Murray will speak today about public higher education, healthcare and the current economic situation in Massachusetts.

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will open its doors tomorrow to host a "Fresh Start for Massachusetts" community meeting with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick and Tim Murray, Patrick's running mate for Lieutenant Governor.

The event, which will take place at the Curry Hicks Cage located at 102 Hicks Way, will begin at 3 p.m.

The pair will voice their opinions on public higher education, health care and the economic situation in Massachusetts. Along with discussing their vision, they will also answer questions from the community in an open forum. The meeting is free and open to the public.

"We are excited to host these candidates and to discuss their stand on public higher education in Massachusetts," said Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez, whose organization is hosting the event.

"We see this as a way to engage students in the political process," Mendez said.

Students have expressed their increased interest by registering to vote.

"Over the past three weeks, a coalition of students and faculty has registered over 1,600 students to vote in Massachusetts, and we've mailed in hundreds of absentee ballot requests," said Mendez.

While Mendez has invited all major gubernatorial candidates to speak at UMass, he is still waiting to hear back from the Healey, Ross and Mihos campaigns.

UMass was able to secure a spot on Patrick's "Together We Can" Tour, thanks in large part to voting activist Ron Bell, deputy campaign manager for the Patrick camp.

"This campaign is about bringing in new leadership, fresh ideas and new ideas," Bell said. "Young people who may not have been involved in the political process are now being given a chance."

Bell, who said he was very pleased that Patrick was paying attention to the often under-appreciated 18-25 demographic, said that he sees a lot of himself in Patrick.

"We share the same values," he said. "He listens to people and then takes action. That's very important."

Bell, a resident of Milton, is seen as a powerful vote-getting force in the city of Boston, and most notably in Dorchester, where he works as a deacon at Greater Love Tabernacle church. He is also the founder of Dunk the Vote, a nonpartisan voting advocacy group that registered approximately 35,000 black, Latino and Asian voters in Massachusetts.

Patrick, who became the first African American to win a major party nomination after he swept the Democratic primary last month, is well known for his rise from poverty on Chicago's South Side to a top position in the Clinton administration.

Patrick is running against Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey,

UMass fails to make the cut in college student fitness ranking

The university is now offering group exercise classes, holding seminars on strength training and proper exercise techniques, and plans to offer personal training for students by the spring semester.

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts cited budget, fitness center locations and the University's reputation as possible reasons that UMass was omitted from the Men's Fitness article published in the November 2006 issue ranking the Top 25 fittest colleges and universities in the nation.

"[UMass] needs to put more money towards fitness programs," said Ryan Caselden, a senior history major. Caselden also suggested the poor locations of student facilities on campus as a reason that students at UMass might not be as active as students at other colleges and universities.

The magazine ranked the schools based on student responses to a 17-question survey addressing daily amounts of exercise, consumption of alcohol and fast food, nutritional cafeteria options and school physical education programs. Men's Fitness graded each college on four categories: intake, behavior, school offerings and campus culture of fitness.

"There are a lot of kids who do work out," said Ashley Donahue, a kinesiology major who exercises daily. "But there are just as many who do not."

"UMass just seems to get a bad rap among other schools," said Ryan Benson, a junior majoring in Sport Management. Benson believes UMass is taking positive steps towards a healthier future with the plans to construct a new $50 million student recreation center.

Abbi Lane, the Assistant Director of Campus Recreation for Fitness, Wellness at UMass, credited the University for striving to improve the health and fitness of the student body.

"If you did not play intramurals or you were not comfortable in the weight room, you probably were not going to venture into fitness," she said. "Now we are trying to bridge that gap, to get everyone involved and make everyone feel comfortable and find something they like about [exercise]."

The University is now offering group exercise classes, holding seminars on strength training and proper exercise techniques, and plans to offer personal training for students by the spring semester, Lane said.

Neal Boulton, editor-in-chief of Men's Fitness magazine, told the Associated Press that the top-ranked schools in the study were able to incorporate fitness and nutrition into the daily life of students.

"They provide a very balanced lifestyle within which anyone could exist, whether they are kind of cheating a little or in a fitness mode," Boulton said.

The recent push towards fitness at UMass, according to Lane, is to improve the whole lifestyle of the campus and the student body.

"We need to get the word out about the services that are offered, so hopefully more people will take advantage of them," she said. Better collaboration in the future between Residence Life and the fitness centers would only serve to improve the new health and fitness programs, Lane said.

The top ranked school, according to the study, is Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pa. Dickinson students are currently required to complete a mandatory number of physical education courses to graduate.

Men's Fitness credited Dickinson's recreation center, nutritional food choices at the dining commons and the college's physical education requirement in choosing Dickinson as the fittest college in the nation.

While UMass does not offer a physical education program, according to Lane, it is taking the necessary steps towards health and fitness that may have UMass on the Men's Fitness list in the future.

"With the addition of the group exercise classes we are pulling in a lot more people who have not worked out before," Lane said. "[The University] is making huge strides."

Documentary addresses 9/11

"Terrorstorm," a documentary that aims to expose the government's alleged role in terrorist attacks such as 9-11 and London's July 7 train bombings, will strike Northampton on Nov. 16.

The documentary will be shown at 6 p.m. at the Media Education Foundation, located at 60 Masonic St. in Northampton. Dylan Avery, director of "Loose Change," claims that "Terrorstorm"'s director Alex Jones "knocks it out of the park yet again."

Jones has created 15 documentaries so far since his first release in 1997.

Documentaries such as "Terrorstorm" have become far more popular since the documentary "Loose Change" exploded onto the Internet in 2005. Public opinion of the documentary has been split, with some people celebrating it as one of the best ever made and others saying the only shocking things about it are its flaws.

The second edition of "Loose Change" can be purchased online or viewed for free on Google Video, where it has been viewed over 2 million times. It is about 1 1/2 hours long.

Avery planned to make a fictional movie about a group of friends who discover that the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks were an "inside job." Along the way, Avery himself became convinced of this.

Although the film covers information Americans may already be privy to, it also questions what went on in the buildings and on the flights. For example, the film examines the size of the hole caused by the crash of the American Airlines Flight into the Pentagon. The documentary claims that the size of the hole is questionable and suspicious when linked with the lack of debris and landscape damage consistent with the prior airliner crashes.

Four arrested in Kennedy break-in

A University of Massachusetts resident assistant called University police Sunday, Oct. 29 after witnessing a group of suspicious men attempting to enter dorm rooms in Kennedy tower in the Southwest residential area. The suspects were roaming the hallways at 5 a.m. checking for unlocked rooms.

Police arrested Rickie Singleton and Koren Khalid Quesada of Worcester, Mass., Dean Sieger of Rutland, Mass. and Derek Thomas of Holden, Mass.

The four men were charged with breaking and entering into residence hall rooms and theft of personal property.

The police are asking for campus assistance as they have not yet found the owners of the property the four men carried at the time of their arrest. Police also believe these same men broke into parked vehicles near Kennedy and stole several items. Details of the stolen property have not yet been released by police.

Students are advised to check their rooms and vehicles for missing property and report their missing items to the University Police Department. Residents are also warned to lock their rooms when they step out and during the night to prevent theft.

Police can be contacted at 545-2121 for non-emergencies or at their offices, which are located in Dickinson Hall.

Amherst Police assist female found semiconscious in bathtub

Friday October 27

7:55 p.m.

A resident of Jeffrey Lane called the Amherst Police when she was approached by a white male at her house, who claimed to live on the next street over. The resident, who didn't recognize the man, said that he ran into a white van and drove away when questioned. According to a police report, the man may be the same person who has given various stories while trying to sell magazine subscriptions for integrity programs out of Las Vegas. Police officers found nothing in a search of the area. The case is still being investigated by Amherst police.

Saturday October 28

1:29 a.m.

Amherst Police medically assisted a female on Summer Street who was semiconscious in a bathtub. According to a police report, there was an odor of alcohol and friends said that she drank approximately half of a bottle of vodka from 9:00 p.m. to 1:29 p.m. The female was semiconscious for 1 1/2 hours before police arrived on the scene. An officer remained on the scene and assisted while an ambulance was sent from Northampton.

Brian J. Connolly of 96 Gold St. in Belchertown, Mass. was arrested on charges of operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol, marked lanes violation, speeding, negligent operation of a motor vehicle, possession of open container of alcohol and possession of a Class B substance. According to a police report, Connolly was stopped for numerous traffic violations and failed a field sobriety test.

7:50 p.m.

Allison Beina of 171 Pomeroy Lane in Amherst, Mass. and Jillian Mary Roberts of 17 Wilbert Drive were arrested for being minors in possession of alcohol. Roberts was also arrested for false use of a liquor ID card or license. According to a police report, Beina had a 30-pack of Miller Light and Roberts had a 12-pack and a pint of French Kiss Vanilla Liquor.

10:40 p.m.

David Zion of 871 Flanders Dr. in North Woodmere, N.Y., Shlomo Betesh of 76 Prospect Ave. in Hewlett, N.Y. and Asaf Haim of 909 Fairview Ave. in North Woodmere, N.Y. were arrested for being minors in possession of alcohol. Zion and Betesh were also arrested for false use of a liquor or ID card. According to a police report, Betesh purchased a 30-pack of Coors Light and a 750 ml. bottle of Jose Cuervo from University Liquors. When an officer approached the car, he discovered that all three people were 19 years old.

Sunday October 29

12:37 a.m.

Brian J. Cardone of 192 Drake Ave. in New Rochelle, N.Y. and Bryce Giorgio of 27 Forest Acres Drive in Haverhill, Mass. were arrested for unlawful noise when Amherst Police responded to a noise complaint in the Mill Valley apartments. According to a police report, there were approximately 100 guests in the apartment, with a loud stereo and screaming. The residents became uncooperative with police and attempted to close the door on the officers.

1:44 a.m.

Amherst Police responded to a report of fighting in front of 1039 North Pleasant St. The caller also claimed to hear gunshots, and according to a police report, one male claimed that a white male with a basketball jersey with the number 14 on it wrestled him to the ground and began to strike him in the face. Another male said that an unknown male punched him in the face repeatedly while he was pinned to the ground.

Study shows explicit song lyrics may lead to earlier sexual activity

By Eric Heisig
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — From Elvis Presley shaking his hips on live television to more recent instances, such as Janet Jackson's "wardrobe malfunction," sex is a part of music. Often times, the lyrics match the bawdiness of a performance.

Recently, however, there has been more emphasis on the lyrics these performers sing.

In a recent study, it was found that teens who listen to excessive dirty song lyrics are more likely to have sex than those who do not listen to them.

While the controversy is coming to light now more than ever, dirty writing is nothing new.

"Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' is filled with people committing adultery and performing all sorts of illicit acts," Roberta Trites, Illinois State University director of Graduate Studies and English professor, said. "If 'Canterbury Tales' has been doing that, it's not reasonable to assume that sexually explicit material is only a function of the 20th or 21st Century."

Sexually explicit song lyrics are not just contemporary either.

"'Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered' is very sexually explicit. It is about a woman wanting to have sex with a man. This is something that has been part of our musical culture. Bawdy folk songs have existed since the first millennia. They are nothing new," Trites said.

She explained that even as far back as the Bible has sexual references, with the 'Song of Solomon' alluding to it.

In addition, while song lyrics are coming under question, Trites is certain of one thing.

"There is no study that demonstrates that adolescents who read about sexuality become more sexually active," she explained.

Rocio Rivadeneyra, an assistant professor of psychology, explained some of the research done in the field.

"The content seems to be important. If you're watching more 'sexy' programming or listening to degrading lyrics, then you're more likely to eventually have it affect your world view," Rivadeneyra said.

Bird flu strain detected in China

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

Scientists in Hong Kong and the United States have detected a new strain of bird flu in China and warn that it might move deeper into Eurasia.

Scientists have discovered a new strain of bird flu that appears to sidestep current vaccines. It's infecting people as well as poultry in Asia, and some researchers fear its evolution may have been steered by the vaccination programs designed to protect poultry from earlier types of the H5N1 flu.

The discovery by Yi Guan of the University of Hong Kong and colleagues is reported in Tuesday's issue of Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

The new variant has become the primary version of the bird flu in several provinces of China and has spread to Hong Kong, Laos, Malaysia and Thailand, the researchers report. It is being called H5N1 Fujian-like, to distinguish it from earlier Hong Kong and Vietnam variants.

"We don't know what is driving this," report co-author Dr. Robert G. Webster of St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, Tenn., said in a telephone interview.

New vaccines will have to be developed, Webster said.

Many scientists are going to think the vaccination program encouraged the virus to evolve resistance, he added, but high-quality vaccines can reduce the level of illness and prevent emergence of variants.

While the new virus has infected people, there is no evidence that it

Scientists find 100 million-year-old bee

PORTLAND, Ore. — A scientist has found a 100 million-year-old bee trapped in amber, making it possibly the oldest bee ever found.

"I knew right away what it was, because I had seen bees in younger amber before," said George Poinar, a zoology professor at Oregon State University.

The bee is about 40 million years older than previously found bees. The discovery of the ancient bee may help explain the rapid expansion and diversity of flowering plants during that time.

Poinar found the bee in amber from a mine in the Hukawng Valley of northern Myanmar, formerly known as Burma. Many researchers buy bags of amber from miners to search for fossils. Amber, a translucent semi-precious stone, is a substance that begins as tree resin. The sticky resin entombs and preserves insects, pollen and other small organisms.

Also embedded in the amber are four kinds of flowers. "So we can imagine this little bee flitting around these tiny flowers millions of years ago," Poinar said.

An article on his discovery will appear Friday in the journal Science, co-authored by bee researcher Bryan Danforth of Cornell University.

In the competing journal Nature this week, there is an article about the unraveling of the genetic map of the honeybee. The recently completed sequencing of the honeybee genome already is giving scientists fresh insights into the social insects.

Poinar's ancient male bee, Melittosphex burmensis, is not a honeybee and not related to any modern bee family.

The pollen-eating bee has a few features of meat-eating wasps, such as narrow hind legs, but the body's branched hairs are a key feature of pollen-spreading bees.

The 100 million-year-old bee is the oldest bee found to date, and may help explain rapid expansion and diversity of flowering plants.

The bee — about one-fifth the size of today's worker honeybee — has a heart-shaped head.

But the ancient bee was probably an evolutionary dead end and may not have given rise to modern bees, scientists said.

"It's exciting to see something that seems so different from what we think of as modern bees," Danforth said.

St. Louis is 'most dangerous city'

Violent crime in St. Louis increased nearly 20 percent from 2004 to 2005.

By Christopher Leonard
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — A surge in violence made St. Louis the most dangerous city in the country, leading a trend of violent crimes rising much faster in the Midwest than in the rest of nation, according to an annual list.

The city has long fared poorly in the rankings of the safest and most dangerous American cities compiled by Morgan Quitno Press. Violent crime surged nearly 20 percent in St. Louis from 2004 to last year, when the rate of such crimes rose most dramatically in the Midwest, according to FBI figures released in June.

"It's just sad the way this city is," resident Sam Dawson said. "On the news you hear killings, someone's been shot."

The ranking, being released Monday, came as the city was still celebrating Friday's World Series victory at the new Busch Stadium. St. Louis has been spending millions of dollars on urban renewal even as the crime rate climbs.

Mayor Francis Slay did not return calls to his office seeking comment Sunday.

Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno Press, a private research and publishing company specializing in state and city reference books, said he was not surprised to see St. Louis top the list, since it has been among the 10 most dangerous cities for years.

The study looks at crime only within St. Louis city limits, with a population of about 330,000, Morgan said. It doesn't take into account the suburbs in St. Louis County, which has roughly 980,000 residents.

Visiting St. Louis on Thursday, FBI director Robert Mueller said it was too early to tell why some types of crime were rising faster in the Midwest.

Mueller said the FBI is working harder to form partnerships with police departments to launch programs like St. Louis' Safe Streets task force, which focuses police efforts on problematic neighborhoods.

The safest city in 2005 was Brick, N.J., with a population about 78,000, followed by Amherst, N.Y., and Mission Viejo, Calif. The second most dangerous city was Detroit, followed by Flint, Mich., and Compton, Calif.

The bad news for St. Louis was good for Camden, N.J., which in 2005 was named the most dangerous city for the second year in a row.

Camden Mayor Gwendolyn Faison said Sunday she was thrilled to learn that her city no longer topped the most-dangerous list.

"You made my day," said Faison, who has served since 2000. "There's a new hope and a new spirit."

Cities are ranked based on more than just their crime rate, Morgan said. Individual crimes such as rape or burglary are measured separately, compared to national averages and then compiled to give a city its ranking. Crimes are weighted based on their level of danger.

The national FBI figures released in June showed the murder rate in St. Louis jumped 16 percent from 2004 to 2005, compared with 4.8 percent nationally. The overall violent crime rate increased nearly 20 percent, compared with 2.5 percent nationally.

Associated Press writer Rebecca Santana in Trenton, N.J., contributed to this report.

"Loose Change" producer Korey Rowe responded to some of the errors in the first edition in an interview, claiming, "We know there are errors in the documentary, and we've actually left them in there so that people discredit us and do the research for themselves."

The third edition of "Loose Change" is now in production. Avery aims to correct the mistakes in the first two versions as well as to offer solutions. The third edition is scheduled to be released in American movie theaters sometime in 2007, according to the film's official Web site, www.loosechange.com.

Virus continues to expand

can pass easily from person to person, Webster said.

However, he added, "this virus is continuing to drift."

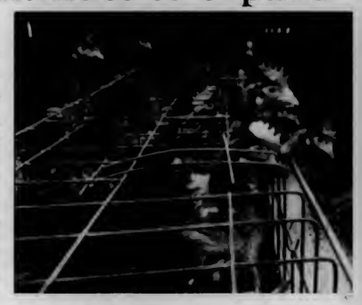
Dr. Michael J. Perdue, of the World Health Organization's Global Influenza Program in Zurich, Switzerland, said the new variant doesn't indicate any increased risk for people "other than the fact it seems to be pretty widespread."

The virus is continuing to change, he added.

Perdue, who was not part of Webster's research team, said WHO is working with the Chinese Ministry of Health to develop a vaccine for the new form of the virus.

The H5N1 flu has devastated poultry in China and several other southeast Asian countries and also has claimed more than 150 human lives. Most of the people affected lived close to flocks of chickens or other poultry.

Public health authorities fear that the virus will mutate into a form that can spread easily among people, raising the potential for a worldwide pandemic like the one that killed millions in 1918.



Although the new bird flu virus has infected people, there is no evidence that it can pass from person to person.

That worry has spurred efforts to develop vaccines for the virus as well as to test migrating wildfowl in an effort to detect movement of the disease.

Studding the virus' surface are two proteins called hemagglutinin — the H in H5N1 — and neuraminidase, the "N." There are 16 known hemagglutinin versions and nine neuraminidases.

They also trigger the immune system to mount an attack, particularly hemagglutinin, the protein the body aims for when it makes flu-fighting.

Tonight's holiday attire

Domenic Poli

Halloween is always a good time for us teenage guys. The parties, the festivities and, of course, the gorgeous girls in slutty Halloween costumes usually make for a very enjoyable All Hallow's Eve celebration.

Today is the one day during the year when girls are actually expected to unleash their inner she-devil and wear a costume that leaves very little to the imagination. It's the lone time in a calendar year where they are encouraged to dress as if they are oddly-themed street-walkers, the skanky nurse and the voluptuous French maid are always crowd-favorites. Both reveal a lot of sexy shoulder, and the fabric comes to an end mere inches below the waistline.

In fact, Friday my friend and I saw a beautiful young lady walking home from a party in a fetching little police officer's uniform — the skirt couldn't have been more than three inches down her leg.

Girls who know they're hot use this opportunity to sport some skimpy attire and flaunt their amazing bodies — and we college guys can't thank you enough. With eye candy like this, who needs all the traditional sugary sweets?

I've known girls who have spent months in advance brainstorming what kind of sexy ensemble they're going to wear to show off their intriguing thighs and eye-popping cleavage. But it's never the same with guys, is it?

College boys never put in the same effort to try to come up with some interesting and creative attire. To tell you the truth, during the week leading up to Halloween, most guys simply shoot the breeze and ponder what types of provocative female outfits they can look forward to feasting their eyes on.

In a desperate, last-minute attempt to throw something together, most chaps rely on some weak costume idea we've all seen a million times before.

First on the list is the famous deteriorating-face guy; many-a-young-man apply some store-bought adhesives to their mugs in an effort to make it look like they have just risen from the dead, where worms and maggots have been eating away at their rotting corpses for years.

Second-place in the old, tired-out costume category is butcher-knife-through-head man. This classic consists of a toy knife that completely flattens in the middle to give the illusion that the knife has been lodged in the guy's cranium, perhaps while trying to steal a delicious Halloween ham.

And to any girls out there who are reading this and think I'm perverted — shut up. You know we guys are going to look with our tongues hanging out of our heads.

Next, is the dude donning the Jason mask, impersonating the homicidal main character of the "Friday the 13th" movie series. A lot of guys buy a cheap hockey mask at a local supermarket chain store and parade around in the unoriginal costume. But, to be fair, I must admit that I, too, once resorted to the legendary mask (or as I call it, "Old Reliable") during my final trick-or-treating expedition about six years ago.

Finally, scraping the bottom of the Halloween barrel is the worn-out ghost costume. Consisting of only a white sheet, this is the ugly duckling of the costume family. The dudes who wear it usually just poke two holes in an otherwise fine bedspread. The yawn-drawing getup is almost always a last-ditch effort at a costume before setting off to score some Halloween candy.

I have to give credit where credit is due, though. When a guy does come up with a costume idea it is usually first-rate stuff.

Just the other day I saw two guys dressed like the Mario and Luigi video game brothers. They had the hats, the moustaches, the plumber uniforms and long plungers. It was a flashback to my old Nintendo-playing days at my cousin's house. Good times, good times.

Besides these occasional creations that leave you giggling and impressed, the guys' costume ideas are almost never as good as the gals'. Nothing say college male might come up with will ever compare to the eye-pleasing outfits of the opposite gender.

Most of us guys are simply content wearing a professional sports team jersey, heading to a party and enjoying the show.

And to any girls out there who are reading this and think I'm perverted — shut up. You know we guys are going to look with our tongues hanging out of our heads. What kind of red-blooded American guy wouldn't? If a hot girl is going to have her breasts displayed like two eggs on a plate and her ass sticking out of a leather dominatrix costume, we're going to take a gander.

It's not being perverted, it's being human. You have the right to wear something skimpy, and we have the right to look. As long as everyone stays respectful, I don't see why we all can't enjoy ourselves.

So, again, to the all the fine ladies who decide to strut their stuff for Halloween: Thank you.

On Nov. 7, be aware that you will be asked about more than just your choice for governor when you step into the voting booth. Ballot questions 1, 2 and 3 will ask you to vote for or against three issues within the state, and rather than answering arbitrarily, you might want to know the facts.

Question 3 is about helping families of this state obtain more affordable and better quality child care. So, while it may not directly matter to you, it's important to realize how much it matters to the thousands of families in who currently do not have sufficient care for their children, or any care at all.

Nowadays, two-income households are more necessary for economic survival than ever. No longer can the average family afford to have a stay-at-home parent for long periods of time. In Massachusetts alone, two-thirds of all children live in households where both parents work. This means young children spend most of their time in day care facilities. These facilities deeply affect their educational and social development.

Unfortunately, Massachusetts is home to the most expensive child care in the country, leaving many families struggling to find adequate care at reasonable costs. Home care facilities are one option, which allow families to escape the high costs of privatized day-care chains.

Yet, as it stands now, these facilities are cut off from the state and each other, leaving them with no voice, inadequate and under-funded programs and high turnover rates. Families that cannot afford high quality, state regulated day cares rely on family childcare providers who work from their homes, often sacrificing quality for affordability.

While many of these programs provide more than adequate services, some are extremely under par, leaving parents with the task of testing the quality of such places by a trial and error method. Running the risk of an error is something every family hopes they never have to experience.

These flaws are not the fault of the family care providers, for they have no means to demand better options and support from the state. In short, family home care providers are left out in the cold, underappreciated and underpaid, ultimately hurting the youth and future of this state.

Luckily, this can change, and soon. Next Tuesday when you cast your vote for governor, you'll also be asked to support or reject the Better Child Care Initiative. A vote "yes" on Question 3 will allow home care facilities to unionize and collaborate with the state to strengthen their services, making affordable child care more accessible to Massachusetts families. A vote "yes" will give a voice to the people who open up their homes to working families and their children. A vote "yes" is a fundamental step to solving the child care crisis in Massachusetts.

More specifically, The Better Child Care Initiative will provide the ability for homecare facilities to raise their health and safety standards. It will also help them expand training for workers within the facilities and reduce the turnover rate, which will make family child care a more stable option, improving the development and experiences of the children who attend.

By unionizing, family child care providers could collaborate and advocate for more public funding of child care which would improve their child care services without raising costs for parents. Voting "no" would keep the child care situation as is, further hurting Massachusetts families.

After working at a day care for two summers, I saw how day care facilities are like a second home to children, and how a day care teacher is like another parent. I also saw how high the rates at a day care chain could run.

Parents who cannot afford to pay such rates should not be penalized for placing their children at home day care providers where they often have to worry about the well being of their children. The only way to stop this penalization is to give home care providers more say by voting for the Better Child Care initiative.

So vote "yes" on Question 3 on Nov. 7 to help families and to tell the state we value and support the work of family child care providers.

Why is Frat Row on the go?

Kaitlyn Silva

The first time you drove down North Pleasant Street and onto the UMass campus, what did you see? Did the entryway show you a promising lane of parties and late-night adventures or did you, like me, see a dilapidated bunch of old buildings that make our college look like a dump?

There has always been a certain stigma surrounding Frat Row. The area is known for its drunken outrages, especially after the infamous stabbing. When students needed a place to party on the weekend, Frat Row was always there for them, giving them a place to get as plastered as much as they wanted; however, UMass claims this reputation isn't the main reason they're demolishing Frat Row. They just need the space.

If the miniature version of the Big Dig around campus hasn't informed you of this already, there's a constant cry for improvement coming from the UMass authority figures. The campus is over-flowing with students, so Frat Row is being destroyed to make more space for facilities.

Enhancing the school's entrance is a smart move overall, but there's more to this destruction than making the doorway to the campus look pretty.

They also hope to enhance the entranceway. Enhancing the school's entrance is a smart move overall; but there's more to this destruction than making the doorway to the campus look pretty; we all know that. Destroying Frat Row takes away an infamous spot for campus parties, a much-needed perk in acquiring extra space for offices and classrooms.

Will it work? Of course not. Out of the five properties being sold, two fraternities and one sorority were affected. These three groups cannot possibly be held accountable for even a quarter of the illegal alcohol consumed by students. Frat Row is just taking the hit because of its legendary status as the place to party. It's something even incoming freshmen know about, and it's loved by a majority of UMass students.

The students who were inclined to visit Frat Row for all of their partying needs aren't going to stop partying just because three buildings were demolished. Instead of chugging a beer on Frat Row, they'll probably stick with doing so in their dorm. This only serves to disturb the non-drinkers living on campus who have to listen to drunks screaming through the hallways when they could be out of the dorms.

Most RAs aren't going to bother shutting them up, let alone writing them up, so there's nothing you can do but deal with them. Because of this, those of us who choose not to party and/or who enjoy sleeping on weeknights don't get to enjoy the destruction of Frat Row either. Some of us would be willing to go without the extra class space if it meant not having to put up with issues such as these.

Right now, the college doesn't seem to be helping any of its students, especially the several fraternity and sorority members booted from their housing on short notice. Even though they have new on-campus options to explore, the new housing in the North Apartments does not make up for the freedom and personal homes these students lost. Do these campus officials ever stop to think about the well-being of the students?

The destruction of Frat Row is not necessarily a bad thing. Deny it if you wish, but that campus entrance looks like a garbage heap. It will continue to look like a garbage heap until new offices or classrooms are put into place years down the road.

While those affected have the right to be disgruntled about their displacement, their organizations were not completely dismantled by the change and can still operate. Plus, fraternities and sororities are meant to be about richer ideals, such as brotherhood sisterhood and community service, so being located in the middle of the booze capital of the University is bound to ruin those ideals.

Still, UMass officials need to go about this a different way. They say they need to demolish Frat Row because they need the space. With the ever-growing student population, the students have nothing against a few more facilities on campus; however, the current Frat Row area is not the most convenient space for students, especially for those of us living in Sylvan or the new North Apartments.

Is this really the only choice the campus authorities had in order to create more space? There could be no building additions? There were no other plots of land to build upon?

We are not fooled by the pretense of building more classrooms. Unfortunately, all the University has managed to do is alienate the students further.

Earth Crisis

Joshua H. Wilder

Some clichés are bogus, nobody can deny that; however, after scanning through the daily newspapers last week, a certain cliché seems to hold major weight. If it sounds too good to be true — it usually is.

Whoever came up with the idea that humans could live on earth in harmony with other animals and the delicate eco-system already set in place was optimistic and gave human beings too much credit.

The World Wildlife Federation recently came out with a grim study confirming what environmentalists have been warning us about all along.

Humans are stripping away nature and its resources at an unprecedented rate, and if we continue with our current lifestyle patterns, we will need two planets worth of natural resources by the time 2050 rolls around.

Here is when all those hours spent in high-school algebra classes actually come in handy. Let's assume about 60 percent of UMass alumni will have livers that can function after four years of booze-hounding every weekend. Those lucky few will be around 70-years old once this proposed catastrophe takes place.

If any of you fine readers plan on having little tykes of your own, they will be the most affected by whatever happens once the earth goes into meltdown mode.

Instead of trying to guess what could happen when Earth kicks the bucket, all you need to do is take a look around to see the early symptoms of this self-inflicted wound.

From 1970 to 2003, ecologists and scientists have traced the steady decline of populations of many species, ranging from fish to mammals, with no clear improvements in sight. According to Darwinism and the concept of survival of the fittest, it would be logical to assume certain species are naturally phased out while living in an ecosystem.

The problem is these extinctions are not caused naturally; instead, they can be clearly traced back to practices of humans who are careless, selfish and ignorant. Procedures such as excessive fishing over-clearing of forests and the valuable resources within them and, of course, intense pollution are doing a fantastic job of likening this planet to the kid who drinks too much, passes out with his shoes on and gets magic marker all over his face.

And while we can all appreciate seeing someone with a drawn-on beard and matching mustache laying on the floor on Friday night, odds are he'll sober up and live to fight another day. Activists and scientists who produced the study for the World Wildlife Federation aren't too sure that Earth will get up.

Whenever I see some athlete who interrupts his power jog to go warn some people who are smoking cigarettes of the dangers they are facing, I have trouble holding back a chuckle.

Some people, of course, see this as no real problem. They could care less about animals. After all, it says in the Bible God granted humans dominion over all creatures. The funny thing is that our reckless treatment of Mother Earth has created proven health risks for humans, too. Some biologists have linked a recent increase in childhood asthma cases to the poor air quality in many cities and towns. While there are other proven links to childhood asthma, there is no doubt that breathing in diesel exhaust can't be good for you.

Whenever I see some athlete who interrupts his power jog to go warn some people who are smoking cigarettes of the dangers they are facing, I have trouble holding back a chuckle. Walk around the inner city and breathe that air long enough and you might as well be putting down two packs a day.

Just go into Boston or New York City at night and look up into the sky. You will hardly be able to see any stars compared to out here in Amherst, or better yet, Vermont; part of the reason, my readers, is smog.

Pollution creates a haze of nastiness that lingers above for everyone's enjoyment. Next time you see someone parking his Hummer, go up to him and personally thank him for turning all of our lungs into Technicolor goo.

People often times feel helpless when it comes to conservation efforts, putting forth the question: what will I be able to do? Admittedly, the deck is stacked up against us.

Even if every UMass student agreed to turn their lights off when they were not using them, carpool to reduce pollution and harass our local governments to actually care, we'd still be at a disadvantage. The oil industry would rather drill the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil than protect the animals there.

Car companies are still pushing gas guzzling SUV's instead of trying to cut back on pollution. President Bush still believes that the concept of global warming is up for debate.

Activism is still a real possibility. If we college students can honestly say this isn't a pressing issue for us or the rest of the world, then we are no better than those who are intentionally polluting and destroying. After all, what good is "American Idol" without a planet to hold auditions on?

A dull and worn 'Saw III' hits theaters

BY PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

(Author's note: Those who have not seen the two previous "Saw" films, but plan on doing so, would be ill-advised to read this review.)

'Saw III'

Directed by Darren Lynn Bousman

Starring Tobin Bell, Shawnee Smith

Lions Gate Entertainment

Rated R

107 mins.

Grade C-

There seem to have been thousands of words written about "torture porn," the latest trend in horror movies, where the focus appears to be not so much on the actual horror but its ultimate conclusion. In addition, more and more studies have been released about a chemical in the human brain that may cause addiction to pornography.

If the comparison of excessive gore and porn is legitimate, this may explain why there is such a lucrative market for torture porn films — "Hostel" and its upcoming sequel, the updated "Texas Chainsaw Massacre" films, "The Passion of the Christ," and, of course, the franchise which has become synonymous with cinematic torture, the "Saw" movies — the latest installment of which is Darren Lynn Bousman's "Saw III."

"Saw III" continues to follow the grisly exploits of the serial almost-certain-death-causer called "Jigsaw" (Tobin Bell), this time together with his unlikely protégé Amanda (Shawnee Smith).

The film essentially starts where "Saw II" left off. After a quick, irrelevant scene of one of Jigsaw's games being lost, its purpose similar to that of a "warm-up guy" on a TV comedy who introduces the live audience to the show, a detective from the previous film falls victim to the people in her pursuit. The reasons for her punishment, according to Jigsaw's trademark puppet, is that she relates more closely to the corpses she inspects than to the living, and might as well die since she is "already dead on the inside." (Say what you will about Jigsaw's knack for engineering, but his talent for original prose leaves a lot to be desired.)

Amanda abducts a doctor, Lynn (Bahar Soomekh), to ensure that the cancer-stricken Jigsaw will live to see the outcome of one of his more elaborate games. Incidentally, Lynn is cheating on her estranged husband. "Saw III" continues its penchant for taking realistic familial problems and oversimplifying them so they don't complicate the grindhouse action.

Jeff (Angus Macfadyen) wakes up in a wooden box, given two hours to escape the building before the doors are permanently sealed. Having grown obsessed with taking revenge on the drunk driver who killed his son, he meets the three people who have wronged him, each of them entrapped in increasingly gruesome apparatuses, and is given the choice to let them die or rescue them at a cost to himself. Jigsaw never states why he, the fellow sentencing people to violent deaths with no legal proceedings, is entitled to pass judgment on Jeff's obsession.

This is most definitely the most textured and layered of the "Saw" movies, which, of course, doesn't exactly say much. As with the two previous films, there are countless strands of plot that manage to weave themselves into a tapestry by the end. Here the threads are accompanied by somewhat deeper insights into Jigsaw's philosophy. One notable scene details Jigsaw's and Amanda's preparation for the main game of the first film, an added bonus being an explanation as to how Jigsaw could have remained motionless for so long. Interesting it may be, but one gets the sense that after the scene was edited in, the filmmakers were high-fiving each other, congratulating themselves over a neat little scene that would undoubtedly cause audiences to marvel over their cleverness.

One aspect shared by the first two "Saw" films was a twist ending, and it would seem likely that viewers will be expecting and bracing for the same this time around, having adopted a fool-me-twice-shame-on-me philosophy. The ending of "Saw III" is satisfactorily intriguing, but hardly surprising.

If the aforementioned violence/porn analogy can be taken further, "Saw III" continues to focus almost entirely on the climax, with hardly any attention left to the buildup. The few scenes that do include elements of suspense pass by far too quickly to have any effect, and there's nothing as original as the reasonably clever camera flash scene from the first film.

Thus, the horror of "Saw III" stems not from the traditional buildup-to-scare dynamic, but rather its relation to the audience. Audiences are frightened by these films because they are quick to imagine themselves as the victims of Jigsaw's games, and struggle to figure out what they would do in such a situation. The terror comes with the realization there is no solution that does not involve plenty of suffering.

Such a formula for terror was novel upon its initial release, but by the third installment it seems to have proven itself to be a one-trick pony. To the film's credit, however, it puts in a solid effort to create some train-wreck-fascinating death contraptions. Your run-of-the-mill psychotic killer could never come up with Jigsaw's prized pig machine.

Given the apparent trends in horror cinema, it seems that the "Saw" series is a harbinger of films to come. With the intelligence gathered thus far, it's still difficult to tell whether this is a good thing, and "Saw III" doesn't seem like it will raise anyone's expectations.

Halloween spooks the core of Pioneer Valley

On Saturday night, Amherst bar The Harp hosted a special Halloween celebration for the holiday weekend. Bar-goers came adorned in elaborate costumes such as the ones above.

The pope was kind enough to grace The Harp with his presence, not to mention thirsty enough to partake in more than just a cup of holy wine with fellow Hallow's Eve goers, Mafia Man and Fire-Crotched Face Cowboy.

Decemberists in Northampton

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

The Northwestern corner of the United States is a breeding ground for bands with unique visions. Death Cab for Cutie formed in Seattle and has become a household name with their distinct kind of music, insightful lyrics and delightful melodies.

Hailing from Olympia, Washington Sleater-Kinney became a prominent player in the "Riot Grrl" movement of the mid-1990s. M. Ward, hailing from Portland, Oregon, has used his skills as a musician to find his own success and has produced releases from Jenny Lewis and Conor Oberst.

The Decemberists are another example of such a band. They formed in 2001 in the blooming music scene of Portland, Oregon. Their original methods for creating smart rock music gained them critical acclaim and a fervent fan following.

Colin Meloy serves as the primary vocalist and songwriter for the band. Joined by guitarist Chris Funk, Jenny Conlee on accordion and organ, bassist Nate Query, and drummer James Moen, The Decemberists have released four full length albums and several EPs.

Each Decemberists album departs from the typical indie-rock release. The Decemberists' songs are not filled with conventional teenage angst. It is easy to talk about feelings, but The Decemberists drive it to the next level. They avoid clichés and obvious imagery. Instead, the songs are intricately written as stories influenced by literary and historical images.

For example, "Eli, the Barrow Boy" and "The Sporting Life" (two songs off 2005 album "Picaresque") feature characters dealing with one's position in life and the implications of such ranking systems. This battle is easily translated into an angst-filled battle, but the lyrics intensify their meaning and further their influence.

"Red Right Ankle" (from "Her Majesty") is a love song via a unique extended metaphor. Even though the ankle is a small part, it is important. All other limbs extend from its origin. Meloy finds beauty in even the smallest piece of his lover and chooses to make it the symbolic focus on this delightful love song.

Even the earliest full length released from The Decemberists, "Castaways and Cut-outs" (2002), featured unique songwriting. Songs on this album range from dark ("Odalisque") to melancholy ("Here I Dreamt I Was an Architect") to creepy ("A Cautionary Song"). The sound of an accordion floats throughout to maintain a cohesive tone.

Recently, The Decemberists made the move to a major label, Capitol Records. The major label status enabled the Decemberists to release their most ambitious record to date, "The Crane Wife." The construction of this literary-driven album was influenced by a Japanese folk-tale. With songs like "The Island: Come & See/ The Landlords Daughter/ You'll Not Feel the Drowing" and "The Crane Wife 1 & 2" reaching over the twelve-minute mark, it is easy to see the story The Decemberists hope to tell — one of extended story lines and character development.

As a whole, the album is more of a musical-theater soundtrack than a conventional indie-rock record. This ability to construct such clever and sharp songs is what makes The Decemberists such unique musicians.

The Decemberists are epic. The Decemberists are quirky. The Decemberists are intelligent. The Decemberists will be bringing their brand of indie-rock to the Calvin Theater tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets are $25 at the door.

Deftones new 'Saturday Night Wrist' stays true to fanbase

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Correspondent

It's been said before but it necessitates repeating: the Deftones have left nu-metal way, way behind. They make puzzling moves like touring with Korn on this year's Family Values tour or headlining over generic screamo/emo bands on the taste of Chaos tour, but the Deftones music speaks for itself.

Three and a half years since their self-titled album, the Deftones are releasing "Saturday Night Wrist," still right on the cusp of stardom and still being torn between their art-rock influences and a love of heavy riffs.

These tensions have almost broken the band up, with singer Chino Moreno leaning more towards artists like My Bloody Valentine and The Cure while guitarist Stephan Carpenter is a self-admitted metalhead. Deftones have become renowned for a more thoughtful and interesting sound then the nu-metal acts they so often get classified with.

"Saturday Night Wrist," the bands fifth full-length, won't disappoint anyone who has watched the band grow over the years. The opener, "Hole In The Earth," is a good synopsis of the album. As Moreno has gotten more proficient at guitar, the band's sound has matured, and the two-guitar lineup adds new depth.

Moreno's passionate singing, which can switch from whisper to whimper to moan to scream in a moment, is still a defining characteristic of the band, but the majestic space-rock atmosphere has only gotten larger, more massive and more powerful.

Even though the band still bounces between ambience and crushing detuned power chords, they experiment within that dynamic. The six-minute "Beware" is based upon a spooky lead line and Moreno's intimidating delivery of "Do you like the way the water tastes?" But the band still releases a number of colorful explosions of sound, from the epic chorus to the hard-and-heavy bridge and outro.

"Saturday Night Wrist" follows in the footsteps of the 2003 self-titled album. Though it is more mature and thought out then the underrated "Deftones" record, "Saturday Night Wrist" is based around the same musical dynamics. Often operating in a spooky atmosphere where the band's love of shoegaze and art rock shine through, they also include some truly heavy moments.

Like the "Deftones" album, "Saturday Night Wrist" has two very heavy songs. "Rapture" bounces between blood-curdling screams and angular guitars, which sound unlike anything else in the Deftones library, and while it works it is certainly not the most interesting song on the album. Likewise, "Rats! Rats! Rats!" is a showcase for tight rhythms and Moreno's flexible vocal chords but the song itself never quite reaches a peak.

And while "Deftones" contained two electronic based songs, "Saturday Night Wrist" instead offers one trip-hop number, the brilliant "Pink Cellphone," which is sure to be the love-it-or-hate-it moment of the record for most fans, and one instrumental, "U, U, D, D, L, R, L, R, A, B, Select, Start," which finds the band conveying as much emotion as ever, even without vocals.

The real surprise of "Saturday Night Wrist" isn't how good it is — the Deftones have long been a band underrated by so-called serious rock critics and listeners — but the fact that the best moments come from a more refined pop vision. "Cherry Waves," one of the best of the bunch, is made when Moreno stretches "oo-oo-oo"s out of "you." "Xerces" emphasizes its brilliant chorus by letting Moreno continue his "I'll be waving" vocal line after the music stops. "Kimdracula"'s combination of instrumentation and vocal processing makes for a truly memorable and ferocious track.

As with any Deftones release, there are sure to be long arguments in the fan community about where this album stands next to the rest of the band's work, but for a band that prefers to grow and mature over time, that question is more subjective then analytical.

"Saturday Night Wrist" is a massive success for the band; one of the more exciting albums of the year by a band who chases neither commercial nor critical sycophants. And while they may never be the most popular band, or the coolest, the Deftones don't seem to care; they're too focused on actually making interesting music, and that's why "Saturday Night Wrist" is another slice of art-rock glory.

The Rapture lands in Boston on Wednesday

By Alex Hornbuckle
Collegian Correspondent

The Rapture will be headlining The Axis Club on Landsdowne St. in Boston on Wednesday night at 8:00 p.m.

This Thursday, The Rapture will be playing at The Axis in Boston. If you're looking for an opportunity to let loose this Halloween week, this is it, as the band is sure to break out both new grooves and old favorites to ignite the dance floor.

It's safe to say by now that The Rapture dodged the dreaded sophomore slump. Nearly two months ago, they released their second full-length, "Pieces of the People We Love," a work slicker that is more conventional than anything the group had yet released. While these adjectives may imply a downfall for other bands, the strength of the group's songwriting and musical abilities produced one of the best dance records to emerge this year.

Let's step back a few years. The Rapture was formed in 1998 by vocalist Luke Jenner and drummer Vito Roccoforte. In 1999, they released "Mirror," a short record which drew heavily (and obviously) from bands such as The Cure and Television. Soon after its release they relocated from San Diego to New York City. While they were there, they packed up bassist Mattie Safer, who had recently moved to the city from Silver Spring, Md., a town just outside of Washington, D.C.

In 2001, The Rapture released an EP on Sub Pop Records, "Out of the Races and Onto the Tracks," which found the group experimenting with more noise and a funkier stride, especially on the album's title track. They received critical acclaim for the work and soon added multi-instrumentalist (and cousin of Safer) Gabriel Andruzzi to their line-up. They released in 2002 a new single, "House of Jealous Lovers," produced by New York production duo The DFA. It was a hit, resonating not only with DJs but with independent music publications and across the Internet.

"Echoes," the group's first full-length album, dropped in late 2003, and the manic energy and rampant creativity that made up "House of Jealous Lovers" proved not to be just a one-song deal. The album was a mix of stark electronica, disco beats, howling vocals, and razor-sharp bass lines, and it successfully found its way to the top of many critics' year-end lists. After its release, The Rapture toured relentlessly for nearly a year with groups such as Franz Ferdinand, Black Rebel Motorcycle Club and The Cure (as part of the Curiosa Tour).

With the success of "Echoes" under their belt, The Rapture began to seriously consider their follow-up in 2005.

"The biggest difference [in recording "Pieces of the People We Love"] was with us — we had a level of preparation and confidence that wasn't there the first time. We knew what we were getting into," said Safer in a phone interview Thursday from Washington D.C., where the band played a show later that night.

"We started writing in 2005 and most of it was written by June. We had to make sure the shit was hot," he added.

That same year, the band broke off from DFA Records, deciding to sign with Motown, which is owned by Universal, one of the "Big Five" major labels.

"Second albums have such a reputation for being difficult ... the labels are inclined to put you in there with someone who can guide you through that," said Safer. "We thought that wasn't right."

The band decided on Paul Epworth and Ewan Pearson to produce most of their new album. The duo was a team with such albums as "Silent Alarm" by Bloc Party, The Futureheads' self-titled debut, "A Certain Trigger" by Maximo Park and tracks by Ladytron, Chikinki, and Gwen Stefani under their belts. (Danger Mouse (of recent Gnarls Barkley and Gorillaz fame) also came in to produce two tracks for the album.

"We wanted someone we could just get in there and start working with. That's what was great about Paul and Ewan and Danger Mouse — they all knew what we were talking about," said Safer. "We didn't have to explain, you know, who Daft Punk was and why they had relevance."

Since the release of the new album, The Rapture has been touring Europe and, more recently, the United States. While in Europe, the group played a few festivals, and while Safer appreciates the "10,000 person experience, it's nice to play our own shows, to the home crowd."

And that's just what they're doing now, hitting relatively small clubs throughout America. What can fans expect on the current tour?

While some groups would focus only on new songs in hopes of increasing album sales, Safer says, "Our shows are kind of a mix of everything, figuring that not everyone knows the new album yet. Maybe later when people know ["Pieces of the People We Love"] a little better we'll focus on new songs."

The Rapture will wrap up their tour of the States at the end of November, at which point they'll be flying out to London to open for The Killers for three gigs.

"In mid-December, we'll be taking a break to focus on our own lives," Safer explained. "I like just had a kid, so he'll reacquaint himself with his family. I'll be DJing in Australia for New Year's Eve and Cabo will be in Mexico."

But a group with this much energy doesn't stay still for long. The band is already planning another American tour for 2007. There's no word yet on who they'll be hitting the road with, but when asked for ideal tour mates, Safer said he'd love to play with DJ on the Radio, Scissor Sisters or The Knife, adding that their current opener The Presets have been fantastic.

As for how the band will prepare for the shows, Safer says they keep it simple. "Some nice stretches, but no yoga yet. I think when you reach forty is when you have to start doing yoga."

Tickets are $17.50 at the door. Doors open at 7 p.m.

Since 1998, The Rapture has relocated from San Diego to New York City, and finally settled in a town outside Washington, D.C. Here, they perform in a dorm hallway in a college outside of Washington D.C.

Final grades given to UMass the net. If that were the case, eventually, the team would have torched at least one team for three or four goals.

Instead, the Minutemen's best game offensively was a 2-0 victory against lowly Temple, the worst team in the A-10. In that game, everything did go the Minutemen's way. Tony Bassett and Prince Ofosu scored great-looking goals and the team coasted to a victory against a team it should have beaten.

However, that game was the exception — just a glimpse of what the team could have been. Two days earlier, UMass was shut out by the only other team in the A-10 with a worse record: Saint Joseph's.

In a game Koch called an almost-must-win, the offense gave the team no chance at the full three points in the standings, and the game ended in a 0-0 tie.

Every one of the team's forwards and midfielders has the talent to light up the scoreboard, but for some reason, they could never get on the same page. A lack of communication up front and a dearth of aggressiveness left the offense hoping for that lucky break.

The only other excuse UMass can look to is the inexperience up front. As a sophomore, Prince Ofosu was the team's most experienced forward. Bryan Hogan — the team's leading the scorer along with Ofosu — Michael Jejna, and Mark DeSantis are all freshmen.

The speedy midfielder, Greg Cirillo, added some leadership in the offensive end as a junior, but for the most part, you would rarely see more than two players up-field at any time. Those two players were usually looking to either draw a corner kick or score on the break-away.

There is hope for this group, however. The next three seasons should see marked improvement for the Minutemen, as most of this group will be playing three or four years together, and the communication more than anything should improve.

Defense: A-

The only reason this team won any games this year was the play of its defense. UMass led the A-10 in every single significant defensive category for the majority of the season. It was first in goals allowed, goals-against average, saves and shut-outs up until the final weekend.

Junior captain Kenny Cook led a backfield that was a little more experienced than the front-runners, and a lot more effective. Sophomore Chris Brown was Cook's right-hand man, and handled most of the free- and corner kicks.

Other than a couple of complete collapses, the Minuteman defense rarely allowed more than a pair of goals. But with the offense working with it, that wasn't always enough to give the team a winning chance.

Opposing forwards rarely got behind the UMass backs, and when they did, the Minutemen responded with clutch plays, like Bassett's header to keep the ball out of the net after goalkeeper Zack Simmons had been beaten in the game against Vermont.

Goalkeeper: B+

The only reason Simmons does not get an "A" here is because of the way the defenders in front of him produced this season. The backfield for the Minutemen made Simmons' job easy, as most of the saves he made involved catching a ball coming right at his midsection.

That is not to take away from his record-setting season. Simmons rarely faced a high number of difficult shots in a game, but when he did, he was solid.

Anytime a player sets a school record, his performance must be recognized. Simmons' 10 shutouts were the most by any UMass keeper in a season. His 14 career clean sheets are second-best all-time, and he still has two years to play, and should smash that mark with ease.

Bodette has been suffering from tendonitis since August, and senior Erin O'Donnell had a stress fracture the second week into August.

"That has defiantly affected their training, they probably both lost a good six or seven weeks between August and September," Laf reniere said. "They're running now, but you can't just afford to lose that type of training and base work at the Division I level. That's been unfortunate as both of them were in my top seven last year."

Freshman Lauren Liuzzo injured her ankle 15 minutes prior to the New England Championships. It only kept her out of action for a week and a half but then she sprained her other ankle. She missed most of October and finished outside the teams top five for the first time all season, placing eighth on Saturday.

With all the disappointments, Laf reniere sees a good future for the rest of this season and the next year.

"I feel that [Saturday] was the first time all season that I've seen my athlete's race," Laf reniere said. "All the meets this season I feel like they have run hard, but they weren't racing.

"I think they get it now. They're a very hard working team, and I've been somewhat disappointed all fall because they seem to work harder in practice than the races, and now they've started to put that together," Laf reniere said.

Overall, Laf reniere is pleased with the performance at the A-10 Championships.

"The A-10 conference is strong in distance running and we were only eight points away from taking fifth place and I think that was pretty respectable," Laf reniere said. "I'm looking forward to the next two meets because I just feel like they have it now, they understand what they need to do and they're more than willing to do it."

The cross country teams have a week off from competition and return to action Nov. 11 at the NCAA Regional Qualifiers meet in New York.

Rainy weather leads to scoring disparity in conference games

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

A-10 Football

It was a tale of two regions in the Atlantic 10 this weekend. The three games that took place in New England were basically played underwater resulting in remarkably low-scoring contests. As for the three games played in the conference's southern division, the fair conditions played no part in the game's results.

The No. 3 Massachusetts Minutemen defeated the Northeastern Huskies 7-0 in Brookline, Mass. The two teams combined for just 134 yards through the air due to the rain. Snapping the ball even became difficult at times, a shotgun attempt by Northeastern center Tyler Perkins sailed over the head of quarterback John Sperrazza on a key third-and-nine situation.

The same was true for the other matchups in New England — Rhode Island defeated Maine, 3-0, in Kingston, R.I. while UNH downed Hofstra, 10-6, in Durham, N.H.

Black Bear Blunder

With their loss to the Rams (3-5, 1-3 A-10), the Black Bears (5-3, 5-1 A-10) slipped from No. 15 down to No. 22 in the Sports Network's top 25.

The Black Bears assault on the A-10 began turning some heads after three impressive victories over Towson, Villanova and Hofstra in consecutive weeks.

They were tied atop the A-10's North Division with UMass before the loss. Maine's top-ranked defense thrived in the rain, yielding just 19 yards passing and 116 yards rushing. URI's lone visit into Black Bear territory resulted in the game's only score — a 47-yard field goal by Ram kicker Colin Gallagher. The drive started at the Rhode Island 20-yard line after a botched field goal attempt by Maine.

"We had a chance to kick a field goal in the first quarter," Maine coach Jack Cosgrove said. "But we missed it. [Rhode Island] had a chance early in the second quarter and made it."

The Black Bears marched past the Ram's side of the 50-yard line on six different occasions but could not capitalize on any of these chances. The Ram defense forced a punt, a missed field goal, an interception, a fumble and two turnovers on downs in Maine's six trips into Ram territory.

The Black Bears actually started two-consecutive drives inside the Rhode Island 40-yard line, however both drives faltered on failed fourth-down attempts.

"[Rhode Island] did a great job of defending us," Cosgrove said. "They bent, but didn't break."

Maine's loss to Rhode Island amplifies its trip to Amherst to square off with the Minutemen on Nov. 11. UMass travels to Durham, N.H. this weekend to take on the No. 9 Wildcats.

Aerial Assault

Towson quarterback Sean Schaefer passed for 435 yards and five touchdown passes on Saturday to lead the No. 21 Tigers (6-2, 3-2 A-10) to a 49-35 victory over Delaware (4-4, 2-3 A-10) — it was his second 400-yard passing game of the season.

The A-10 named Schaefer its Offensive Player of the Week for his performance against the Blue Hens. It was the second time that he received this honor this year — he received the award for his 458-yard, three-touchdown showing against Hofstra on September 23.

"[His performance] the last two weeks has been impressive," Towson coach Gerdy Combs said. "He's one of those special players that during your coaching reign, you just enjoy."

Schaefer leads the A-10 averaging 376.8 passing yards per game. His 14 touchdown tosses puts him behind UNH's Ricky Santos (19) and UMass' Liam Coen (14).

Schaefer wasted no time starting the attack. He was three-for-three on the opening drive including a touchdown pass. He found receiver Demetrius Harrison for the score just 50 seconds into the game.

Shortly after that, a Towson interception at its own 10-yard line halted a Delaware drive. Schaefer quickly marched the Tigers down the field. He led a 90-yard charge in nine plays, ending with 34-yard strike to wide out Eric Yancey for the score — Yancey caught two more touchdown passes on the day.

Schaefer's touchdown and yard-age totals weren't all that stood out on Saturday. His efficiency and effectiveness in pressure situations — third downs in particular — kept the team on the field and in the position to win — Towson was nine-for-12 on third downs.

"Well, he's very good at [converting third downs]," Combs said. "We threw for four-hundred yards and ran for two hundred. It's one of those unbelievable offensive breakouts you have in a season."

Schaefer, a sophomore, has been impressive all season. In the team's loss at Maine he threw for 290 yards and a score. The Tigers' only other loss came against UMass — Schaefer missed that game with an "unspecified illness."

"We really missed him at the UMass game," Combs said. "That's all I can say about that."

A-10 Owns Top 25

The A-10 is regarded as one of I-AA football's best conferences. The latest polls only confirm this — six of the 25 teams in the Sports Network's I-AA poll call the A-10 home.

UMass (7-1, 5-0 A-10) has the highest ranking of any A-10 team — sitting comfortably in the No. 3 position. The Minutemen face one of their toughest tests this weekend against UNH — the Wildcats defeated UMass in Amherst last season 34-28.

The No. 4 slot belongs to the A-10 South leading James Madison Dukes (7-1, 5-0 A-10). They went to Richmond on Saturday and defeated The Spiders 27-0. Unfortunately, UMass and James Madison will not see each other this season.

The UNH Wildcats (6-2, 3-2 A-10) moved back up to No. 9 this week after losing two consecutive games.

James Madison's most recent victim, Richmond (5-3, 2-3), is No. 15. The Spiders head north to take on Villanova this weekend. RU hopes to get on stride — having lost its last two contests.

Towson rose from unranked to No.21 after defeating Delaware. A healthy Schaefer means the Tigers could find their way into the NCAA tournament when the time comes.

The Maine Black Bears round out the A-10's presence in the Top 25. The Black Bears occups the No. 22 spot. Their loss at Rhode Island saw them drop seven spots. Maine's next three opponents, Northeastern, UMass and New Hampshire will certainly challenge the Black Bears' conference-best defense.

Arel Gordon and Maine were knocked from the ranks of the Atlantic 10 unbeatens on Saturday when they lost, 3-0, to Rhode Island.

Nail-biter decides UM's fate

You can barely even blink an eye in 58-hundreths of a second. Think about it: that's 0.58, or about half a second.

But that's how much the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team (1-1) lost the 400-yard freestyle relay by in Saturday's dual meet against the United States Military Academy (1-0).

People may talk about close games or matches in other sports, but it truly cannot get any closer than the meet at the Joseph R. Rogers Pool this past weekend.

After a full afternoon of fierce swimming and diving competition, the swimmers of the first leg of the men's 400 freestyle relay took their positions on the starting blocks for the meet's final event.

With the score 142-141, in favor of the Black Knights, the team that took first place in the race would win the meet.

The nature of a relay is that you pick up where your teammate left off. So the swimmers whom you follow put you in the position of either having to make up or maintain a lead.

However, in the 400 freestyle, all four swimmers of the UMass and Army "A teams" were neck and neck for virtually the entire race.

Army took a nearly one second lead after the first 100 yards. Next, UMass junior A.J. Vozella swam a faster second leg than his opponent, but failed to completely make up the time lost from the first two laps.

Junior Zach Pries swam the third leg in 47.78 seconds and gained the overall lead in the race for the Minutemen.

So the stage was set for the final 100 yards, with the outcome of the entire meet at stake. The battle between UMass freshman Trevor Ziegler and Army senior Efri Ruthenberg was highly competitive, as both athletes swam the fastest legs of the race for their respective teams.

But after two laps, Ruthenburg touched the wall first, winning by a distance no longer than the length of his forearm and sealing the victory for the Black Knights. The Minutemen also took fourth and fifth place in the race, while Army added third.

The final relays for both the men and women brought the near capacity crowd to its feet. Both the UMass coaches and athletes appreciated the fan support, especially women's coach Bob Newcomb.

"What a great environment," Newcomb said. "I know we say a lot of things about Boyden [being] an older facility, but it can't get any better than the environment that we had at the end of the meet. In the men's and the women's relays, we had people standing and cheering — it was loud and exciting. This is a great pool for a dual meet."

With only two home meets on the schedule, there's only one more opportunity this season for the UMass swimmers and divers to compete in front of the home fans. And if the next meet is even a fraction as exciting as the last, there should be no shortage of supporters in the stands cheering on the Maroon and White.

weekend for the highly anticipated matchup between the Atlantic 10 North rivals. The Wildcats dropped two straight games — 42-23 to James Madison and 36-35 to Northeastern — and fell from a No. 1 ranking early in the season to a No. 9 ranking as of now. UMass, on the other hand, climbed one spot to No. 3 in the country after the No. 3 team, Illinois State, lost 27-13 to Youngstown State, and skipped down to No. 8.

"We have one more road trip ahead of us in Durham [at New Hampshire] and I know our guys are looking forward to that," UMass coach Don Brown said.

"It is a grudge match," Baylark said. "We will have a lot of emotion. We will have more focus in practice this week and be ready for New Hampshire next Saturday."

Hager rolls the dice again

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Northeastern coach Rocky Hager displayed his bold play calling already this season. Against New Hampshire in overtime, Hager went for a two-point conversion after pulling within one point on a touchdown. His team converted and won the game by one point, 36-35.

This week, Hager pulled some similar trickery when he called for a double-pass play. Quarterback John Sperrazza dropped back with just under five minutes to go in the fourth, and threw a lob to wide out Chris Plum. After the completed pass, several UMass linebackers closed in on Plum, but he dropped back to throw to tight end Kendrick Ballantyne. Brandon Smith and Tracy Belton stuck to Ballantyne despite the trick play, and broke up the pass, essentially saving the game.

Hager also shared a piece of his strategy after the game, when he said that he would have gone for a two-point conversion and the win had his team put the ball in the end zone.

BAYLARK FUMBLE?

With six minutes left in the fourth quarter of Saturday's game between the Massachusetts football team and the Northeastern Huskies, running back Steve Baylark — who surpassed the 1,000-yard season rushing mark with 152 yards on the ground Saturday — ticked precious seconds off of the clock with every run.

UMass had a 7-0 lead over the Huskies and scoring opportunities were limited. A field goal would have sealed the game. But an uncharacteristic fumble from Baylark — his first of the season — stunned everyone at Parsons Field. The ball bounced loose down the left sideline and NU safety Richard Orah picked it cleanly from the turf and took off in a full sprint.

UMass Football

Only UMass center Alex Miller stood between Orah and the tying touchdown. Miller took the "angle of pursuit," as he says, and clipped Orah's foot, dragging him to the turf. It was one of several key impact plays in the game. The tackle was the first of Miller's career.

RUNNING ON EMPTY

In Saturday's contest against NU, the Minutemen carried the ball 42 times for 165 yards. Northeastern matched UMass in carries but rushed for just 123 overall yards. Baylark had 152 of the 165 for the Minutemen . .

The Huskies received on Saturday's opening kickoff and began the first drive of the day on their own 23-yard line. Because of the rain, UMass coach Don Brown and Northeastern coach Rocky Hager kept the ball on the ground for most of the game. That became evident after NU's first drive, which lasted 8:41 on 11 plays totaling 45 yards. The drive ended with a punt. Northeastern started a similar drive with 5:14 left in the third quarter. The Huskies drove all the way down to the UMass 8 before safety James Ihedigbo tackled running back Maurice Murray behind the line of scrimmage on fourth down to force a turnover on downs. Northeastern had already converted one fourth-down play on the drive, which ate 8:08 off the clock before UMass took over with 12:08 left in the fourth.

MICHAEL PHILLIPS/COLLEGIAN

Saturday's 7-0 win over Northeastern was the second time this season cornerback Sean Smalls and the Minutemen shutout the opposition.

SHARED HISTORY

UMass has won 19 of its last 20 matchups with Northeastern. Its only loss was at the hands of Don Brown, when he paraded the Northeastern sidelines . . . The last time that UMass won a game in which there was only one score came in 1990, when the Minutemen beat the Villanova Wildcats, 3-0, on Nov. 10. The Minutemen took care of the Wildcats this season by a 31-21 score on the road . . . Courtney Robinson and J.J. Moore both had significant special teams plays in UMass' win on Saturday. Robinson returned the NU kickoff 42 yards to start the second half, guaranteeing his team good field position on a day that greatly valued the stat. Moore returned a Huskies punt 47 yards with just under four minutes left in the second quarter to set up the lone score of the day, a three-yard run by tailback Tim Washington.

Late-season slide doomed Minutemen

Jeremy Rice

The Massachusetts men's soccer team closed out its season unceremoniously this past weekend, losing a pair of games to two of the top teams in the Atlantic 10. The dark, ominous clouds that hung over Rudd Field behaved much like the players on the field that day.

They showed up promptly at game time, and were gone soon thereafter. After losing to Duquesne 1-0, the Minutemen were off the field before some of the crowd left, likely as ashamed of their performance that day as they were of their performance during the second half of the season.

They looked tired out there Sunday. They looked disappointed, downtrodden and disheartened. They appeared to make little effort to win, especially after falling behind.

UMass looked like a team that knew what it had, and knew that it gave it up. For a team that started 6-0-1 against a number of good squads, to finish 8-8-3 and on the outside, looking in at the A-10 tournament is unacceptable.

The Minutemen were once No. 22 in the nation. Now they are back to Square One, wondering what happened to a team with so much promise, so much youth and so much talent.

The Minutemen's season effectively ended when the A-10 season began. UMass kicked off conference play by losing to George Washington and La Salle — two teams that are also sitting at home during the conference tourney — by a score of 8-0.

Whatever the reason for the losses — travel, disappointment of losing its first game the week before — this team collapsed during that road trip and never recovered.

The Minutemen played the rest of the schedule pretty close and many of the remaining could have gone either way. But not getting any points that first weekend against a pair of marginal teams sunk the Minutemen in the end.

While the team wonders until next August, we'll take a look right now and grade the team in each area of the game.

OFFENSE: D+

Most every loss or tie the Minutemen had this season could be attributed to their lack of ability to accomplish what is essentially the point of the game: putting the ball in the net.

They played more games than they scored goals, to the tune of 14 scores in 19 games, and were shut out eight times.

UMass coach Sam Koch said before every game that the team is creating scoring chances, but his guys just weren't finishing — meaning getting the ball into

Fischer, DeRosa earn accolades

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts cross country teams matched themselves up against the rest of the Atlantic 10 conference on Saturday at Schenley Park in Pittsburgh. The Minutemen placed third and the Minutewomen finished sixth. Juniors Nils Fischer and Christina DeRosa earned A-10 All-Conference honors.

The Minutemen scored 99 points, only two points ahead of Richmond.

"We did have a good day, and I was happy the narrow points spread fell in our favor because the kids have worked hard and they really competed exceptionally hard," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "They really deserve the reward of third-place performance."

Fischer crossed the finish line first for the Minutemen and ninth overall (25:49.00). Behind him, sophomore Jesse Regnier placed 17th (26:07.80). Regnier and Fischer have been consistently placing first and second for the team.

"Nils [Fischer] and Jesse Regnier are a really nice one-two punch for us," O'Brien said. "Nils really deserves [the A-10 honor]. He worked extremely hard over the summer.

"Last year, as a sophomore, he finished 26th, and to come all the way back to All-Conference this year was a great reward for the effort that he put in all summer," he added. "They've been pushing each other in practice and in meets, and I think that combination really worked for us [Saturday]."

Freshman Andrew McCann placed third on the team, and 19th overall (26:12.25).

"Andrew has been a mainstay for us all year long even though he's a freshman," O'Brien said. "He's used to championship meet performances. He comes from a great high school program and he was able yesterday to perform well. That's tough for a freshman in his first competition, but he's been tested at the high school level and it showed [Saturday]."

Junior Ryan Durkin finished 23rd (26:18.95), a significant jump from last year's 72nd-place finish.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Junior Ryan Durkin finished 23rd at this weekend's Atlantic 10 Championships. It is a vast improvement on his 72nd-place finish in 2005.

"[He] has really worked his way up the ladder, and he's been a great leader," O'Brien said.

Right behind Durkin was junior Mark Kenwood, who finished 31st with a time of 26:29.

"One of the kids who's been in the background that stepped forward on a couple occasions this year, and probably was one of the major reasons we snuck out that third-place spot is Mark Kenwood," O'Brien said of the Rhode Island native.

"Mark was in the background considerably last year, but he's really stepped up for several weeks and made his presence felt, and I think that was a critical part in our success. The guys sometimes in those fourth, fifth and sixth places go unnoticed because they're not the headliners, but when you have a two or three point difference in scoring, you have five or six people coming within two seconds, and those guys back there did a great job," O'Brien said.

The Minutewomen finished with 163 points. DeRosa finished first for the Minutewomen and 10th overall (18:29.65).

"This team is the foundation of the UMass cross country team rising back to the top of the [Atlantic 10] conference," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "Except that from here we only continue to get better."

Junior Taryn Trapp finished behind DeRosa (30th overall).

"She ran a fantastic race, and her head was into it," LaFreniere said. "She's a great competitor and a really hard trainer."

Senior Cuisle Kierans and younger sister, sophomore Eilis Kierans, finished 37th (19:27.15) and 38th (19:27.45), respectively.

"The Kieran sisters are just fantastic. It's too bad Cuisle is graduating because her sister's really pushing her," LaFreniere said.

The Minutewomen have been hurting all season. Their top recruit from Canada, freshman Shiyi Zan, is out for the year with an injury. Senior Amanda

Minutewomen bid farewell to seniors

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Saying goodbye is never easy.

And it wasn't easy for the Massachusetts field hockey team to get the ball past Rhode Island Rams goalie M.J. Britt in a 1-0 loss Saturday. As a result, the Minutewomen bid an untimely farewell to their three seniors on Senior Day, forward Gina Sanders and defenders Kwylan Jaggassar and Paula Verma.

Britt made 14 saves against a desperate UMass team looking to advance to the A-10 Tournament and prolong the careers of Sanders, Jaggassar and Verma. But it was not to be on a day the Minutewomen arguably played their best game of the 2006 campaign.

During the season, Shea preached that the team must move forward after heartbreaking losses and put games behind them. But there will be no moving forward and no "next time" for UMass' upperclassmen.

There will be no trip to the A-10 Tournament — it's only the second time in 18 years UMass has failed to advance to the tournament. And of course, there will be no chance to avenge a 5-2 loss earlier in the season to the perennial A-10 powerhouse Richmond Spiders. UMass' seniors were never able to get past Richmond, losing to the Spiders in the A-10 Championship game in 2004 and 2005.

Sanders may not have ended her career the way she wanted to Saturday, being substituted for with 28 minutes remaining in regulation. She never got back into the game. The sideline was a place Sanders got to know well throughout her career suffering from knee injuries her first three seasons. The California native spoke candidly about why she was taken out of the game Saturday.

"I was subbed because I wasn't playing well and not doing what was needed to be done to finish," Sanders said. "I would have liked to have played more, but I understood the situation we were in and understood it was a game we had to win."

Sanders, however, isn't choosing to remember Saturday based on that one substitution.

"I felt really blessed that my whole family was there," Sanders said. "It was a very emotional setting and a very bittersweet feeling knowing it was my last game at home."

Sanders may have enjoyed her first injury-free season, but Jaggassar would not be so lucky, going down with a season-ending thumb injury against St. Louis earlier this season.

"It was probably one of the hardest things I ever had to go through," Jaggassar said about the injury. "I'm going to miss practicing and always being with my teammates. I've always played sports and been part of a team."

But even before the injury put Jaggassar on the shelf, the elder defenseman was not being acknowledged for what she was doing on the field as much as she was for what had happened off of it.

Jaggassar's season hit its first bump in the road when she and four other players were suspended for a violation of team rules right before the team's home opener. Verma was also one of those suspended.

For Verma, Saturday was a game which three years ago the junior could have never dreamed about playing in. The communications major had not been recruited to play field hockey at UMass and made the team as a walk-on after trying out during the second semester of her freshman year.

"I really didn't think I was going to make it this far," Verma said. "I just took everything as it came and never expected anything. I'm going to miss just the whole experience of playing here. It would have been impossible to make it without my teammates. Those 20 girls were there for me every day."

"I think one of the most important things is that you're not defined by wins and losses," UMass coach Patty Shea said about her departing players. "The legacy and footprint left by our three seniors has nothing to do with wins or losses, but has everything to do with the character they left. They've left a great legacy for our underclassmen to build on."

The future may be bright for UMass field hockey, but the 373 who were in attendance Saturday saw the lights go down on the careers of Sanders, Jaggassar and Verma.

UMass grabs two wins in rainy weekend

BY KEVIN COLLINS
GOLDEN CORRESPONDENT

It was a windy, rainy weekend for the Massachusetts women's crew team in upstate New York. The Minutewomen competed in the Head of the Fish Regatta in Saratoga, N.Y.

Saturday's chilly temperatures, torrential rains, and gale-force winds did not keep UMass from recording two first place finishes. However, the inclement weather was severe enough on Sunday to cancel the remaining races.

The first of two wins on the day belonged to the UMass open quad. The boat consisted of sophomore Sarah Marsan and juniors Hannah Brewster, Ellen Maskrey and Tara Guinan.

The Minutewomen rowed the course in a time of 12:04.30, blowing the competition away by more than 45 seconds. The Saratoga Rowing Association finished in second with a time of 12:52.59, while Skidmore College rounded out the top three with a time of 13:09.75.

The womens open eight also emerged victorious on the day, competing against more than 20 other boats.

The open crew includes freshmen Airlina Burrill and Haley Fitzgerald, sophomores Dana Pulda and Marsan, juniors Maskrey, Brewster and Kristin Boyce and senior Gabrielle Papineau. Junior Tara Guinan served as the coxswain for the race.

Massachusetts finished with a time of 11:34.79, just ahead of second place Williams at 11:38.55 and third-place Colgate, who finished in 11:43.99.

UMass recorded an impressive fifth-place finish in the women's open four-final. The four rowers were Burrill, sophomore Mariah McCormick, Marsan and Papineau. Maskrey served as the coxswain.

The Minutewomen were competing against 34 other boats, and finished with a time of 12:56.29. Williams took first place with a time of 12:44.43, while Buffalo came in second at 12:44.56.

The UMass lightweight four also experienced success on Saturday, finishing third. It rowed the course in a time of 14:10.04. Buffalo won the race with a time of 14:04.38, while Fairfield came in second at 14:05.97.

Brewster competed in the women's open single for UMass. The 21-year-old Brewster, hailing from Plymouth, Mass., finished the race in second place with a time of 14:10.82.

UMass also entered junior Anna Malinkevich in the women's lightweight single. The Shrewsbury, Mass. native finished the race with a third-place time of 14:38.23.

A boat from the GMS Rowing Center took first with a time of 14:14.78, while a St. Catharine's Rowing Club boat took second, finishing in 14:30.79.

The UMass junior varsity eight battled the elements to a second-place finish late in the day on Saturday. The Minutewomen finished with a time of 12:23.52 just behind Hobart and William Smith, who finished in 12:09.08. Colgate rounded out the top three with a time of 12:46.34.

The novice boats also experienced success over the weekend. The novice eight finished in sixth place, while the novice four came in first.

Overall, Massachusetts head coach Jim Dietz was pleased with his crew's performance.

"It was a great wet weekend," he said. "Lots of hot chili and apple cider, and the results were good for our team."

The Minutewomen have two races left in their fall season, a novice race with Dartmouth and Yale on the weekend of Nov. 11, and The Boston University Invitational on the weekend of Nov. 18.

Deval Patrick rallies potential voters at UMass

Gubernatorial hopeful Deval Patrick spoke to a crowd of over 2,000 at yesterday's "Fresh Start for Massachusetts" community meeting, held inside the Curry Hicks Cage at the University of Massachusetts.

Deval Patrick's platform emphasizes affordable higher public education, job creation, healthcare, and the current economic status of the Commonwealth.

With just seven campaign days remaining in the Massachusetts senate elections, Democratic gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick spoke to over 2,000 potential voters inside the Curry Hicks Cage at the University of Massachusetts, yesterday.

Patrick, who was shown in two polls on October 28 to be leading Republican opponent Kerry Healy by over 25 points, spoke about his, and his running mate for Lt. governor Tim Murray's vision for education, health care and the economy in Massachusetts.

Patrick was greeted by numerous state representatives including Amherst representative Ellen Story and Massachusetts representative John Olver.

Patrick was brought to UMass by its Student Government Association, headed by President Elvis Mendez Mendez, who introduced Massachusetts Senator Stan Rosenberg. Patrick to a full-house, urged students to participate not only in the voting process, but also in the process of governmental change.

"Voting is a means not an end," said Mendez.

"We're not just trying to build a stronger democratic party, we're trying to build a stronger citizenship," said Patrick.

Rosenberg, speaking before Patrick, declared to the crowd that, when elected, Patrick would put "the 'public' back in public education."

"This is the most expensive public higher education system in the country, student here pay among the highest student fees and tuition the country, its, among the lowest state appropriation, and the Commonwealth is putting 10 percent of the capital budget into their campuses from state appropriations, every other state but Virginia puts 100 percent," said Rosenberg.

Patrick addressed UMass' recent tuition increases and alleged weary conditions of its buildings.

"I know your mandatory fees are higher than your tuition. I know that some of your buildings are fine and some are falling apart," said Patrick. "I know that you need resources here, not just money, but imagination and creativity and a willingness to focus on why this educational opportunity is important in transforming your lives just as education transformed my own. That's a different kind of leadership."

"Massachusetts is 47th in the nation in spending on public colleges and universities. We have been walking away from public universities just like this one," said Patrick.

UMass Chancellor John Lombardi wrote he was pleased to see his student taking political initiative in an email to the Daily Collegian.

"We are encouraged when students demonstrate their civic engagement by participating in the political process. In particular, our student body president, Elvis Mendez, is to be congratulated for his initiative," wrote Lombardi.

Patrick, who rose from poverty in Chicago's South side to a top position in the Clinton administration, swept to victory in the Democratic Party primary for governor last month, becoming the first African American to win a major party's nomination.

Recent advertisements that attacked Patrick created a stir throughout the state.

The first of the soft-on-crime ads targeting Patrick opens with a scene that looks like a low-budget version of the 1988 documentary,

College drinking misconceptions addressed

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students have seen the message "2 out of 3 UMass students have 4 or fewer drinks when they party" put out by the Social Norms campaign at University Health Services.

April McNally, the Community Health and Patient Educator, said, "The goal of the campaign is to correct misperceptions about student drinking."

Studies show when misperceptions are corrected, student drinking goes down and the consequences of student drinking go down, McNally said.

The message is out all around campus and is hard to miss. It is being advertised on buses, in residence halls, dining commons, sporting events, in the student newspaper, and on Channel 19. It has also been put into student planners and athletic guides, placed on pens and sticky notes, and heard on public service announcements on the radio.

All of the advertisements have cost University Health Services several thousand dollars to get the campaign underway. The investment is evidence based to be successful, said McNally.

"The message says students are drinking moderately or not at all," said McNally.

Students are often under the perception that college students are drinking a lot all of the time but that is not the case. The message is data-driven and representative of the student population, said McNally.

Health Services was prompted to launch this campaign when they looked at the data and saw that a third of students are drinking more than four drinks and decided to correct the misperception that it was all students drinking this much. Higher drinkers benefit more from a campaign, we are trying to get them to drink down and to reduce the consequences of this drinking, said McNally.

"Those students drinking above four drinks typically tend to drink down once they realize they are outside the norm. They are the moderately high drinkers and they think that they are the majority of the students on campus, but they are not," said McNally.

This is the first year of the three-year or longer campaign to reduce student drinking on campus. Health Services have received some positive feedback from students who agree, while other students don't believe the message to be true.

"Those are the students that we want to target and start a conversation with," McNally said.

MyStudentBody.com, an online alcohol education program, and Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students (BASICS), are also working on campus to reduce drinking.

In the spring semester the campaign plans to saturate the campus with the message, and then begin testing the second message, said McNally.

There is also a campus and community coalition to reduce high risk drinking on and off campus, and students are encouraged to get involved, said McNally.

New credit card technology aims to increase convenience

An experiment conducted by UMass researchers Tom Heydt-Benjamin and Kevin Fu provided information about credit card security.

By Cara Grannemann
Collegian Staff

What's in your wallet?

New technology developed by two University of Massachusetts researchers can tell you exactly what in your wallet even down to the numbers on your credit card.

Recently, two UMass researchers, Tom Heydt-Benjamin, a third-year UMass graduate student, and Professor Kevin Fu of the Computer Science department performed an experiment using a Radio Frequency Identification (RFID) machine to record and decipher radio waves coming from a credit card.

The experiment provided information indicating that the card information, including a credit card number and the cardholder's name, could be discovered by just walking past someone. The Radio Frequency Identification chips are, according to Heydt-Benjamin, "tiny computers that are powered by radio waves when they are near a radio transmitter." Once the chips get the radio wave power, they can use it to compute and transmit data over the same radio waves. The radio wave reading device looks like a small box the size of a book, hooked up to a computer monitor.

Fu and Heydt-Benjamin's experiment is just one step closer to a higher form of RFID technology.

One interesting technological prospect is the idea of a "ubiquitous computing paradigm."

Heydt-Benjamin said, "In a ubiquitous computing paradigm, we would have small computers imbedded in objects all around us, allowing our everyday environment to be greatly responsive to our needs."

It may seem like this technologys would draw similarities to such

UMass to change commencement ceremony

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

Changes in the commencement ceremony call for students to be individually acknowledged for their achievements by their academic dean, rather than being recognized as a group.

Commencement at the University of Massachusetts will take on a different air this spring due to recently announced changes in the ceremony. The most important change is that students will no longer be recognized for their achievement en masse, but individually by their academic dean.

In previous years, students simply stood up as a college for recognition, but in the new ceremony students will walk onto the stage in a line to shake hands with their dean and have their photo taken. While students won't receive their diplomas at the ceremony, they may be given diploma covers to increase the pomp and circumstance, however those details are not yet finalized.

Commencement ceremonies will move from a Saturday-Sunday schedule to a Friday-Saturday schedule starting with ceremonies for the Stockbridge School of Agriculture and graduate students, which means that finals are scheduled to end on the preceding Thursday. During the ceremony guests will also be able to watch the processions on two large screens that show the graduates as they are recognized, and a video of the ceremony—which includes a tribute to the students and the campus—will be available.

"We're trying to think about students and families so that all the graduates and their families can be there," Gloria Fox, director of Commencements said. The current changes are part of a larger trend at the University to condense ceremonies into one weekend to ensure that guests don't have to choose between which ceremony to attend. Last year, the Commonwealth College ceremony was moved to the same day as the undergraduate commencement ceremony. The changes are also part of a broader national trend to make commencement ceremonies more personal.

A change in the structure of the ceremony would seem to threaten to draw out commencement proceedings, especially at a university the size of UMass. The University expects to graduate approximately 4,200 students this spring and it would seem that giving each student a degree of individual recognition would stretch out the ceremony. However, Fox expects the change to add only 20 to 30 minutes to the length of commencement.

"I visited several other commencements across the country," Fox said. "San Francisco State's commencement, which graduated a similar number of students, lasts about 45 minutes, so it's not impossible." Fox hopes to further smooth the process out by selecting approximately 200 students on faculty and staff recommendations to serve as procession leaders, who will rehearse the ceremony so there is no last minute confusion.

Commencement will be followed by receptions held by the schools and colleges of the University outside of the stadium. Here, students will meet up with their guests and receive light refreshments, but the precise details of each reception are up to each college.

These changes come on the heels of a number of complaints from the students and their guests about the logistical problems caused by previous commencements.

utopian thrillers as Minority Report, or 1984, where computers and identification could be embedded in the body, but Heydt-Benjamin explained the technology in a more applicable perspective to daily life.

"At some point in the future, people may become used to simply walking onto subways and buses knowing that fare payment will have been negotiated automatically by turn computers without any effort on the part of the user," said Heydt-Benjamin.

Though their equipment could possibly pave the way for RFID transactions, Fu and Heydt-Benjamin are currently investigating how to provide better security and privacy in electronic identification and credit cards.

"RFID technology actually has the potential for improving security and privacy in applications such as elderly care, drug anti-counterfeiting, and shopping," said Fu.

Heydt-Benjamin agreed that privacy and protection was the purpose of their experiments.

"As small embedded computers become ubiquitous, we need to make sure they don't make loss of security and privacy at the same time," he said.

Since the experiment, researchers have faced criticism. Mastercard executive Art Kranzley was recently quoted in the New York Times, saying, "[The RFID experiment] is almost akin to somebody standing up in a theater and yelling, 'Fire!' because somebody lit a cigarette."

Further experiments, however, have revealed that many types of cards were affected by the RFID technology. "I have had the opportunity to examine several types of cards that were not in our original survey. In every case, the cards brought to us have continued to reinforce the results we have published," Heydt-Benjamin said.

The experiment is designed to help the technology of credit card companies by finding their soft spots, according to Fu and Heydt-Benjamin.

"Many first-generation technologies have growing pains. For instance, seatbelts for car safety were considered unnecessary for many decades. We expect that the RFID-enabled credit cards will eventually provide stronger privacy," said Fu. "Our sincere hope is that credit card companies will choose to use better technology in future card deployment."

Overall, it seems that the response has been "overwhelmingly positive," according to Fu. Shortly before the findings were published, the duo received a $1.1 million grant from the National Science Foundation for future work in the security and privacy of RFID and related technologies.

As for right now, Fu assures the public that there is no need to panic. "The credit card companies have sophisticated fraud detection systems to limit consumer liability," he said.

The filmed procedures of the experiment can be found on YouTube or on the experiment's analysis webpage, http://www.rfid-cusp.org/blog/blog-23-10-2006.html.

Anna Nicole fights pneumonia in same hospital son died in

Anna Nicole's hospitalization is only a precaution because she recently gave birth to daughter, Dannielynn.

BY JESSICA ROBERTSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASSAU, Bahamas— Anna Nicole Smith has been hospitalized with pneumonia at the same medical center where her 20-year-old son died under mysterious circumstances in September, an attorney for the reality TV star said Tuesday.

Smith, whose son died while visiting her in the hospital three days after she gave birth to daughter Dannielynn Hope Marshall Stern, was being treated at Doctors Hospital in Nassau, attorney Wayne Munroe said.

"She has a slight case of pneumonia," Munroe told The Associated Press. "We've had a sudden change of weather here due to a cold snap."

The attorney said the hospitalization was most likely just a precaution since Smith, 38, had recently given birth.

"I didn't gather it was anything serious," he said.

Munroe said Smith, who moved to the Bahamas during her pregnancy, has filed a lawsuit as part of a dispute with a South Carolina developer over the ownership of a waterfront mansion where she has been secluded since her son's death.

Smith's ownership of the home, which her lawyer says she bought in July for $980,000, is the basis of her claim to residency in the Bahamas. In her lawsuit, Smith asks the court to recognize her purchase and reject a claim by the developer, G. Ben Thompson.

Thompson did not immediately respond to a message left Tuesday seeking comment.

Smith's son, Daniel, died in her room at Doctors Hospital, the only private medical center in Nassau. A private examiner said the cause was a lethal combination of methadone and antidepressants.

The results of official toxicology tests and a police investigation into his death have not been released.

Dannielynn, almost 2 months old, is the subject of two paternity lawsuits filed by Larry Birkhead, who claims he is the infant's father.

Birkhead initially filed a lawsuit demanding Smith and the child come to California to establish paternity through DNA tests. A hearing is set for Nov. 8.

A second lawsuit was filed by Birkhead in the Bahamas last week alleging Smith and her current companion, Howard K. Stern, had committed fraud and conspiracy.

Meanwhile, Ron Rule, a lawyer for Smith, said allegations that Dannielynn's hair may have been dyed to make it appear that Stern is the child's father, were ridiculous.

New study links SIDS to brain stem abnormalities in infants

BY LINDSEY TANNER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO—In a small study with big implications, researchers found some of the strongest evidence yet that sudden infant death syndrome — a medical and sometimes legal mystery once known as crib death — may be caused by brain stem abnormalities.

The finding "takes the mystery away from SIDS," said Marian Willinger, a SIDS researcher at the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development, which funded the study. "It should take the guilt away from any parent who has lost a baby because they always wonder, What did I do wrong?' Now, they need to really understand, 'My baby had a disease.'"

The brain stem abnormalities involve an imbalance in the way the brain uses the neurotransmitter serotonin. The brain chemical plays a role in regulating mood and is the target for many depression-fighting drugs. But it also influences breathing, body temperature and arousal from sleep.

These functions are thought to go haywire when susceptible babies are exposed to certain risks, such as sleeping on their bellies, which is a leading contributor to SIDS.

The researchers studied autopsied brain tissue from 31 SIDS babies and 10 infants who died of other causes. SIDS babies had about double the number of nerve cells displaying serotonin defects.

Right now, the defects cannot be detected until after death. The researchers hope their work leads to a diagnosis test that could identify infants at risk and allow parents to take precautions.

That will probably take at least 10 years, but the study results show the research appears to be headed in the right direction, said Dr. Hannah Kinney, a co-author and prominent SIDS researcher at Children's Hospital Boston.

The study was published in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association.

"This finding lends credence to the view that SIDS risk may greatly increase when an underlying predisposition combines with an environmental risk — such as sleeping face down — at a developmentally sensitive time in early life," said Dr. Duane Alexander, director of the government institute that backed the study.

Kinney said serotonin defects probably cause at least half of all SIDS cases.

Other theories for what causes SIDS include infections and mutations that cause heart rhythm abnormalities. But it is possible that serotonin defects are an underlying cause in SIDS cases attributed to some of those defects, said Dr. Debra Ellyn Weese-Mayer, a SIDS researcher at Chicago's Rush University Medical Center.

While the study involved only a

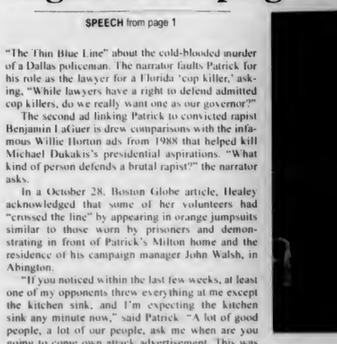
"The Thin Blue Line" about the cold-blooded murder of a Dallas policeman. The narrator faults Patrick for his role as the lawyer for a Florida 'cop killer,' asking, "While lawyers have a right to defend admitted cop killers, do we really want one as our governor?"

The second ad linking Patrick to convicted rapist Benjamin LaGuer is drew comparisons with the infamous Willie Horton ads from 1988 that helped kill Michael Dukakis's presidential aspirations. "What kind of person defends a brutal rapist?" the narrator asks.

In a October 28, Boston Globe article, Healey acknowledged that some of her volunteers had "crossed the line" by appearing in orange jumpsuits similar to those worn by prisoners and demonstrating in front of Patrick's Milton home and the residence of his campaign manager John Walsh, in Abington.

"If you noticed within the last few weeks, at least one of my opponents threw everything at me except the kitchen sink, and I'm expecting the kitchen sink any minute now," said Patrick. "A lot of good people, a lot of our people, ask me when are you going to come own attack advertisement. This was no small calculus for me, but we're different. We build people up here, ask be to look to and be about the best people we are and the best we have."

Patrick said that of all the critiques he receives from Healey, the one that bothers him the most was her statement that while she admits Patrick can "give a good speech…it's only words."



Massachusetts is ranked 42nd in job creation and 47th in public education spending, nationally.

Congressman Richard Neal called for students to volunteer time to make campaign phone calls.

"I want you to think about that comment, 'It's just words,'" said Patrick. "'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal', just words. 'We have nothing to fear but fear itself', just words. 'I have a dream', just words," said Patrick. "I'll say it for you. I know I'm no Dr. King, I'm not John Kennedy or Franklin Roosevelt, certainly no Thomas Jefferson. But I do know the right words spoken from the heart with conviction become a vision of a place just beyond the unseen are a call for action."

The speech comes just two weeks after Former president Bill Clinton rallied a crowd of about 1,200 people at the Westin Copley Hotel in Boston, raising over $2 million for Patrick.

"My grandmother use to say 'hope for the best and work for it', and we have to go to work, said Patrick. "Because victory is not on November 7, although it is an important step along the way. Victory isn't in January when, with your help, I take the oath in the Oval Office. The victory comes when every man woman and child of the Commonwealth reached that goal, that's where we're going."

"It's not a campaign, it a movement of change," said Patrick.

Research shows boys are more likely than girls to suffer from SIDS small number of infants, it is a convincing argument for the brain stem theory, said Weese-Mayer, who was not involved in the research.

SIDS kills more than 2,000 U.S. infants each year and is the leading cause of death in U.S. babies after the newborn period. Rates are similar in other Western nations, but SIDS definitions vary elsewhere, so global rates are unclear, Kinney said.

In the United States, a death is pronounced SIDS after an autopsy and death scene investigation. A SIDS diagnosis means no other cause of death can be found in an otherwise healthy infant who dies suddenly. Over the years, some cases that were written off as SIDS proved to be homicides, sometimes committed by mothers who smothered their babies.

Boys are about twice as likely as girls to suffer SIDS, and serotonin defects were more prevalent in boys in the study.

Also, 28 of the babies studied, or 90 percent, experienced an environmental risk around the time of death, including respiratory infections, stomach-sleeping and sleeping in a bed or couch.

The risk of SIDS increases greatly when babies sleep on their stomachs. A nationwide campaign urging parents to place babies to sleep on their backs, launched over a decade ago, has helped reduce SIDS rates. Still, two-thirds of the SIDS babies in Kinney's study were sleeping on their stomachs or sides when they died.

More than 2,000 U.S. infants die as a result of Sudden Infant Death Syndrome annually.

China's new death penalty law to require higher court approval

BY AUDRA AXU
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING – China, believed to carry out more court-ordered executions than all other nations combined, took a step toward human rights Tuesday by enacting legislation that requires approval from the country's highest court before putting anyone to death.

Human rights activists expressed hope the country will reduce its use of the ultimate penalty. The amendment to China's capital punishment law follows reports of executions of wrongly convicted people and criticism that lower courts have arbitrarily imposed the death sentence.

China is thought to put to execute hundreds, and possibly thousands, of people each year for crimes ranging from murder to such nonviolent offenses as tax evasion. Amnesty International says China executed at least 1,770 people in 2005, but the true number is thought to be many times higher.

In a statement Tuesday, the London-based rights group cited a senior member of China's national legislature as saying some 10,000 people are executed each year. By Amnesty's figures of known executions, China was responsible for more than 80 percent of the 2,148 people executed last year around the world, including 60 in the United States.

"Clearly the changes are going in the right direction," Mark Allison, a Hong Kong-based researcher for Amnesty, said of the new legislation, which takes effect Jan. 1. "But we're still calling for China to go further to abolish the death penalty."

China's official Xinhua News Agency hailed the amendment as "the most important reform of capital punishment in China in more than two decades."

The change "deprives the provincial people's courts of the final say on issuing death sentences," the agency said. "Death penalties handed out by provincial courts must be reviewed and ratified by the Supreme People's Court."

The change adopted by the legislature Tuesday enshrines last year's announcement by the Supreme People's Court that it would start reviewing all death sentences, ending a 23-year-old practice of giving the final review to provincial courts.

"It's great news. This is a big step forward for China's legal system and human rights," said Li Heping, a prominent activist lawyer.

"It's going to have a psychological effect on local judges when they are making decisions because they are going to be afraid that if they approve capital punishment, the supreme court will overrule them," Li said.

Three NATO soliders killed, one wounded in roadside bombing

Three troops were killed when a blast ripped through a NATO convoy in eastern Afghanistan.

BY JASON STRAZIUSO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan – A roadside bomb ripped through a NATO vehicle on Tuesday, killing three soldiers on patrol in a mountainous region of eastern Afghanistan.

NATO said two soldiers were killed in the blast in Nuristan province and two wounded troops were taken to a military medical facility, where one of the soldiers died of his injuries.

The Western alliance did not release the nationalities of the soldiers, but U.S. troops are the primary NATO component in the area.

The three deaths brings to five the number of troops who have died in Afghanistan in the last week. A NATO soldier died Monday in a battle in Zabul province, where U.S. troops also make up the bulk of Western forces, and the Department of Defense said a U.S. soldier died last Friday from non-combat related injuries.

At least 65 U.S. troops have died in Afghanistan this year, according to the Department of Defense. About 70 U.S. troops died in Afghanistan last year.

U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns insisted, however, that there was reason to be optimistic about Afghanistan's future.

"We don't believe Taliban represents a strategic threat" to the central government, he told reporters after addressing a U.S.-Afghan business group in Washington. He said the reason for rising casualties is that "we are taking the battle to the Taliban."

He also told the business group he would go to Kabul in January to hold strategic talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

NATO, meanwhile, said 12 Taliban militants were killed Monday night in the southern province of Kandahar after insurgents were identified setting up a firing position on a roof. Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said air support was used during the attack in Zhari district.

Afghanistan has seen a spate of battles and attacks in the last week that has left more than 150 insurgents dead, according to NATO. Part of that violence comes as soldiers participating in a joint NATO-Afghan offensive have been moving into areas where insurgents are active in order to increase security there.

Court blocks temporary ban on sale of 'light' cigarettes

BY MATT APUZZO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—A federal appeals court blocked a landmark judgment against the tobacco industry Tuesday, clearing the way for the companies to continue selling "light" and "low tar" cigarettes until their appeals can be reviewed.

The decision by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also allows the companies to continue for now the advertising campaigns that a federal judge in August ruled were misleading.

Without comment, the appeals court granted the tobacco companies' request to put Judge Gladys Kessler's order on hold. The companies have argued that her far-reaching ruling could cost them millions of dollars and lead to a loss of customers.

In mid-August, Kessler ruled that the companies had violated racketeering laws and conspired for decades to mislead the public about the health hazards of smoking.

The judge ordered the companies to publish in newspapers and on their Web sites "corrective statements" on the adverse health effects and addictiveness of smoking and nicotine.

She also ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild," since such cigarettes have been found to be no safer than others because of how people smoke them.

William V. Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, said the appeals court stay was not surprising.

Americans and alcohol

"There are people in other countries with adolescent drinking problems; but the fatality rate of alcohol consumption in America is a great deal higher."

Lauren Modisette

The American culture is unbelievably different from the cultures of our foreign ancestors. Our food is fattier, our cars are bigger, we use GMO's and chemicals; but one of the biggest differences is we use alcohol in a much more abusive manner than the majority of European countries.

It seems as though the modern day American college student has become so out of control that enhancing the rules and authority is the only other option for institutions to take. Naturally, townies around the nation have their complaints about the rowdy students who pillage their communities from Thursday to Saturday, but what can you really expect when you live in a place with thousands of adolescent Americans who are finally free of their parents' grasps and can indulge in nearly anything they desire?

Since it is illegal for any American to consume alcohol under the age of 21, it makes it that much more fun to partake in the underage drinking scene because of the risk factor. In other countries, adolescents are taught to appreciate alcohol with their families and learn how to drink for pleasure and not simply to get hammered, like us.

In France, the drinking age is 16, and in England it is 18. So, why is our country compacted with so many alcohol-thirsty over-partiers that the government had to up the drinking age to attempt to decrease the fatality rate?

According to mudpc.org, the average American begins to experiment with alcohol around the age of 13. Some of you will be smiling as you remember the first time you drank that bottle of vodka with your buddies and puked it up everywhere because you didn't know what you were getting into.

In other countries, adolescents are slowly exposed to alcohol by their parents around this time, or even younger, and while there are still those adolescents who continually drink to get drunk, the number is smaller than that of Americans.

This institution isn't what needs to change, it is the way American children are brought up. If Americans began to incorporate the concept of wine appreciation and slowly exposed adolescents to the comforts of alcohol, they would be less likely to go overboard and abuse it the way it is now.

The American people need to address this widely abused substance among a majority of American people, and construct a solution to change the adolescent American perception of this wonder drug.

Not to say America hasn't tried; sure there are health classes and D.A.R.E., but how many of us truly remember what we learned in those classes? They were the classes where you sat in a corner and took a nap and somehow still managed to pass.

Children and teenagers won't simply absorb the concept of how manipulative and inhibiting alcohol is until they try it, a class or two won't keep the majority from indulging. The issues need to be addressed in the home at an earlier age if we want to someday see a country which isn't overrun by alcoholics and if we want to have the freedom our country is beginning to revoke.

Sure, there are people in other countries with adolescent drinking problems; but the fatality rate of alcohol consumption in America is a great deal higher than that is say, Canada. A study found that 93 percent of Canadians have resisted getting behind the wheel when apparently inebriated. Only 6.7 percent of Canadians have driven when they knew they were over the legal limit.

Considering the size of Canada, that is a small number. I would bet you anything if we conducted a survey, we would find a much higher percentage among the students in the five-college community.

As the winter months approach, the desire to drink heavily and drive suddenly becomes the comfortable alternative to walking the frozen streets to get to a party. It begins to get darker sooner, and students begin to find themselves wanting to get the night started as the sun wilts away.

I'm sure the campus and Amherst Police forces are looking forward to those months bitter-sweetly. You can't drive down North Pleasant Street or University Ave. in these slightly warmer months without seeing two or three cops interrogating the individuals they've flagged down. I can only imagine how much the authority increases in those icy winter months.

America needs to begin to alter the people's view on alcohol, or it may be a privilege that is revoked altogether. Honestly, this wouldn't surprise me; but it wouldn't be something I would personally appreciate. We are a strong country, good people reside here. So how is it that such a great country is filled with so many irresponsible citizens?

Same-sex college

Andrew Freeman

Picture UMass – our verdant paradise of concrete in the autumn and imagine it without any individuals of the opposite sex.

There is a new movement afoot in the realm of education: dividing students into single-sex classrooms and schools. On Oct. 24th, the Federal Department of Education released new rules allowing public schools to be segregated on the basis of gender.

This movement is fronted by people like Dr. Leonard Sax, author of "Why Gender Matters." Sax asserts in his book that there are significant biological differences between sexes – women have more acute hearing for example, while men struggle to pay attention in quiet classrooms.

He believes education should incorporate these inherent differences between the sexes.

This year, a Louisiana district sought to segregate its high school, incorporating Sax's teachings in the curriculum. Boys would learn about heroism and how to "be a man," while girls would get "character education." Unfortunately, lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union descended upon the town, and forced the district to cease its plans.

Apparently there is still significant opposition to segregation in American society. However, these worries are unjustified; the new federal rules require single-sex schools to provide "substantially equal" services. This fulfills the legal standard of "separate but equal" that arose out of the Supreme Court's 1896 decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, which provided for decades of effective and fair segregation.

Gender segregation should be implemented posthaste at UMass, as it will improve both education and morality exponentially. The best way to accomplish this would be a 20-foot wall through the center of campus, dividing it into male and female sections, and allowing us to address the crises of college life.

The greatest problem with today's college culture is its relentless focus on sex. Sax argues the prevailing practice of "body-part sex" is harmful to both men and women, impeding the formation of significant relationships.

Sending men to female-free reeducation camps and teaching them to be manly will undoubtedly stop them from objectifying women. Furthermore, this segregation will also allow us to replace body-part sex with textual intercourse: sex in which men and women read the Bible to one another.

Another critical problem with colleges is their embrace of men who do not adhere to gender norms. Sax notes these "anomalous males" often excel in school, are typically loners and shy away from sports. He provides the example of NASA mission specialists as anomalous males, since they often experience dizziness on space flights, unlike the presumably more macho pilots. He notes direly that a young anomalous male "may grow up to be a mission specialist... but he'll never be the pilot."

Girls would be similarly privileged, freed from unfair academic expectations and the shacles of coed study, and returned to their biological purpose.

Creating an all-male section of campus – a Man Zone – would help to root out such individuals, and treat their affliction. Sax recommends that young anomalous males be treated with unrelenting discipline, and prescribed high dosages of competitive sports; such methods should also be employed here.

The best way to instill these virtues is through an Army boot camp. Turning over education in the Man Zone to the Army would not only cure anomalies and produce real men; it would also provide a new source of recruits for nation-building in Iraq.

Based on a new study, perhaps this should be a future construction project for UMass campus.

Girls would be similarly privileged, freed from unfair academic expectations and the shackles of coed study, and returned to their biological purpose. Sax asserts girls are "much more likely to embrace little babies and be interested in babies" than males, and that practicing the care of children will make them better mothers. Therefore, the female section of campus would be called Mother Land, and it would incorporate nurseries and daycare for girls to practice being mothers.

It should be noted that Sax does not carry out research, and his interpretation of studies has been called into question. For example, University of Pennsylvania professor Mark Liberman criticized Sax's claim on hearing.

On the blog "Language Log," he notes the study Sax cited actually found boys have slightly more sensitive hearing than girls. However, since Sax is clearly a real man, his work should not be held up to exacting standards.

Single-sex education truly has potential here at UMass. We should not stop at the class-division of the North Apartments, but must continue up the towering heights of segregation. We must do this, because nothing better exemplifies the promise of America freedom from being judged by arbitrary standards and stereotypes – than segregation.

Ode to College Joys

Nick Milano

I was sitting in my history class last week and had the urge to go to the bathroom. I did not have to raise my hand and ask for permission to get my hall pass signed. It was pretty awesome. My first class on Tuesdays and Thursdays is at one o'clock. That is even better.

I had always heard how much better college is than high school, but until I was actually living the college life, I doubted it could be so relaxing. As this is the time of year for endorsements, though usually in the political arena, I endorse college life.

My high school prided itself on being very difficult for its students. On one of the first days of seventh grade, we were told to "look to the left and to the right of you" because those same students would not be there at graduation in six years. As if we seventh graders were not terrified enough, the headmaster had to inform us a high percentage of us were going to flunk out.

This is a pessimistic outlook on life but, scary enough, it came true. Not adhering to the rules or failing to perform up to par in classes cost a countless number of students the chance to walk across the stage at graduation. Those who survived, however, are blessed with an ability to follow even the stupidest of rules, or at least follow them often enough to get by. I find myself trying to arrive at class early enough to ensure I will not get a "misdemeanor mark" an automatic deduction in my contact grade by a full letter.

I was thirsty in one of my political science classes, and I could actually drink some Gatorade. Just a year ago, I would have had to bring out the James Bond slyness in me to sneak a sip. If the teacher possessed a sixth sense for rule breakers (oddly, something many of them had), I would have had to sacrifice my tasty and sugary beverage in favor of a drink from a water fountain. It is said that Boston's water is some of the cleanest, but not warm water from pipes older than... well, I never cared to ask.

There is no more navigating of overcrowded hallways. Five years ago, I was a seventh grader running through, around, and away from seniors. One year ago, I was a senior pissed off as seventh and eighth graders ran through, around, and away from me.

I had no idea how to waste away Saturday like it is the day after Thanksgiving. Now, I can sit around and do nothing with the best of them.

Now I get to walk from class to class in the beautiful outdoors and breathe in that fresh air. For the past six years, I woke up with the sun to take two buses or a bus and a train to school. Now, I wake up around nine every weekday, a good three hours more sleep than high school ever permitted.

Two of my friends do not even have classes on Friday, and one of them has only one class on Monday and Wednesday: College life. Wow. It is scary to question whether we are getting what we pay for (over $17,000 for 2007-08), but that is a topic for another day.

A couple of months ago, I was a clueless freshman, and in many ways, I still am. I had no idea how to waste away Saturday like it is the day after Thanksgiving. Now, I can sit around and do nothing with the best of them.

Is this particular skill a good thing? Probably not, but for the time being, I am not about to complain. The school part of college has also been easier. Unlike some high-school classes, quizzes are not given everyday, but then again, you have to develop self-discipline to force yourself to do the readings.

It is nice to be outside, but when it is cold and rainy, who really wants to walk to class, especially up and down that beast of a climb up and down Orchard Hill? Still, the positives outweigh the negatives, and I think I could live like this forever, accumulating degree after degree. Who's with me?

UMASS POLITICS

In a setting such as a college campus, having views that go against the current of the majority can feel oppressive. While I identify myself as a left-leaning moderate, I have no feelings of animosity towards conservatives. In fact, I have a great deal of respect for alternative opinions and views, and believe that the two-party structure has served the American public well through a large portion of its history.

I would agree that professors at this university have predominantly left-of-center political leanings. The same is true for many universities and colleges across the country. It is an inexplicable phenomenon of academia.

In my experience, the extent to which political beliefs are expressed in lectures and assignments varies a great deal. Most professors assign a variety of readings to supplement main texts to represent multiple points of view. In lecture, professors have made the curriculum and academic material top priority, and opinionated commentary is limited.

But making objective criticisms of the government or of President Bush does not make someone a liberal demagogue. Honest evaluation of our contemporaries is the duty of Americans if we are to continue to live in a virtuous democracy.

Politically-geared student groups on this campus exist to promote common interests and seek to engage students who feel strongly enough about certain issues to take action and seek involvement. Although there are some exceptions, I believe that their agendas are not to suppress alternative points of view. These organizations enjoy the right to free speech and in turn, respect the rights of others.

It is unfortunate that the ideological extremism of the few has cast a Shadow on the many. Oftentimes in political debate, people fail to acknowledge alternative points of view. There is a difference between listening and waiting for your turn to speak.

When I first became interested in politics, I was more partisan and had little patience for those whom I disagreed with. Yet the more I came to understand the political arena and the polarizing ideological struggles in Washington, the less enchanted I became with the restrictiveness of the liberal/conservative ideologues. I do not find myself entirely embracing either mold. I simply hope that in expressing our ideas and opinions, we can somehow find the ability to be respectful and civil.

HEARING IS UNDERSTANDING

Dear Collegian,

I was at the Annual Social of the Native American Student Support Services this weekend in the Student Union. It was fantastic. It was welcoming, energized, and supportive of people of all ages and all backgrounds, even as it profoundly spoke to pride in the Native People.

I witnessed, and felt deeply, the pain, shock, and anger of their community elders when they discovered the negative, degrading editorial published by this paper last week, called "The Seal of Disapproval."

This kind of article feeds a regression of human understanding and growth, even on a campus which has established a Native American Studies Program. The author said he didn't understand why they would like this symbol changed? His entire article more than clarified the reasons.

I suggest that he listen for a while, without speaking out his hurtful thoughts. Listen. Witness. Then listen some more. They've been here longer than we have. We might have something to learn from them.

Victims of alienation

M.J. Toomey

Professor Norm Aitken finished his lecture at around 5:00 p.m., 15 minutes early. The class, a little over 200 strong, murmured in confusion for a moment. Aitken had apparently decided against conducting the usual PRS quiz, the major component of the student participation grade in his microeconomics class, and needless to say, the major incentive in student attendance.

When it became clear the day's class would not be recorded, that is, the typically poor PRS responses the kids would have given simply did not exist, the disoriented grumbling erupted into a deep throated and thorough jeering of Aitken's decision. Full scale boos reverberated through the moderately sized lecture hall, a denouncement of epic, gladiatorial proportions.

I overheard the poor man being called a bleeping bleep by a young man with a bowl cut and lisp, but what seemed to summarize the group sentiment was what I heard several times verbatim, "that was the biggest waste of my life." Add the "likes" and "whatevers" where you see fit.

Make no mistake, although this instance was a particularly raucous example, this kind of classroom disrespect is far from uncommon here at UMass; maybe it's a state school phenomenon, or maybe it seeps its way into the Ivy League itself, I don't know.

I do know that begrudging is a good way to describe the prevailing student attitude towards the world of academia. This is not without substantial irony though. Looking out at the students in practically any given class, the scattering of facial expressions; the agonized, the bored, the ticking time bomb, the text-messenger – all make it easy for us to forget that college attendance is volitional.

From the looks of it, it would appear the classes here serve as venues for minor punishments, like detention halls for high school graduates: Breakfast Club anyone?

Pressured by the sinking middle class, more and more young people are virtually forced to comply with the economic trend where high end, specialized service jobs are the unquestionable place to be.

Unfortunately, because Mr. Vernon is not here to scream and threaten, we've become the detention hall where the monitor prattles on to one listening, perhaps uncorrupted youth while the others are busy stirring up a melee.

In each of my classes, only in one (which has five other students) has the instructor been able to teach without having to ask for attention, to lower the noise level or to keep from noisily packing their bags when s/he starts to wrap up for the day.

Ask for attention? Shut the hell up? Stay in your seat until class is over? You hear these same exact words from teachers in elementary schools. You might expect that perhaps the college-bound would have been exorcised of these mischievous habits after the first year of high school or so, but that's obviously not the case.

Instead, due to the structure of a liberal arts school like ours, students find themselves in a breeding ground for this eschewing of the very commitment they made. College itself has changed, and its goals have taken a less ambitious slant in recent years.

Today, there are still a whole plethora of majors and concentrations which have very concrete, practical uses in today's job market, but there are just as many degrees which essentially signify your ability to read and write. While basic literacy should have been cemented long ago, it simply isn't reliably consistent in high school graduates today, which is why the college degree carries additional weight these days.

At one time, the rigors of the intensive curricula at the college level attracted and maintained only students who were committed to learning and growing in their interests; today is another story.

Pressured by the sinking middle class, more and more young people are virtually forced to comply with the economic trend where high end, specialized service jobs are the unquestionable place to be, shuttling off to college when 20 years ago that option wouldn't figure in at all.

What high school was, the state college has become, if not the whole of post-secondary school. Resulting from all of this is exactly what you see. Students booing teachers their parents are paying for, chronic truancy and utter disregard for a shoddy system. I can't blame them.

I wouldn't be pleased to attend another four years of high school, made out to be optional, especially if I hated the first four. Nor would I feel it particularly worthwhile to do all of this just to secure a bumper to bumper place in the rat race.

It's perfectly understandable, if you want to get all psychological on the issue. I suggest a mass exodus from colleges everywhere...leave the books to the nerds, please.

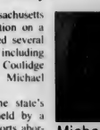
Point-Counter-Point

Where Should Your Vote Swing?

To the Left!



Michael Shulman

Greg Collins

The governorship of Massachusetts is a significant political position on a national scale. It has produced several prominent historical figures, including Sam Adams, President Calvin Coolidge and presidential candidate Michael Dukakis.

However, since 1991, the state's executive office has been held by a Republican. A state that supports abortion, gay marriage and environmental regulation has kept in power politicians who do not support the views of the majority of their constituency. This is why a change is needed, and that change should be to vote for Democratic Gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick on November 7th.

Despite never holding an elected position of office, Patrick has been appointed to several key positions including Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, the nation's top civil rights post. His experience in both the public and private sector has given him the range and experience as an executive to lead this state and create new hope and new beginnings for so many who have been left behind.

His campaign has been less about political clout and name recognition, and more focused on the needs of communities and how government can once again work for the people. His once hazy plans have now, at the end of the campaign, become strong policy ideas regarding the economy and other issues affecting the state.

Education is the gateway to the American dream, and Patrick has a comprehensive plan to improve public education in Massachusetts.

His experience working for the large companies "Texaco" and "Coca-Cola," coupled with his experience as a leader for the black community has given him a distinct view of the economy. He wants to foster growth and knows the importance of competition, but he also wants to focus on equality and fairness when it comes to taxes. His diverse background fills out Patrick's political agenda and makes him a candidate for all people and not just a single group.

Education is the gateway to the American dream, and Patrick has a comprehensive plan to improve public education in Massachusetts. One thing that is of interest to all of us as college students here at UMass is his commitment to fund the public universities better. This is great news since the cost of attending college is continually on the rise.

November 7th is a date that should mark change in Massachusetts. No longer should we be led by Republicans who are consumed by scandal, corruption and incompetence. America, and the great state of Massachusetts, is ready for change, and Patrick is the candidate who embraces these changes. Changes that will make everyone more equal, and give all citizens a fair chance at school and to find employment. He is focused and determined to work for the common good and achieve great things for everyone.

His opponent, current Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, is running on a 50-point plan for her bid for office. To me 50 points seems like quite a lot of ideas for voters to truly understand and grasp what her campaign is all about. Even President Wilson boiled all of his ideas down to 14 points.

Deval Patrick has led a clean, focused campaign that has allowed him to have almost a double digit lead in almost all major polls.

Political campaigns are unsympathetic, and many politicians cannot handle the intensity and constant scrutiny that comes along with running for a high profile public office. Healey continues to utilize Conservative talk radio and television ads to attack Patrick on many issues, including revealing details of his sister and her spousal issues.

Healey has no experience or record of achievement, and yet, Patrick remains committed to not run a negative campaign and continues to show civility to a woman running a campaign on attacks and lies.

The state of Massachusetts is at a crossroads, and the people of this state must make a choice between a vision for change and a staple of Republican corruption and mismanagement. Politics of fear, negative slogans and other tactics cannot replace a government of hope and promise, and that is what Patrick is offering to the people of Massachusetts.

The era of corruption and dirty politics is over, and it is time to elect a candidate who will represent the people accurately and without party influence. The state government has ignored the people for too long, and Patrick is the candidate for governor who has the solutions for a better government. For more information about Patrick, visit his Web site devalpatrick.com.

To the Right!

As the Nov. 7th elections are quickly approaching, voters face an important decision which will affect the state of affairs in Massachusetts for the next four years. Who should be the next governor of the Bay State, Republican candidate Kerry Healey, the current lieutenant governor, or Democratic hopeful Deval Patrick, a lawyer and businessman? Voters would do best to choose Healey, a proven leader devoted to economic expansion, crime reduction and educational progress.

A significant measure which, if adopted, would pave the way to enhanced economic growth, is to reduce the state income tax to 5 percent, an initiative supported by Healey. In 2000 citizens of Massachusetts voted to decrease the percentage in three increments, intending to arrive at the 5 percent rate three years later.

In a slap to the faces of Massachusetts citizens, the overwhelmingly Democratic state legislature claimed the state economy could not afford a reduction in taxes at that particular time. They voted to freeze the tax at 5.3 percent, thereby forcing taxpayers to cough up an additional $2 billion to Beacon Hill.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Democratic supporters of this legislation should probably retake Economy 101, Patrick has echoed the proponents' justifications for this freeze. In contrast, Healey is dedicated to valuing the preferences of her constituents rather than those of an isolated group of politicians. She maintains that a state income tax rollback factually a restoration of the voter approved rate) will be an integral factor to stimulate a sluggish Massachusetts economy.

Of course, multi-million dollar home-owning Patrick could afford such a freeze, but unfortunately, many other citizens are hurt by this intrusion of government control by not being afforded the liberty to make their own financial decisions using their hard-earned money.

In addition, crime prevention has surfaced to the top of the campaign issues this election season. The controversy over Healey's attacks on Patrick's advocacy on behalf of a convicted rapist has clouded the enduring issue of which candidate will best make this state safer.

This issue is especially pressing considering the rapid increase in homicides in Boston the last few years. It is of no small significance that the State Police Association and other prominent law enforcement entities have endorsed Healey, who has recently signed a law requiring sex offenders to be registered before being released from prison.

Earlier this year she had been a leader in promoting Melanie's Bill. This legislation calls for tougher penalties on repeated drunken driving offenders. Her uncompromising and principled stance on reducing crime and holding criminals accountable for their actions is in stark contrast to Patrick, who was labeled as being "soft on crime" by Massachusetts Attorney and Democrat Gen. Tom Reilly.

For instance, Patrick has backed measures restricting employers' access to the criminal history of potential workers and supports providing driver's licenses to illegal aliens.

Healey also has highlighted the importance of business ethics and fairness by proposing a plan to penalize companies in Massachusetts for hiring illegal aliens. Unfortunately such businesses are not punished as severely as they should be now, yet Healey's campaign has consistently emphasized the need to ensure that employment opportunities for workers will not be taken by illegal aliens.

Healy also has highlighted the importance of business ethics and fairness by proposing a plan to penalize companies in Massachusetts for hiring illegal aliens.

The long-range outlook on employment and educational opportunities for future workers has been stressed by Healey while being overlooked by Patrick. Healey has called to lift the restriction on the number of charter schools in the state. These publicly funded, but privately run, schools have proven to be some of the most successful public schools in the United States in improving test scores of schoolchildren, many of whom come from low socioeconomic backgrounds.

This campaign season, Patrick was the only Democratic candidate to oppose lifting the cap on charter schools. As someone who admirably rose out of poverty and attended prestigious Milton Academy, it is unfortunate he would support a measure limiting the educational advancement of children, 15,000 of whom are currently on charter school waiting lists. Do as I say, not as I do, Deval!

These are just some of the many campaign issues voters should consider before casting their ballots on Nov. 7th. Kerry Healey's Web site, http://www.healycommittee.com, offers more detailed explanations demonstrating why she has the most realistic and sensible plan to transform Massachusetts into an exemplary state in which to live. Too bad all Patrick offers is the old tax and spend, soft on crime nostrums.

It's the little things

Brad Leibowitz

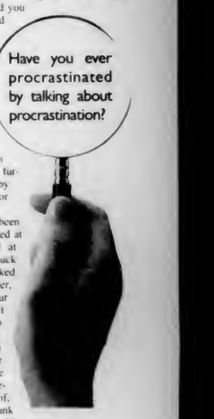
We all do certain things on a daily basis which we never talk about with anyone else. Maybe a nervous tick or the way you react to a graphic word in Biology class. We all have actions that are part of our daily routine, many we don't even consider, and even more we don't discuess with others.

So, for the sake of keeping "the little things in life," "the best things in life," here are some of the little things which you do and thought no one knew about.

The alarm goes off, it's 7 a.m., it's cold outside and you're groggy. First business of the day, a shower. You walk down the hall into the bathroom, step into the shower, disrobe and turn the water on. The water falls out of the head with freezing impact on your naked skin, waking you up instantaneously. Your first instinct in this situation is the little shower jump which lands your now naked body at the edge of the water's freezing reach.

Upon this happening, there's only one thing you can do to fix the unfolding situation: the "butt bend reach." From the outskirts of the ice cold water you proceed to bend over from the hips (knees locked), with one arm holding on to the door and the other reaching towards the shower handle to change the temperature. And to make it more complicated, at the same time you're performing a death defying maneuver by twisting you're torso around the arctic waters.

Once you finish your shower and get dressed, you head off to class or work. Upon your path, you're walking along just fine and what happens? You trip just enough to make you start a little jog, just so no one around you knows you tripped (we all think we are the center of the universe. I know this). Now that the cool is out of your step and you have turned the corner on the block by jogging, you begin to walk again only to be stopped a little further down the line by someone looking for the time.



Have you ever been asked the time, looked at your watch, looked at the asker, looked back at your watch, looked back at the asker, looked back at your watch and still didn't know the time? So now, to make yourself not look like an idiot, you tap on your watch with you're knuckle saying something to the effect of, "Stupid piece of junk seems to have stopped."

Following this, because you still don't know the time and you feel like an idiot, you ask someone else for the time. Now that you have the time, you take care of your daily business, and then return home.

Upon arrival you eat dinner, maybe take another shower (hopefully this time without the butt bending reach) and watch "Jeopardy" with some roommates. However, as the night goes on, the voice in the back of your head is telling you "there is work to be done" starts to sound worse and worse. Until you find yourself starring at a video on "YouTube" of monkeys doing back flips while peeing on the zookeeper: that's right, it's procrastination time.

Maybe it's just me, but have you ever procrastinated by talking about procrastination? Normally you say things like, "if it weren't for the last minute, I wouldn't get anything done," or "I could do it today, but tomorrow seems better," or my personal favorite, "procrastination is like masturbation, in the end you're only screwing yourself."

As you stare at your computer watching silly videos and playing "Pac-Man" until you can't stand to look at the little blue men anymore, the night dwindles away. As the clock rounds 2 a.m. you decide that after your long night of work or lack there of, it's finally time to go to bed, however, there is still time left for one more silly thing we all do.

Now, I have roughly 21 years under my belt, yet, to this day (or more appropriately this night), I am still scared of the little man who lives under my bed. Every night, when I get into bed, I make sure to never dangle my feet off of it in fear that if I do, the little man will do one of two things. Either he will bite my feet off leaving bloody nubs for the morning, or he will grab my ankles and drag me into his under the bed lair (I am sure I will do this until the day I die).

So, the next time you secretly smell your armpit to check your deodorant levels before a date or you take a cold shower in the morning, whether you know it or not, there is someone, somewhere, doing the exact same thing; take comfort in that.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OIT REPUTATION NEEDS AN UPDATE

Monica Gleberman's editorial opinion on "Things I hate about UMass," which ran October 20th, was a scathing article, but it was also largely misleading. While I cannot speak for the other services she attacked, I can speak for OIT since I am a student consultant for the Helpdesk.

While Monica and Angela Osis may have had bad experiences with OIT, this is an extremely atypical case. Instead of relying on hearsay, I'd like to quote a few statistics I was able to acquire from OIT's database administrator.

Since 2002, OIT has opened an everage of approximately 30,000 help requests per year, with 24,227 for this year to the 23rd of October. The sheer volume of tickets that goes through Help Services every week is incredible, not only because of the volume, but because of the quality of service we try to maintain for each one.

By the time a person reaches the point where they ere on the phone with us, they have usually tried several things, become frustrated with their machine, called in, waited on the line for someone to answer, and then – and only then – reached one of our techs. They already aren't happy.

But since late 2005, we have been sending feedback surveys after the close of each ticket. We have received almost 20 percent participation, or almost 5000 survey responses. These surveys are conducted with six questions, all rated from a scale of one to five, with one being "extremely satisfied," and five being "extremely dissatisfied." None of the average responses for these questions are worse than 1.45, with the response for the question "How satisfied are you with the professionalism of the OIT Help staff?" averaging a tremendous 1.24.

You should see from these statistics that, while we often hear the select few problem cases in OIT, the vast majority of our clients are very happy because we are working for them.

Unfortunately, the wheel that needs oil squeaks the loudest, but the simple fact is that OIT's Help Services really deserves a round of applause for all the hard work that they have done and continue to do.

NO MORE FREE RIDES

I would like to voice a complaint about the arrogance of bike riders on this campus.

Last Wednesday I was walking to class, after just having crossed the street I was slammed into by a person riding his bike. This is the first time I have actually been hit by a bike, however it is not the first time I have almost been taken out. I am constantly finding myself having to get out of the way of an oncoming bicycle.

Luckily no one was greatly injured in this accident, but that might not have been the case. I believe that the bike riders on this campus need to take heed and be more careful when riding on campus. The operators go speeding by you, at a faster rate than the cars can even move on North Pleasant Street, without a care as to whether or not there are pedestrians around.

The bike riders need to have some rules about what they can and can not do because clearly they can not be allowed to govern themselves. If the bike riders were responsible and used caution when riding this would not be such a great problem and innocent pedestrians wouldn't have to suffer.

Bobby Previte appearing in Northampton on Saturday

BY BRADLEY FARBERMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Following a west coast tour that wrapped up in May at New York City's Tonic, Bobby Previte's Coalition of the Willing evens the score by touring the east coast this month, with a stop at Northampton's Pearl Street Nightclub this Saturday night at 8:30 p.m.

Here's the deal: the cool cats at Ropeadope Records released Previte's latest, "The Coalition of the Willing," in May. The record comprised eight fierce, instrumental rock anthems ready-made to blow your mind and get your fists pumping.

And, of course, the band on record was something to talk about. Charlie Hunter, on six-string guitar (a novelty for the eight-string guitarist), is a masterful player, well-versed in any number of genres. Hailing from Berkeley, CA, Hunter came up in a scene that exposed him to sounds from all over the spectrum (he recalls digging on the Dead Kennedys, P-Funk and Art Blakey all at the same time) and allowed him to take lessons from none other than guitar legend Joe Satriani.

In the early '90s, Hunter hooked-up with Michael Franti's Disposable Heroes of Hiphoprisy and toured with U2 before he left to concentrate on jazz music. The Charlie Hunter Trio emerged soon afterwards, featuring Dave Ellis on tenor saxophone and original Primus drummer Jay Lane on drums. The trio released their self-titled debut on Les Claypool's Prawn Song Records in 1994 to the acclaim of some big wigs, namely Blue Note. That label would go on to release no less than eight Charlie Hunter records between 1995 and 2005.

Also appearing on the record, and at Pearl Street on Saturday, is Skerik. Like Madonna or Prince, the eccentric saxophonist has condensed his identity into one name, and spread his music far and wide. Primarily a tenor saxophonist (though no less competent on baritone), Skerik is a member of Claypool's Fearless Flying Frog Brigade, Tuatara (also featuring Peter Buck of R.E.M.), Garage A Trois (with Hunter) a frequent collaborator with New Orleans funk kings Galactic, and has toured with Roger Waters of Pink Floyd. Additionally, he leads Seattle freak-noisers Critters Buggin and Skerik's Syn-o-pated Taint Septet, a hip-hopped, jazzed-out experience not to be missed (their new record, "Husky," is out now on Hyena Records).

Duo at Pearl Street, too, is Robert Walter. Touring with the Coalition in lieu of alternate Coalitionists Jamie Saft or Marco Benevento, the organ ace should fit right in with the talent at hand. From San Diego, Walter came up as the keyboardist for seminal neo-funk group Greyboy Allstars, which later splintered into heavy offshoots like Karl Denson's Tiny Universe, and Robert Walter's 20th Congress. Walter's latest album, Super Heavy Organ, was recorded in New Orleans and includes hometown heroes Johnny Vidacovich on drums and James Singleton on bass.

Finally, there's a thing or two you should know about Bobby Previte. After moving to New York City in 1979, the drummer fell in with the so-called "downtown" scene, collaborating with the likes of John Zorn, Wayne Horvitz and current Hampshire College music professor Marty Ehrlich. Since then, Previte has toured the world many times over, with many different groups and musicians, playing jazz, rock, or whatever the situation called for. One might even remember an especially burning performance from 2004 when Previte's "Pump" band rocked at Bezanson Recital Hall.

And, certainly, Saturday night's performance should recall that rockin' feeling. Tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.

Bobby Previte's group Coalition of the Willing will appear Saturday night at the Pearl Street Nightclub.

UMass Professor Honored

Fredrick T. Cohen, UMass professor from the Department of Music and Dance, will be honored on Saturday, November 4 in Springfield's Symphony Hall for his 30 years of performances with the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Cohen was hired by the University in 1986. November 4 also marks Professor Cohen's last performance with the Orchestra, as he is retiring to spend more time with family and other musical ventures.

Leggings are a girl's best friend

BY KELLY MCGUIRE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

In women's fashion, leggings have become the new "it" bottoms for fall and winter season. No matter where you look on campus, girls are wearing these versatile getups. Since they can be combined with almost anything, it is common to see people in anything from leggings and sweatshirts to leggings and an elegant top. Some girls have experimented with a long top and leggings combo, or even paired them with a cute cropped jacket. Reminiscent of the 1980's, these sexy jeans-alternatives re-exploded onto the scene early this fall as the must-have item for the season.

They are perfect for virtually every occasion. Typically worn to class in a more casual way with the everlasting popular UGG boot, they are now seen as an acceptable form of pants, rather than just something to wear while on your visits to the gym. However classy and cute the leggings look with the UGG boot look, there are various other ways to dress up or down the legging trend we see all over.

Try wearing the leggings with a pair of ballet flats. This is the more modern way to wear the slacking-like pant, because it is not only a switch up from the heavier winter look with the boot, but it makes your legs look slimmer and longer. This look is perfect for day time when you're shopping with your girlfriends, or going to class, and can even be worn on a very casual evening out.

Got a great night planned but have no idea what to wear? Well, don't stress. Take a pair of your best black leggings, throw on a cute shirt – even a tight wrap sweater – and put on some cute black pumps or funky colored wedges and you have created one of the most sought after night looks in recent trends.

What colors are best? The classic is obviously black, because it's such a versatile color to wear (with any shade of UGGs, ballet flats and even with pumps or wedges in a color of your choosing). However, if you want to funk up your look a bit, which is always great to do, colored leggings can definitely spruce up a drill outfit with just one quick slip on. A deep grey or purple works well with almost every color, especially if you're wearing a solid color on top. This changes the look from basic to trendy.

A little self-conscious or unsure of wearing just the leggings as pants? No sweat – after all, they are skin tight and do show every curve. You can pop them under a cute print or solid skirt or dress to downplay them as the new age spandex.

Now, the biggest question is where to buy this stuff that's good quality, but that won't leave a big hole in your pocket making you ask yourself, "I spent how much on leggings?" Around this area, Target is surprisingly well endowed in the leggings department. Leggings at Target cost anywhere from $5.99 to $15.99, but the cheap prices parallel the almost similar cheap material. If you want them for a trial run, go to Target, but if you're looking to invest, the best places are Express and Forever 21, which can both be found in the Holyoke Mall. The uber-trendy Urban Outfitters, which is in Boston, Manhattan and online at www.urbanoutfitters.com will certainly have them too. These stores can be a tad more expensive than Target, but the merchandise will last twice as long and will be well worth the investment.

While on the subject of where to grab this cute look, ballet shoes can be hard to find around these parts. Target just came out with a new adorable line of ballets, which include the generic black pair, along with some red ones and extra sexy leopard print. If you don't enjoy the Target brands, go online to Urban Outfitters again and fill your cart with some of their great pairs of flats (most are surprisingly cheap at just twenty bucks a pair).

Well, that's it for this week, ladies. Enjoy the look, enjoy the advice and rock the leggings – have faith in your style.

Whether winter or spring, leggings have become the new "in" fashion trend across university campuses.

Energy drinks: juicy or risky sips?

BY LAURA BALDI AND JOYCE SMITH
STAFF WRITERS

Up all night studying? Throw back an energy drink and get through that early-morning geometry class.

Need a little pick-me-up in the middle of boring work or at the end of a long day? Drink one and you'll instantly have more fun. Throw back a couple, and it's fun times two.

This is how some companies are selling energy drinks, those cans of sugary-sweet, high-caffeine drinks with names like Red Bull, Rockstar and even Whoop Ass. Costing more than $2 a pop, energy drinks are raking in $3.2 billion a year for an industry that grew by 80 percent last year.

Lured by promises of high energy, possible weight loss and greater sports endurance, young people are consuming these drinks at a growing rate. According to an Associated Press report, 31 percent of U.S. teenagers say they drink them, and some say they down several in a row to get a buzz.

While many say they're a harmless jolt of energy, doctors and nutritionists fear the medical side effects of these drinks, which aren't regulated by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

Others worry that drink makers will resort to anything – including pumping up caffeine levels – to lure the young.

Take one of the newest brands. It caused quite a shakeup recently, and not for its level of caffeine, believed to be among the highest.

The drink: Cocaine.

Because of the name alone, convenience-store operator 7-Eleven Inc. is asking a handful of San Jose, Calif., franchise stores to stop carrying the high-caffeine drink. And the company is considering making it a nationwide request.

"Our merchandising team believes the product's name promotes an image which we didn't want to be associated with," said Margaret Chabris, a spokeswoman for 7-Eleven. "What is it? A legal alternative to an illegal substance?"

Cocaine – the drink – is not sold in the Kansas City, Mo. area but could be [illegible] the end of the year. It comes in [illegible] and white cans, similar [illegible] Cola.

But [illegible] name is spelled out in a [illegible] white font intended to resemble [illegible] white cocaine powder.

"[The name] is a slap in the face to the prevention efforts [illegible]," said Janine Gracy of the Regional Prevention Center. "Yeah, it's not the drug itself, but what about those who see, I drink this, what's the difference maybe I'll try that."

And what about the next drink to come along? How far will makers go to stand out in a market where more than 500 new energy drinks were launched worldwide this year?

"At what point do you say caffeine is not a drug that can have adverse side effects in a healthy person?" said Christine McPherson, a district nurse with De Soto public schools. "You're talking 280 milligrams."

Controversy was strategic to setting the product apart from the horde of new drinks introduced this year, said Jamey Kirby, senior partner at Redux Beverages, with offices in Las Vegas and Murrieta, Calif., and founder of Cocaine.

But even Kirby was "flabbergasted" by the clamor Cocaine created.

"The politicians are saying we are glorifying drug use, that we're desensitizing the youth to the dangers of drugs; they're calling for stores to boycott it," Kirby said. "Where did the coke in Coca-Cola come from? Why aren't they banning Coca-Cola? Our name is right there on the edge but I don't think it falls over the edge."

It's marketed as the "legal alterna-

Tricked out treats on Halloween

BY KAREN HERZOG
MIDDLESEX COUNTY CORRESPONDENT

When candy corn first appeared in the 1890s, farmers loved it because of its agrarian look.

The rest of America embraced it, too, because the tri-color design – yellow on the bottom, orange in the middle and white at the tip – was revolutionary, according to the National Confectioners Association.

Fast-forward more than a century. More than 35 million pounds of candy corn is produced each year, which the association says equates to nearly 9 billion pieces, enough to circle the moon nearly four times if laid end-to-end.

The candy still has the familiar shape

See CANDY on page 7

Candy corn, like the ones seen above, has been around since the 1880s. 35 million pounds are produced each year.

Candy Corn refuses to throw in the towel and coloring, with a creamy vanilla flavor (and chocolate, in the case of what's known as Indian corn). And it's still a Halloween favorite.

But a new generation of candy corn entered the market this year. It's fruity with stripes of other colors, designed to appeal to adults who want something new.

Gourmet Candy Corn was developed by Galerie, a company in Hebron, Ky., about 10 miles from Cincinnati, that specializes in "innovative confectionary gifts."

So far, it comes in three flavors, but the company president said more are on the way for next year.

The recipe is similar to the original, only the new gourmet corn does not contain honey.

The green apple flavor is lime green on the bottom, yellow in the middle and orange at the tip; cherry is red, pink and yellow, respectively; and tangerine is orange, yellow and purple, respectively.

"Some of our customers were challenging us that nothing special was going on with candy corn," Galerie president Richard Ross said. "Two years ago, we set out to bring new life to candy corn. We found most people who eat candy corn are adults."

Adults eat less candy, but they seek better quality "or more intrigue," Ross said.

Other candy makers have experimented with varying the colors in candy corn, but the recipe remained the same, Ross said. Candy makers now make Reindeer Corn for Christmas (green, red and white), Cupid Corn for Valentine's Day (pink, red and white) and Bunny Corn for Easter (pastels).

For production of their gourmet candy corn, Galerie contracts with another company that has a candy corn machine. Yes, it takes a special machine.

In 1900, it took many men working eight months of the year to produce candy corn, according to the confectioners association.

Sugar, corn syrup and other ingredients were cooked into a slurry in large kettles. Fondant and marshmallow were added for a smooth texture and bite. The hot candy then was poured into buckets called runners.

Men dubbed stringers walked backward, pouring the candy into cornstarch-coated tray's imprinted with the kernel shape. It took three passes to make the white, yellow and orange colors.

The candy was invented by George Renninger, an employee of the Wunderlee Candy Co. in Philadelphia. Wunderlee was the first to produce it.

The Goelitz Candy Co. (now Jelly Belly Candy Co.) started producing candy corn in 1900 and still does today, as do a few other companies, such as Brach's.

Manufacturers use a method called the cornstarch molding process, much like the original method, only mechanized.

A tray containing depressions is coated with cornstarch. Candy corn is made from the bottom to the top and in three color passes.

What goes into candy corn?

The ingredients in Brach's candy corn, one of the major brands on the market, are sugar, corn syrup, salt, honey, soy protein, gelatin, confectioner's glaze, dextrose, artificial flavor, titanium dioxide color, artificial colors (yellow 6, yellow 5, red 3, blue 1.)

Making 'cents' of retirement

BY ADAM KELLEHER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

As a college student it might seem premature to start thinking about retirement as most of us still have at least a year plus before graduating. But with government funds for our retired seniors quickly going bankrupt, we need to seek alternative ways to finance our futures. Once we enter our careers we are going to be faced with different retirement options that won't seem to make any sense. I am here to help you make sense of what your options are and give you tips that will help you set money aside for a comfortable retirement.

First off, don't be fooled by seemingly small interest rates. The current 10-yr. government Treasury note is 4.65 percent. At this rate if you invest $100 you will have only $104.65 at the end of the first year. Does that seem worth it? Probably not. Even if you hold this note for the full 10 years you would have $157.54. But when we look at the return, (157.54-100)/100 that is a 57.5 percent return, which is very good. Now let's say we had the opportunity to deduct $100 a week, each and every week for the full 10 years, from our paycheck to invest in this note. At this rate for the full 10 years we would have $64,346 (this is a future value of annuity problem for those who know the time value of money). My point is to make you aware of the power of compounding interest. Deducting a small amount each week from your paycheck into an account that yields even the risk-free rate is the best way to save for retirement, not cramming money into a savings account.

However, this hypothetical scenario is investing at the risk-free rate, meaning that there is no risk in losing your money since it is backed by the U.S. government. Instead let's assume you invested in the stock market for the long run where the risk of losing your money is higher, but also the potential return is unlimited. On average, holding a diversified portfolio over the long-run will return about 10 percent a year. If you don't know what a diversified portfolio means, don't worry for now. In a realistic scenario you deduct $50 a week from your paycheck into the market that will give you a 10 percent return on average. This means $2600 per year, right? If you work full time for 40 years and do this each and every week you would retire with $1,150,740. Now that is simply amazing.

My point is to get you to realize that investing in the market is becoming a necessity to secure your financial future.

Even for those of you who are freshman your first real job might seem eons away. But, trust me, before you know it you're actually going to be faced with some grown up, adult decisions. Scary, isn't it? Your first job will hopefully give you the options of a 401k plan. Basically what this does for you is deduct a certain percentage of your pay check and invest it for you, typically into mutual funds. The two main benefits of the 401k is this portion of your income is tax-deferred until you withdraw from it at retirement. The other benefit is employers will usually match your contribution dollar for dollar up to a certain point. You put in $100 and there's actually $200 going into that account. Taking advantage of this plan right away is key for retirement savings. Don't put it off.

You also have the option of opening an IRA account. This differs from a 401K in the fact that it does not have anything to do with your job. It is set up through the government and you get to make all the investment decisions. I suggest using the 401K plan instead, unless you have the time and energy to make smart investments.

So, if you take anything away from this article, take away two things. Start saving for retirement as early as possible. Every year that goes by before you start saving adds up and winds up being a lot of cash out of your pocket in the end. Take advantage of investing in the market. Whether you do it yourself or through mutual funds, it is the best way to accrue retirement wealth.

Even though most of us have a year plus before graduating, it's never too early to start thinking about saving money.

New energy drinks are cause for concern

tive" and described by creators as tasting like a carbonated atomic fireball. Each can has 280 milligrams of caffeine, twice the amount in a regular cup of coffee.

Ana Alzarez of the Flamingo Mini Mart in Naples, Fla., has been carrying Cocaine for about a month.

"It's selling very well here in Naples. We are selling more than Red Bull," said Alzarez, who doesn't like the taste of energy drinks. "We're going to keep selling it. No one has complained yet."

But other retailers are choosing their public image over profit.

"I was a no-brainer," said Mike Thornbrugh, spokesman for Quik Trip. We don't see how in the world you can be a responsible retailer and sell a commodity that glamorizes illegal drugs."

Most healthcare professionals recommend a daily dose of no more than 250 to 300 milligrams of caffeine. Beyond that, the side effects can set in: the jitteriness, possible dehydration, the jump in heart rate, increased blood pressure.

Energy drinks, with caffeine levels from 75 milligrams and up, likely aren't harmful if used sparingly. But it's the repeated use, the two or three cans at a time, that can wear on a body.

After the initial jolt, people crash.

"And once they fall, they fall pretty hard," said pediatrician Sarah Hampl, who works at Children's Mercy Hospital in the department of general pediatrics. "Their blood sugar drops, the caffeine wears off and they feel really bad."

Amy McClure, health teacher at Johnson County's Mill Valley High School, teaches a section on energy drinks. And when the energy drink SoBe went into school vending machines last year, she got it removed.

"I tell the kids, 'You only get one heart, you don't want to overwork your heart any more than you have to,'" McClure said.

Cardiologist Brian Wetford, from the University of Kansas Hospital, said people react to high levels of caffeine differently. And without knowing what's in each of the drinks, there's a risk in consuming any.

"I wouldn't want my kids having any of these," Wetford said.

For now, many young people know they want to keep consuming these drinks.

Jessica Montes, 23, who was at Moody's Coffeehouse in Kansas City, drinks Rockstar for its "gummy bear" taste.

And Jignesh Patel, a University of Missouri-Kansas City sophomore, prefers Red Bull – "it mixes with vodka perfectly."

But he's all for trying the Cocaine drink if it comes here.

"All students will probably try it just for fun," said Patel.

Final record doesn't tell all

The loss of junior defender Tina Rodriguez due to injury may well have cost this team a playoff berth. UMass coach Jim Rudy did a terrific job in shifting his players to help fill the void, but her presence was missed.

One positive that came out of the injury was the increased playing time of the freshman class. As time went on in the season, Rudy couldn't help but be enamored with the new dimension that they brought to his team.

Looking at the season's statistics, freshman forward Sydney Stoll's one goal doesn't stand out much at all. If you were lucky enough to watch her play though, you would know exactly who she is. Stoll was all over the place when she was on the field.

In 17 games this year, the Minutewomen only managed to score 21 goals. Their defense played solid all year long, and redshirt junior goalie Kristin Walker was as good as advertised. The Achilles heel for the team was the lack of offense, and lack of finishing around the net.

Stoll started all seven games that Rodriguez missed and started to develop a real knack for the ball and connection with leading scorer, junior Britt Canfield. Rudy has to be excited about having Stoll and Canfield on the field together next year.

Rudy's team played the right way all season long. The passing and communication between teammates was evident. They played with a good level of emotion and showed a lot of heart.

Oftentimes, players who don't light up the stat sheets get overlooked. Junior defender Christina Nunes is one of those players. She deserves a lot of credit for the way she sacrificed her body for the good of the team on a regular basis. In many ways she embodied the spirit of the team and she was instrumental in so many of its wins.

The team defense was superb. The Maroon and White only allowed 16 goals for the entire season – less than one per game. Walker was the her new brace, she moved around acrobatically making big saves in crucial situations.

While Walker is considered the backbone of the team by her fellow players, senior co-captains Nadia Villarroel and Stephanie Barrett can't be overlooked in that department. Although they led in different ways, they did a terrific job to help groom the younger players on the roster. Villarroel lead by example and helped counsel her teammates off the field. Barrett took command during the game to help direct the players on the field.

The Maroon and White can hang their hats on a hard fought season, in which it bested three powerhouse teams in Boston University, Yale, and Connecticut. After beating the Bulldogs and Huskies in a span of four days, UMass was getting some serious consideration for a national ranking.

The Minutewomen struggled a bit within the Atlantic 10, and that led to their demise of missing the tournament. Rodriguez' injury and difficult conference games kept them out of the playoffs, but they were all winners this year.

THE FUTURE

Losing Villarroel, Barrett and Elizabeth Weinsten to graduation won't be easy to overcome. On the flip side, this team will not be an opponent any other team wants to face.

Walker will be back for her final season. Although it will be tough to top her 2006 campaign, she will be healthier and more experienced. Canfield and her seven goals will return as well. Canfield is a flash of lightning running down the field and her improved chemistry with Stoll will open up the offense.

Sophomore forward Vanessa Parry, along with freshman forwards Katie Ruggles and Christina Adams will provide the Minutewomen with even more speed and energy on the offensive end. Key role players like Rodriguez, Nunes, Kaelyn Caldwell, Melissa Toulouse, and Jenny Roehrig will also be back to stabilize the defense and midfield positions.

This year was the building block of a team with a real future. The final step is to bring back Jim Rudy for his 20th season.

five of its next six games, including dropping its first two A-10 games to Temple.

So at this point, the last thing the Minutewomen needed was a five-player suspension right before the home opener vs. the No. 10 Connecticut Huskies, right?

Well, that's exactly what happened. Five players, including two seniors and their leading scorer were suspended right before the game.

You want more proof this team is the ultimate enigma?

Take two weekend games on the road this year against West Chester and La Salle. Fighting for their playoff lives, they go on the road and come from behind to win in both games, including erasing a three-goal deficit to LaSalle. Not bad, huh?

So in typical UMass fashion, the team comes out in the next game and loses 4-1 to a one-win New Hampshire team. Go figure.

After the Minutewomen scored a hard-fought victory over LaSalle for their first win of the season, they squared off with the four-time defending A-10 champion Richmond Spiders.

Now there wasn't really anything out of the ordinary in this game; UMass lost 5-2 and was out shot 30-8. It lost to a better team, that's all, no big deal, better luck next time.

But not according to senior forward Gina Sanders, who was nothing but honest when she gave us reporters undoubtedly the quote of the season.

"They're not that good," Sanders said.

That statement kind of contradicts everything about Richmond. Makes you kind of scratch your head. Hey, you came to expect it from the '06 Minutewomen.

Hunt for conference title begins

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

After two months of highly competitive soccer, the field for the Atlantic 10 Tournament is finally set. Only the first six finishers in A-10 play made the cut, ending the seasons of the other eight teams.

The matches will be held on the campus of Saint Louis at Robert R. Herman Stadium from November 2nd-5th.

To open up the weekend, third-seeded Rhode Island (11-3-4), 7-2-0 A-10) plays sixth-seeded Dayton (8-6-3, 6-3-0) in a quarterfinal match. La Salle (9-9-1, 6-2-1) and Fordham (12-6-0, 6-3-0) will fight for the other spot in the semifinals immediately following the first game.

The top two seeds, Charlotte (13-4-2, 8-1-0) and Saint Louis (12-3-2, 7-2-0), receive buys into the semis. The 49ers will face the lowest remaining seed of the two quarterfinal winners, while Saint Louis will play the other first-round winner.

Both semifinal matches will take place on Friday, Nov. 3rd, with the final scheduled for Sunday.

REGULAR SEASON CHAMPS

Although Charlotte finished first in the A-10 regular season standings by three points, the 49ers did not seal the title until last weekend.

The team won two, one-goal home games against A-10 rivals Xavier (7-10-2, 2-5-2) and Dayton. Xavier scored two quick goals in the first eight minutes of the first half to put the Musketeers up 2-0. Charlotte chipped away at the lead and it finally tallied its third goal in the middle of the second half to clinch the win.

Two days later, the 49ers defeated Dayton by the same score, but they needed two overtimes to do it. Dayton scored a goal in each half, despite being one player down for the majority of the match. Junior forward Nikki Labuda ended the stalemate with a successful header in the 107th minute.

OVER HYPED?

There's still an opportunity for Saint Louis to live up to its preseason expectations. The A-10 coaches selected the school to win the 2006 Atlantic 10 Women's Soccer Championship.

But the Billikens already blew their opportunity to meet last season's success. The team established an undefeated conference record in last year's regular season and parlayed that into A-10 regular and tournament championships. The Billikens also earned a birth in the NCAA tournament, but they lost to then No. 5 Santa Clara in the second round.

This year looked extremely bright for Saint Louis at the beginning of the season. It returned the 2005 A-10 Defensive Player of the Year, Courtney Hulcer, and its 2005 scoring leader, Maureen Hughes. Coach Tim Champion also added several skilled freshmen to a roster short in neither talent nor experience. But Saint Louis stumbled twice in league play, allowing Charlotte to take the Atlantic 10 regular season title.

NATIONAL RANKINGS

The Big 12 Conference has three teams ranked in the Top 10 for the first time in league history, according to rankings produced by Soccer Buzz Magazine. Clustered together at Nos. 7,8 and 9, Texas A&M (13-4-1), Oklahoma State (15-2-2), and Texas (15-3-1) make the Big 12 one of the strongest and deepest conferences in America.

Boston University (13-4-3) and Connecticut (10-7-3) both fell just short of making the National Top 30, leaving Boston College (11-5-2) and Dartmouth (11-4-1) as the only schools representing the Northeast.

A-10 regular season champion Charlotte is ranked No. 10 out the 52 Division I soccer programs located in the Southeast. The 49ers have a chance to improve that ranking and perhaps crack the National Top 30 with a successful showing in the A-10 tournament.

Minutewomen visit Dartmouth

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts tennis team plays one of the longest seasons of any UMass sport. But after two months of competitive tennis, the Minutewomen will have to wait until next semester to play meaningful matches again.

This past weekend, the team participated in the Big Green Invitational on the campus of Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H. Although no players advanced beyond the quarterfinals, UMass coach Judy Dixon acknowledged that the tournament provided an opportunity for several players to gain valuable match experience.

"[The Big Green Invitational] was for players who did not get to participate in the ITA Regionals," Dixon said. "I decided to send Michelle [Spiess] and Masha [Pozar] – Michelle because she did not have a good ITA result, and I thought this would be a good opportunity for her to get over it. But it turned out she just didn't feel well after playing a doubles match [with Pozar], so I pulled her out [of singles play]."

Junior captain Masha Pozar, seeded in Group A, received a bye into the second round. Pozar took advantage of the bye, defeating freshman Carley Markovitz of Dartmouth, 6-4, 6-0.

However, the Big Green took revenge on Pozar in the next round, as another Dartmouth freshman, Jesse Alder, beat the UMass co-captain, 6-4, 6-2.

Dixon also entered two freshmen, Ellen de Jong and Maude Lecluyse, into the tournament in addition to her two best players.

Jong played her way into the quarter finals, winning two matches. She beat freshman Amanda Barletta of the University of Rhode Island, 6-3, 6-3.

The freshman then upset senior Grace Kammerer of Southern Mississippi in Round 2, 6-3, 7-5 (5).

Dartmouth played spoiler again for UMass in the quarterfinals on Sunday. This time, freshman Elizabeth Warnack vanquished Jong in straight sets, 6-4, 6-3.

In other Group B play, Lecluyse outplayed freshman Steff Catanzano of URI in the opening round, 6-4, 6-3. But Lecluyse only managed to win one game in the next match, falling to freshman Rebecca Row of Boston University, 6-1, 6-0.

Dixon was satisfied with the performances of her two freshmen at the tournament.

"Maude had a good win against a solid URI player and Ellen did very well in winning two rounds," Dixon said.

On the final day of the tournament, Spiess felt well enough to enter doubles competition with Pozar. Even though the two had a first-round buy, they could not make it past the second round. The duo was ousted by a team from BU.

On Oct. 15, the Minutewomen competed in the Cornell Blind Duals, facing competition from Binghamton and Cornell.

The Minutewomen defeated Binghamton, 5-4, including taking three out of the four doubles matches. Spiess led UMass in singles action, winning her match, 6-3, 6-1. Jong also played well at No. 3 singles, with a 6-3, 6-4, victory.

Even though Spiess continued her outstanding play, the team fell to Cornell, 8-1. The senior won her No.1 singles match in straight sets and teamed up with Pozar to win first doubles.

Team standouts Michelle Spiess and Masha Pozar competed in the ITA Regionals on Oct. 20-24. The captains were the only members of the team that received an invitation to play in the prestigious tournament on the campus of Dartmouth College.

Competing against many of the best tennis players in the Northeast, the two both lost in the early rounds. Pozar won two qualifying matches, each by the score of 6-0, 6-0. She won another match on Saturday, before being eliminated the next day.

Meanwhile, Spiess received a buy into the second round, but lost her first match in straight sets to sophomore Alina Sullivan of Boston College.

The two also entered doubles competition and won two matches on the first day of competition. However, Spiess and Pozar were eliminated by a Harvard duo in the next round.

While the co-captains competed in the ITA tournament, the rest of the team participated in the Brown Invitational. Although the Minutewomen fared well in doubles actions, the team clearly missed the play of Spiess and Pozar at Nos. 1 and 2 singles.

UMass won all three doubles matches against Army, Rhode Island and Brown, but only managed one singles victory out of nine matches.

game-winning-goal for the Musketeers. Xavier out shot the Spiders, 23-13, and had more shots on goal, 9-2. If the Musketeers win they will play St. Louis and if the Spiders win they face Rhode Island.

The late game on Thursday night features No. 4 Duquesne versus No. 5 Charlotte. This is the first time this year that these two teams will meet.

Charlotte has struggled going into the tournament with a 1-2-2 record in its last five games. Charlotte does have the luxury of playing at home where it is 6-2-4. Going into the tournament, Duquesne is 3-2-0 in its last five games.

In two games over the weekend, Duquesne defeated UMass 1-0, but collapsed against Rhode Island, 4-0. Charlotte dropped a 4-2 decision to a below-.500 Dayton team and tied Xavier 1-1 in double overtime. Depending on the winner of the first game, both teams could play St. Louis or Rhode Island.

PLAYERS OF THE WEEK

St. Bonaventure senior forward Kevin Omokhua is the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week along with Saint Louis senior forward Casey Spiess.

Omokhua finished out his career with a penalty-kick goal against Saint Joseph's in a 4-1 win. In his last game he scored all three goals for the Bonnies for a 3-2 win over Temple. He closed out his senior season leading the team in points (16), goals (6) and assists (4).

Spiess helped lead his team to the Atlantic 10 regular season title. Spiess scored one goal and added an assist in a 3-1 victory over UMass. Against Rhode Island, he assisted on sophomore midfielder Dado Hamzagic's goal as the Billikens made a statement in a 3-1 victory to clinch the A-10 regular-season title.

ROOKIE OF THE WEEK

Dayton redshirt sophomore forward Florian DeCamps earned the A-10 Rookie of the Week. The 6-foot-4 DeCamps headed in a goal for a 4-2 win over Charlotte and added an assist against Richmond in a 2-2 tie. He made the move from defender to forward and started the last six games at forward. With the change, the Flyers ended the season on a four-game unbeaten streak.

UNH vs. UMass: The matchups

David Ball enters Saturday's game against the Minutemen with 54 touchdown receptions. Ball passed Jerry Rice's 50-touchdown mark in a 27-17 UNH victory over the Richmond Spiders on Oct. 7.

(Clockwise) Sean Smalls, Tracy Belton, Brandon Smith and James Ihedigbo will try to contain the best Division I-AA receiver in the nation on Saturday when Wildcat David Ball lines up on offense.

David Ball meets the Minutemen's hard-hitting secondary

Over the past two years, David Ball has emerged as the best wide receiver in Division I-AA. The New Hampshire senior hasn't exactly done it quietly either. His feats and accomplishments have been featured in such publications as the Boston Globe and Sports Illustrated.

Not much more can be said of a player who surpassed Jerry Rice's all-time career touchdown mark of 50. That's something Ball holds over most of the receivers in the NFL today, he can be mentioned in the same breath as Rice – widely considered one of the best to ever play the game.

He passed Rice in the Wildcats' 27-17 victory over Richmond on Oct. 7. The record-breaker came on a one-yard throw from quarterback Ricky Santos – the pair of Wildcats is the I-AA equivalent of Ohio State's Troy Smith and Ted Ginn Jr.

The closest I-AA player to Ball in terms of careers touchdown receptions is 22 behind his new mark, set at 54. And that won't change much anytime soon because that player is Wagner senior Chris Turner – that is unless Turner goes on an unprecedented tear the rest of the way, which is unlikely.

Since that day, Ball has scored three more touchdowns – all coming against Northeastern two weeks ago. Despite UNH's 36-35 overtime loss, Ball at the top of his game. He caught 11 catches passes for 47 yards to go along with his three scores.

In eight games this season he's caught 59 balls for 711 yards. That includes four games of catching at least nine passes and gaining 100 or more yards.

Ball's best day thus far was a 12-catch 179-yard performance on Sept. 23 when he torched Dartmouth for a season-high three scores.

One of the major key's this weekend for UMass will be to find a way to shutdown UNH's No 1 playmaker, something that hasn't been easy thus far.

Jon Pellard

Despite all the feats New Hampshire's David Ball has racked up this season, one thing needs to be kept in mind – he's only human. He's been shutdown before and will be shut down again.

Another key factor that shouldn't go overlooked is the fact that UMass boasts one of the best defenses in Division I-AA. When it comes to defending, the Minutemen are no slouches.

Against Towson on Oct. 14, UMass proved it can shutdown a potent passing attack. Entering that contest – and still to this day – the Tigers were deemed one of the best passing offenses in the Atlantic 10. The Maroon and White allowed just 101 passing yards in that game, a season low for the Tigers.

The Minutemen also shutdown a dangerous receiver in Andrae Brown. The preseason All-Conference selection was non-existent against UMass, catching three balls for 25 yards.

The UMass secondary is full of guys who have proven they know what they're doing.

Senior James Ihedigbo is the unquestioned leader of the bunch from his safety spot. Known for his bone-crunching hits, Ihedigbo would love to catch Ball over the middle of the field. He's fifth on the Minutemen with 38 tackles and added a key interception this weekend against Northeastern.

Cornerbacks Tracy Belton and Sean Smalls possess the athletic ability to stick with the speedy Ball, who is also a member of the UNH track and field team. Belton has one interception to his credit this season while Smalls has made 29 stops on the year.

Ihedigbo's counterpart at safety, senior Brandon Smith, is the fumble-recovering, touchdown-scoring member of the group. Twice this season he's scooped up fumbles and returned them for six points.

The match up between these four and Ball should be one of the more intriguing ones on Saturday. But with the experience and overall athletic ability, the advantage goes the way of the Minutemen.

Jon Pellard

Early exit doesn't equal failure

Eli Rosenswaike

The playoffs are the standard unit of measurement of a team's success. The Massachusetts women's soccer team didn't reach that plateau for the second consecutive season. But does this mean that the Minutewomen's season was unsuccessful without a postseason appearance?

Despite falling just short of the postseason in the Atlantic 10, the Minutewomen have plenty of reasons to hold their collective heads up high and be proud of how they represented UMass athletics.

THE PAST

The season got off on the wrong foot after their opening loss to New Hampshire. However, the Minutewomen bounced back quickly, and with authority, by winning six games in a row, including four straight contests decided by a single goal.

Those tough battles that they endured made them much stronger as a team. They needed that strength as they navigated through a difficult stretch of games in and out of the conference.

See ROSENSWAIKE on page 8

Enigmatic season at Garber Field

Kevin Dooley

You would have an easier time putting together a 10,000-piece jigsaw puzzle with someone screaming in your ear than you would have figuring out the 2006 Massachusetts field hockey team.

Look no further than the game it played against Rhode Island last Saturday for the right to go on to the Atlantic 10 Tournament. UMass outshot the Rams 27-5, 14 of those shots on net. For one of the rare times all season, the Minutewomen outplayed the other team for more than two minutes.

None of that mattered though. One goal by the Rams was all the difference, ending UMass's season short of an A-10 birth for the first time in three seasons.

On the surface it would seem UMass was robbed of a chance to go to the A-10 Tournament.

But if you examine the 2006 Minutewomen, they were far from a team robbed of their destiny. Injuries to key players, multiple suspensions right before the home opener, a statement which made you wonder if that person's head was up in the clouds, being forced to start a freshman at goal midway through the season, and heartbreaking losses that probably forced the entire team to go on Prozac.

At times this season, UMass coach Patty Shea was so flabbergasted at some of her team's performances that she had no other choice but to call them "awful" or "horrible." Shea even let me call them awful one time, but I respectfully declined.

Other times, Shea would tell reporters this team was one of the best keep secrets in field hockey. They had unlimited potential, according to Shea.

There was always one thing you could expect from the Minutewomen: that was you never knew what to expect.

The best way to predict how this team was going to perform any given day was to put all the possible ways a team can possibly play on pieces of paper, put them in a hat, close your eyes and reach in and grab one.

The year of contradictions began right off the bat when the Maroon and White began a season-long eight-game road trip out in California against Stanford, California, and Pacific. Courtesy of the UMass media relations website, there were plenty of photos taken from the trip, plenty of diary entries from certain team members, and all the stats a reporter covering the team 3,000 miles away could need.

But there weren't plenty of wins. In fact, there were no wins: A 0-3 record to begin the year.

Once you thought the team was destined to have a poor season, they come back to the East coast and win two games against Harvard and Fairfield. The latter victory was a come-from-behind win that gave Shea her 100th career victory and saw sophomore forward Lauren Gillespie score two of her team-high 13 goals on the year. Everything looked to be getting back on track.

Not a chance.

If junior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau never visits the state of Vermont again no one would blame her.

After losing two in a row against Northeastern and BU, Letourneau gave up five goals on just six shots to the Dartmouth Big Green. The team would eventually lose in overtime, but more importantly, it was the game where it was clear Letourneau was clearing the way for freshman goaltender Sarah Williams to take over the starting job.

And to add injury to insult, standout sophomore midfielder Erin Parker went down with a season-ending injury. UMass would lose

The regular season has ended and the road to the men's soccer Atlantic 10 Championships has begun. Charlotte will host the games at Transamerica Field where six teams will compete on three consecutive nights, Thursday to Sunday.

St. Louis finished first in the A-10 (12-3-2, 8-0-1 A-10). It earned the top seed and a first round bye. The Billikens will play the lowest seed remaining in the tournament.

The No.2 seed is Rhode Island (10-5-4, 7-2-0 A-10). The Rams also received a first round bye and will play the highest seed remaining in the semifinal round.

St. Louis traveled to Rhode Island in the regular season finale. St. Louis defeated the Rams to clinch the regular-season title. The Rams out shot the Billikens, 14-9, and also edged them in corner kicks, 9-5. Freshman goalkeeper Ross Kaufman made three saves in the victory.

Rounding out the three through six seeds are No. 3 Richmond (9-6-4, 6-1-2 A-10), No. 4 Duquesne (11-4-1, 6-1-0 A-10), No. 5 Charlotte (9-5-4, 5-2-2 A-10) and the No. 6 seed Xavier (7-9-2, 4-3-2 A-10).

First Round match-ups

In the first game on Thursday night, No. 3 Richmond will play No. 6 Xavier. These two teams played their season finale against each other on Sunday. Xavier at home on Senior Day defeated Richmond, 2-1, in double overtime.

Both teams had something to play for in that game; if Richmond won it could have earned a first round bye earning the second seed. With the win Xavier pulled two points ahead of Fordham for the sixth and final playoff spot.

Senior striker Toni Skudrzik scored the Fall Open House reflects increase in prospective students

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

From the crowds of football fans piling into the Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium to the pre-game parties in the parking lots, Homecoming 2006 at the University of Massachusetts was hard to miss. Yet for numerous faculty members, representatives and over 1,000 prospective students, the game was not the highlight of the week, but rather, the best part was this year's Fall Open House for Prospective Students on Oct. 21.

The event gave prospective students plenty to do, with events ranging from meetings with admissions representatives and financial aid counselors to information sessions, panel discussions and tours of campus classrooms, labs and studios.

Kevin Kelly, director of admissions at the University, said this interest in attending UMass is most likely due to rising tuition costs at private schools and the increasingly aggressive marketing strategies on the University's behalf.

Nina Saini, a student admissions representative and student speaker for the Class of 2007, also noted this year's Open House as "an absolute success, more so than last year."

Saini believes the increase is in part to the success of UMass' academics.

"The increase has a large part to do with the respectable and high ranking programs we have on this campus," she said.

A newfound increase of interest in the Amherst campus is not only apparent through this year's Open House, which had the highest attendance rate than previous years. For 2006, UMass Amherst received 23,000 applications, an 11 percent increase from 2005. Those at the admissions office expect to see as many as 25,000 applicants for this coming year.

The RSVP for the Open House was also on the rise, with over 600 more RSVPs than last year. These numbers have encouraged admissions officials to schedule another open house for Nov. 11.

Although Kelly believes that October is "a bit too soon to tell" in predictions of this year's admissions, he does recognize that this year is different than any other.

"We are currently running ahead on

New study shows decrease in MA smokers

By Debleena Mitra
Collegian Staff

Statistics released by The Department of Public Health (DPH) this week show that the number of smokers in Massachusetts is decreasing. The results come from the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS), a state-wide annual telephone survey that is conducted in order to monitor health issues within the state.

The results came from data gathered in a 2005 survey in which 8,900 Massachusetts residents over the age of 18 participated. Survey questions ranged from inquiring about everyday habits, such as eating, to chronic diseases.

"The Massachusetts BRFSS continues to be one of the key public health surveillance tools which helps us target resources to meet the needs of residents and improve the health of our citizens," said DPH Commissioner Paul Cote Jr.

According to Cote, the survey sheds light on the health habits of Massachusetts citizens and is invaluable in assisting public health officials to determine which areas are in need of the most help.

However, this year's survey delivers good news about tobacco use, which is the primary cause of preventable death in the country. Smoking rates among adults have dropped from 28 percent to 18 percent since 1986.

This is an improvement from last year's reported 19 percent of adults who smoked. Overall, Massachusetts remains below the national average of 21 percent.

According to the Smoking-Attributable Mortality, Morbidity, and Economic Costs study in 2000, nearly $12 million is lost in productivity per day because of smokers' premature deaths. The results from this study also reveal that a total of 118,389 years of potential life, which averages out to 13 years per smoker, have been lost due to cigarette habits.

Knowledge about the negative effects tobacco use is widespread. Preventative programs, such as D.A.R.E. (Drug Abuse Resistance Education), have been implemented in schools to stop kids from smoking. Many measures have also been taken by the DPH to reach out to adult smokers who have fallen victim to the habit.

One example of help is the Smoke-Free Work Place law that Governor Romney signed in 2004. This law calls for employers to prohibit smoking inside any part of a workplace and calls for fines ranging from $100 to $300 for smoking, or permitting one to do so.

"This report demonstrates that we have made tremendous progress in lowering smoking rates in Massachusetts," said DPH Associate Commissioner Sally Fogerty. "It also allows us to target our efforts to those groups and communities where smoking rates remain high as we work to reduce the numbers of smokers."

According to Fogerty, geographical areas that have higher concentrations of smokers include Worcester, Springfield, Fall River and rural parts of southeastern and western Massachusetts.

The BRFSS survey results also reveal other health issues, including the increase in obesity. According to the survey, 20.7 percent of adults are obese; however, despite the rising average weight, Massachusetts is still the fifth leanest state in the country. Also, the hinge drinking rate dropped to 16 percent from last year, when 17 percent of the population were heavy drinkers.

UMass pedestrian crosswalk program hits bump in the road

By Nicole Boonjakuakul
Collegian Staff

Although the University of Massachusetts Police Department has been trying to implement a pedestrian safety program to improve crosswalk safety on its campus, getting the program into full effect has been difficult.

The crosswalk pilot project began Sept. 11, 2006 and enforces student cadets to guard the crosswalk at the intersection of Massachusetts Ave. and Sunset Ave., which is the busiest crosswalk on the UMass campus, according to Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald of UMPD.

The crosswalk is to be guarded on Mondays and Wednesdays from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., when the crosswalk is most congested with students from the Southwest residential area.

But numerous students who travel this crosswalk daily have expressed that pedestrians still remain at risk since they haven't seen any sort of pedestrian traffic control on Massachusetts Ave.

"I have class from 10-10 a.m. to 11 a.m., and I use this crosswalk to return to Southwest afterwards. I've never seen anyone from UMPD guarding the crosswalk," said one student.

Other students have mentioned seeing a police officer standing next to the crosswalk and using a radar gun to control speed of oncoming traffic, but not a student cadet.

According to Archbald, there have been scheduling conflicts with student cadets and their availability for managing crosswalks, which is why project enforcement has been difficult.

"It is a project pilot," said Archbald. "We were somewhat skeptical about how many hours we could get from the student cadets who do attend classes during the day and are from the area colleges, as well as Springfield," he said.

"The staffing for the program was something we were somewhat concerned about going into it," Archbald continued. "As a result, we try to keep it down to two days where we try to keep two cadets out there, and we've had some success.

"Ideally, we want to have cadets out there five days a week. But we've probably had about half a dozen days since the program started where we've had both cadets out there," he said.

The program, initiated by UMPD Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor, came after six pedestrians were hit on the UMass campus within a two-week period last February. The program works in conjunction with a $75,000 federal grant given to the school last fall from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration to improve safety on campus.

"The grant works towards education and enforcement of traffic safety," said Archbald. "We have been busy distributing education materials at traffic stops or during car stop when citations are handed out.

"We have officers in plain clothes and in uniform at the crosswalks during the day and at night to remind pedestrians to be more careful when they're crossing," he said.

Lieutenant David Black of UMPD, who heads the grant, has also held some speaking engagements about traffic safety, said Archbald.

An Amherst local was registered with the Amherst Police Department as a level three sex offender, the highest classification that can be placed on an individual. Hector Diaz, 46, was convicted of rape in April of 1990. The Massachusetts Sex Offender Registry Board has determined Diaz is at a high risk to re-offend. Pictures of Diaz may be viewed on the Sex Offender Registry Board's website at www.state.ma.us/sorb/

Tuesday October 30

3:51 p.m.
A hit and run incident occurred in the CVS parking lot on North Pleasant Street in Amherst. Police obtained a license plate number, but the vehicle had left by their arrival.

6:52 p.m.
A 1975 Volkswagen Beetle caught on fire from the rear engine compartment while the owner was still inside. The owner had just driven back from Ware, Mass., and noted that nothing had been wrong with the vehicle at the time. The owner was able to exit the car without injury.

8:46 p.m.
A woman was found screaming for help in a swamp near the basketball courts in the Village Park Apartments in Amherst. She was extracted from the water by police and was found to be under the influence of acid. Police searched for an involved male party, who left the scene voluntarily. The party later called to confirm he did not need medical attention and had called 911 earlier because his girlfriend could not be controlled after running into the woods.

Sunday November 1

1:06 a.m.
Two brothers were arrested for assaulting a third party outside of Delano's bar on North Pleasant Street in Amherst. Manuel Amaya-Ventura, 36, and Omar Amaya, 21, were witnessed punching another man in the face. The victim was identified but fled the scene. Amaya-Ventura and Amaya were taken by police for disorderly conduct.

1:28 a.m.
A reported larceny occurred at Hobart Lane. Missing items included laptops, iPods and backpacks.

VT takes on new elder care

By John Curran
Associated Press

WINOOSKI, Vt.— Ninety-three-year-old Florence "Tubby" Parsons has a lot going for her. She has her cat, Buddy, the plants in her one-bedroom apartment to tend to, and a weekly 25-cent poker game with neighbors.

Best of all, she doesn't have to live in a nursing home. Instead, she gets daily visits from a longtime friend who draws a $10-an-hour paycheck from the state to care for her.

It is part of a unique experiment under way in Vermont. Under Vermont's Choices for Care program, Medicaid-eligible senior citizens who need someone to tend to their needs have the choice of being cared for at home by a family member, friend or neighbor, who gets paid by the state.

"A nursing home? They sit there and moan and holler and sit in a chair and sleep. I don't want that," said Parsons, who has heart and thyroid problems and uses a walker to get around her senior citizen apartment building.

Experts say the closely watched project could spur dramatic changes in the way America handles long-term care for the elderly.

One year after enacting it, Vermont officials say it is reducing the number of people sent to nursing homes, cutting the cost of taxpayer-funded care and improving the quality of life for people like Parsons.

Critics, including the nursing home industry, say subsidized home care by family members and other non-professionals is far from a panacea. They say the care isn't as good, however well-meaning family members are.

Penny Walsh, 41, a former tenant of Parsons', gets paid $10 an hour for 35 to 40 hours a week. She said she took the job because she was already doing some of Parsons' cleaning and other chores for nothing.

"It's like seeing my grandmother every day," she said, sitting by Parsons' side during a Monday morning visit. Previously she was a clerk and a worker at a day-care center.

Federal officials say the Vermont program could help blunt one of the longstanding criticisms of Medicaid — that it shunts people into institutions without regard to what they really want.

Medicaid, which spent $38 billion on institutional care last year, wants to put shift more toward home care and community-based system, where "the medical dollars follow the needs of the patient, rather than the other way around," said Mary Kahn, a spokeswoman for the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, the federal agency that administers the programs.

It costs the state of Vermont about $122 a day for Medicaid-covered senior citizens who live in nursing homes, compared with about $80 a day for those being cared for in their homes.

About 120 more Vermont senior citizens are getting Medicaid-subsidized home care now than in October 2005, when Choices for Care began. The number in nursing homes has dropped by 155, according to the state.

Moreover, "there's something about getting the care from someone who knows you, who's connected to you and who loves you," said Patrick Flood, commissioner of the state Department of Disabilities, Aging and Independent Living. "It has an impact on your quality of life, and we're seeing that."

Mary Shriver, executive director of the Vermont Health Care Association, a nursing home trade group, said that in-home care works for some but that it cannot match nursing home care for quality.

"Good intentions can cause some damage sometimes," she said. Sometimes, good intentions are not enough.

"Typically, a family says, 'Sure, we can do this' and brings their grandparent into the home and starts into the role of caregiving and the state is paying them," said J. Churchill Hindes, president of the Visiting Nurse Association of Chittenden and Grand Isle Counties, a nonprofit home health care agency. "And after a few months or a year, they realize how exhausting the work is, how emotionally draining it might be and just how hard it is."

Parsons' caregiver said the arrangement is working out great so far.

For her part, Parsons likes the company, and the help she gets with cleaning, cooking and getting around.

"She's been as close as family for a long time," Parsons said. "You know what they say: You have to put up with your family, but you choose your friends. I chose her."

Big Dig tunnel design faulted in collapse

BOSTON—Federal inspectors have found that a Big Dig tunnel ceiling that collapsed in July and killed a motorist was designed with a smaller margin of safety than other tunnel ceilings in America, according to a report obtained by the Boston Globe.

The Interstate 90 connector tunnel's drop ceiling panels were held in place by steel hangers suspended from bolts that were glued into the tunnel ceiling with epoxy. But there were no beams attaching the ceiling to the walls, and there were half as many bolts used as called for in the original design.

"No redundancy was built into the ceiling in the event the hangers failed," according to a preliminary report by the National Transportation Safety Board obtained by the Globe.

"The NTSB has researched other tunnels throughout the country and has found that significant redundancy is built into the ceiling design" so that the ceilings would not collapse when bolts fall out, the report said. The Globe account appeared in Wednesday's editions.

The report does not reach conclusions about the cause of the ceiling collapse because the investigation is not finished. The July 10 accident has resulted in a civil lawsuit and other federal and state criminal investigations of the $14.6 billion highway project.

The preliminary NTSB report said the joint venture company overseeing Big Dig construction, Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff, decided to use epoxy bolts, rarely used for heavy objects, even after switching to heavier concrete ceiling panels to save money.

The NTSB report also suggests that flaws in construction by Modern Continental Construction Co. may have made the design more hazardous, the Globe said.

Federal investigators also have found no evidence the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, the agency overseeing the Big Dig, rechecked the ceiling bolts after the I-90 connector opened in 2003, the report said. A similar finding was announced in October by the state's inspector general.

Modern Continental and Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff have previously said they stand by their work on the Big Dig, and are cooperating with investigators.

Father guilty of genital mutilation

By Errin Haines
Associated Press

LAWRENCEVILLE, Ga—An Ethiopian immigrant was convicted Wednesday of the genital mutilation of his 2-year-old daughter and was sentenced to 10 years in prison in what was believed to be the first such criminal case in the United States.

Khalid Adem, 30, was found guilty of aggravated battery and cruelty to children. Prosecutors said he used scissors to remove his daughter's clitoris in his family's Atlanta-area apartment in 2001. The child's mother, Fortunate Adem, said she did not discover it until more than a year later.

Adem, who had no criminal record, could have been sentenced to up to 40 years in prison. He held his face in his hands and wept loudly after the jury's verdict was read.

During her father's trial, the girl, now 7, clutched a teddy bear as she testified on videotape that her father "cut me on my private part."

"This child has suffered, will suffer, the rest of her life," Judge Richard Winegarden told Adem during sentencing.

Federal law specifically bans the practice of genital mutilation, but many states do not have a law addressing it. Georgia lawmakers, with the support of the girl's mother, passed an anti-mutilation law last year. But Adem was not tried under that law since it did not exist when his daughter was cut.

During the trial, Adem testified he never circumcised his daughter or asked anyone else to do so. He said he grew up in Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, and considers the practice more prevalent in rural areas.

Adem's attorney acknowledged that the girl had been cut, but implied that the family of the girl's mother, who emigrated from South Africa, may have been responsible. The Adems divorced three years ago, and attorney Mark Hill suggested that the couple's daughter was coached to testify against her father by her mother, who has full custody of the child.

Adem, who cried throughout the trial and during his testimony, was asked what he thought of someone who believes in the practice. He replied: "The word I can say is 'mind in the gutter.' He is a moron."

The practice crosses ethnic and cultural lines and is not tied to a particular religion. Activists say it is intended to deny women sexual pleasure. In its most extreme form, the clitoris and parts of the labia are removed and the labia that remain are stitched together.

Knives, razors or even sharp stones are usually used, according to a 2001 department report. The tools are frequently not sterilized, and often, many girls are circumcised at the same ceremony, leading to infection.

It is unknown how many girls have died from the procedure, either during the cutting or from infections, or years later in childbirth. Nightmares, depression, shock and feelings of betrayal are common psychological side effects, according to a 2001 federal report.

Since 2001, the State Department estimates that up to 130 million women worldwide have undergone circumcision.

MatchTalk online dating services to use voice chat

DALLAS—Online dating services may be convenient, but they're not the most personable way to meet a potential mate. What's been lacking, Match.com Chief Executive Jim Safka believes, is a way for would-be couples to hear each other talk.

A new service from the company called matchTalk aims to do just that.

Free for basic subscribers beginning Thursday, matchTalk will let users go online and signal if they're interested in speaking to each other anonymously over the phone.

The system protects privacy by assigning the couple a unique number that they can use to talk to each other without fear of giving away their real telephone number or other personal details. People with caller ID will see the matchTalk number instead of their actual listing.

Safka described the technology — an industry first — as an important step in the development of Internet-based matchmaking services.

"It's one of those back-to-the-future features," he said. "We're really starting to weave in the natural way people meet."

Safka said such features are important to the future growth of Internet dating services. He said there are more than 90 million single adults in the United States actively looking for a relationship, yet only 3 million people join an Internet matchmaking service.

"That voice is really critical in determining whether you have chemistry with someone," he said. "What we hope to do is get people spending less time online and more time talking to each other and meeting each other."

UMPD tries to increase safety on campus

UMass sophomore Olivia Simpson was one of the six pedestrians hit by a car last semester.

"I haven't heard anything about this program at all," said Simpson. "The only thing I noticed after I returned to school from the accident was that there were bigger and brighter crosswalk signs on campus.

"But even with bigger signs, there's no guarantee the driver sees you. I did everything I was supposed to do before crossing, but it didn't help me," she said.

"UMPD is focusing on the problems on how people cross the streets or how people are driving," Simpson said. "But if someone handed me a pamphlet about crossing the street, I wouldn't take it seriously. I think telling people what they're doing wrong isn't going to work. It's more about managing the way roads are set up on campus."

According to some UMass students, placing the blame on either the driver or the pedestrian is unfair.

"It's a 50/50 relationship, and many people don't understand that," said one UMass senior. "Pedestrians assume that drivers will stop for them regardless of where they are, and at the same time, drivers assume pedestrians see them on the road."

"There are different phases of the program," said Archibald. "Right now, we're at a phase where we're actually issuing citations for crosswalk violations," he said. "Officers can be paid overtime for supplemental shifts designed to focus their energies towards crosswalk enforcement and reaching the grant's goal."

Another device to promote pedestrian safety is using "bump-outs," as seen on University Drive. According to Archibald, using the bump-outs to narrow the road as it enters a crosswalk has been an ongoing test. The raised structures on the side of the road visually force people to slow down as the street narrows into the crosswalk.

"Narrowing the road on other parts of campus has been a continuing discussion, but I have not personally been a part of one about the intersection of Massachusetts Ave. and Sunset Ave.," he said.

As for the future, Archbald expressed UMPD's dedication to advocating for traffic-calming devices and design of new streets. He explains that when the University considers changes or upgrades of streets, there's a whole component involving environmental health and safety engineers to design streets that reduce traffic.

"I know that when the University decides to do new street construction throughout campus, they will consider new signage of crosswalks, different types of crosswalks, whether they be raised or lit, redoing the curbs and sidewalks, or using different colors to paint on the streets," he said.

"We are committed to this pilot project throughout the semester," said Archibald. "We have to work out some solution to the problems we are having, whether it is to hire more cadets to get out to these crosswalks. This program is a high priority for the members of UMPD."

Open House indicates increase in students applications and visiting high schools," Kelly said. "Then, there is the large Open House. There is no doubt that we are looking at a very good response this year."

This year, Kelly and others in the Admissions Office have made it known that the class size they are aiming for this year will be about the same size as last year's — approximately 4,190 students. Even though increased interest brings an increase in admissions, the number of students admitted into UMass remains the same.

As a result, more students will be turned down from UMass Amherst this fall, making the school a more selective university to apply to.

Many recognize an increase in selectivity as a positive quality, including Saini, who believes this increase is "keeping UMass climbing higher and higher on the ladder of success."

The incoming freshman class may act as an indicator of increasing diversity, as well. The Open House included students not only from Massachusetts, but from 20 different states as well. The University normally has a large percentage of in-state residents, although the numbers have been steadily declining in the past years.

Nina Saini believes that the Open House "illustrates the type of university that UMass Amherst has become."

Ten shot at San Francisco Halloween party

By Louise Chu
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO—Gunfire broke out between two groups at a massive Halloween street party in the city's Castro district, wounding at least 10 people, including innocent bystanders, police said Wednesday.

The shooting began around 10:40 p.m. Tuesday as authorities were dispersing thousands of revelers under a curfew aimed at controlling the traditionally raucous party.

Two people were detained for questioning, but no one had been arrested early Wednesday, police Capt. Al Casciato said. He said two groups of people had gotten into an altercation before the shooting began.

One victim was listed in critical condition at San Francisco General Hospital.

The once-spontaneous and unsanctioned party was taken over by the city four years ago after police recorded five stabbings and a number of assaults in a 2002 crowd of 500,000 people and confiscated a chain saw.

Officials and members of the district's large gay community said the party had started attracting gay bashers along with the usual colorfully costumed characters.

On Tuesday night, city officials ramped up the police presence, reduced the number of entertainment stages from three to one and cut off the festivities at 11 p.m.

After reports of a multiple shooting on the 2200 block of Market St. in San Francisco Tuesday, police secure the area around the city's Castro district where a massive street party broke out.

"We had the sheriff's department screening people for weapons and alcohol. Obviously you have a major event — a lot of different spots" to patrol, said police spokesman Neville Gittens said. "I can't explain how this happened. Unfortunately it did happen, and we are investigating to find out who is the cause of the shooting."

Ted Morales, 43, said he was working as a volunteer security guard for the event when he "heard someone empty their gun" in the crowd.

"When the shooting happened, people just dove to the ground like a wall of water," said Morales, who did not see what led up to the shooting. A woman standing near him was grazed in the neck by a bullet, he said.

Sophia Vlahiotis, who owns Capri Ristorante Pizza just yards from the scene, was outside selling pizzas when a crowd of people fleeing the bullets began running in her direction.

"They pushed the table over, the oven fell and then I realized it was gunshots," she said. "They were trying to get into the restaurant, there were so many people."

Vlahiotis, who did not see what led up to the shooting, said this year may be her last participating in the Halloween party.

NJ School hit by F-16 gets $500,000

LITTLE EGG HARBOR, N.J. — The Air Force will pay more than $500,000 to an Ocean County elementary school that was mistakenly shot by an F-16 on a training maneuver two years ago.

Under a settlement announced Wednesday, the Air Force will pay $519,070 in compensation to the Little Egg Harbor Intermediate School. The building was damaged by 27 rounds of inert 20mm ammunition from an air cannon mounted on the plane during a Nov. 3, 2004 nighttime mission over the New Jersey Pinelands.

The military blamed the pilot for the accident, but also said poorly designed controls in the F-16 played a role.

"The Air Force has done the right thing," said state Rep. Jim Saxton. "Their agreement goes a long way towards repairing the actual damages to the school building as well as keeping their relationship with the community healthy."

School officials did not immediately return a call seeking comment Wednesday.

No one was injured in the mishap, which rattled the southern Ocean County region surrounding the Warren Grove Gunnery Range. Eight of the 2-inch lead rounds punched through the school's roof, knocking down ceiling tiles.

At least one round struck a child's desk, and others scuffed the asphalt in the parking lot. The rounds explode on impact when they are live.

College growing pains

Michael Cartwright

I have just finished sipping on a pint of Sam Adams Seasonal. It's quite a change of pace from the incongruously labeled Milwaukee's Best and Pabst Blue Ribbon.

Lately, glass bottles of expensive beer have replaced aluminum cans filled with swill. No, my bank account isn't any larger than it was a year ago. It's actually much smaller. However, I simply can no longer tolerate "Keystone" like I once did.

As a result of this, and of other tragic transformations, I am feeling pretty damn old at the young age of 21.

Many of us, seniors especially, are at a point where our awkward-fitting shoes are straddling the line between youth and adulthood. We are plodding along the tracks as the real world steadily approaches us like an oncoming train that can't be stopped, despite the fact we're clearly standing there like deer in the headlights.

We are still trying to hold onto those good old days, but it is no longer acceptable to get blackout-drunk on a Wednesday afternoon and stumble into someone's room with a bottle of gin in hand. In fact, it's amazing that it once was.

Now stumble around my own room instead, realizing this college experience will be over all too soon. Don't get me wrong, I am looking forward to the future — I am just amazed by the frightening rate at which it's approaching.

"Nick at Nite" was once packed with my parents' childhood favorites. Whether it was Lucy McGillicuddy selling cough medicine or Ethel Mertz stuffing her mouth behind a chocolate factory conveyor belt, my mother laughed her head off at the black-and-white episodes of "I Love Lucy."

Nowadays, it's difficult knowing whether or not someone still uses the laidback shake that was so universal during our earlier years.

Remarkably, I am now the one who is laughing out loud at Nick at Nite's lineup of saccharin sitcoms.

Currently, its late night roster includes "The Cosby Show," "Full House" and "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air." Where did this come from? How the hell did this happen?

Along with "Saved By The Bell", these were the shows that entertained my youth. I would sit on the couch with an overflowing bowl of Kix (both kid-tested and mother-approved) and become transfixed for 23 solid minutes (I played indoor-hoops during commercials.)

Even Kirk Cameron feels the strain of getting older.

At a relatively young age, at least on some level, I realized these shows were packed with pat dialogue and bad acting, but still tuned in to watch them every week (this is essentially how I feel about "Entourage" today) because of their incredibly youthful quality.

I now sit on the couch in my apartment, still watching "Full House," still eating a bowl of cereal, and still playing indoor-hoops during commercial breaks, as the banner hanging above the basket promotes a brand of beer I barely drink anymore. All of this is part of my desperate attempt to hold onto youth for as long as I possibly can.

I'm sure I am not the only one who feels at home watching Danny Tanner's red convertible drive across the Golden Gate Bridge. Nothing restores fond memories like two mediocre comedians, a couple more has-beens, a former meth addict, and a pair of coked-out millionaire twins who weigh less than their bank accounts. Like I said, a lot has changed, and watching these kinds of shows make me realize how true that really is.

A lazy kind of handshake was always the traditional male-to-male greeting growing up. (It resembles the infamous Zack Morris/A.C. Slater embrace of the 1990s without the flamboyant snap of the fingers at its conclusion.)

Nowadays, it's difficult knowing whether or not someone still uses the laidback shake that was so universal during our earlier years or if he has moved on to a much firmer, more "adult" handshake, in which focused eye-to-eye contact is preferred. I constantly find myself caught in between the two, resulting in lots of awkward handshakes with lots of awkward dudes.

And of these dudes, hardly any of them refer to one another as a friend anymore. A guy is almost always referred to as a "buddy." No one ever referred to each other as "buddy" in high school; however, in college, it is apparently necessary that you do so.

Students are now creating new mature-sounding screen names. The boy you once knew as "SouthwestPimp420" on AIM is now the man you know as "JoephPWillard07" and his voicemail that was recorded while slurring his words at McMurphy's has been replaced by something similar to what we hear on our parents' answering machines. As much as I don't want to admit it, we're growing up.

And I'll most likely look back on my years at UMass like I do re-runs of sappy sitcoms. Certain events will happily jog my memory while countless bits of action and dialogue will seem utterly ridiculous.

One thing I do know is this: the train I spoke of earlier is approaching fast as ever and I really don't want to get hit by it. I also don't want to cowardly jump out of the way. I have no choice but to jump onboard even though I can barely predict where it's taking me.

Which begs the question: Whatever happened to predictability, the milkman, the paperboy and evening TV?

Concerning unpopular speech

Brad Leibowitz

Men such as King, Kepler and Galileo all knew that no matter the consequence of a thought, some things need to be said for the sake of saying them. There needs to be an attempt to change the ways of the majority.

However, in today's world, the thoughts of the unpopular, which resonate from the minority, intended to change common happenings, have been repeatedly drowned out to suit the contentment of the majority.

We find ourselves in a nation where citizens are at the extremes, leaving the middle ground vacant. Furthermore, the basic partner of free speech, tolerance of ideas, holds no value. With everyone dying to label themselves Republican or Democrat, our free speech rights are being used to advocate either side, yet no one is making a stride to round the bases towards listening to one another. Essentially, everyone has their mouths open with their ears closed, especially concerning politics and religion.

The 37 percent of the country thinking outside the American conventional box could be the current day political prophet group.

According to an online Newstealth poll of the American populous (July 2006), 63 percent of Americans consider themselves either republicans or democrats (34 percent R, 29 percent D).

Now do the math. If 63 percent of Americans affiliate themselves with one of the two major parties, another 37 percent are independent, green, or maybe even communist. If a majority of our national average is already affiliated, it seems pretty evident that no matter what the other 37 percent say or do, their actions are going to fall on deaf ears. This brings up the interesting point of the prophet.

The 37 percent of the country thinking outside the American conventional box could be the current day political prophet group. A prophet, in the terms of the politic, is an outsider whose thoughts change the beliefs of the majority.

In the past, men like Malcolm X, John Lennon and Martin Luther King Jr. all acted as American political prophets. During those years, the ears of the American system were still open creating an atmosphere in which change took place. This is not the case today.

With today's political division, members who don't affiliate with the two-party system find themselves watching shows like "Hannity & Colmes," "The O'Reilly Factor" and "Hardball" wondering where men like Edward R. Murrow went. Our political landscape has been carved from the thoughts of the majority with a ditch in the ground for the thoughts of the rest; the same goes for religion.

In an f-squire poll, 78 percent of Americans were shown to identify with a belief in religion, leaving only 22 percent in the non-believer category (16 percent Agnostic, 6 percent Atheist). It is my understanding that in our country, the top two religions are Christianity and Judaism. However, more interestingly, the religious belief of an individual, more often than not, determines the citizen's political affiliation (Christians identifying with Republicans and Jews identifying with Democrats).

This begs the same question which our political affiliations beg to ask: if 78 percent of Americans believe in the same two-party thought process, where does the minority find itself? The answer: Asking questions which no one listens to.

Currently, we find ourselves involved in a battle against Islamic extremists who see the war as a never-ending religious cosmic battle. But, does anyone else realize that in many communities around the nation, Americans view the war in just the same way the Islamic extremists do?

For a vast majority of Americans, including President Bush, our war in the Middle East is nothing more than a current day crusade for a higher power, yet in this case, we justify it because we mask our higher power as the battle to establish democracy.

On the same note, with our quest on behalf of a higher power waging over seas, there is a similar quest raging domestically. From men handing out bibles on street corners, to men inviting you to join them for Shabbat, why is it no one can keep their religion to themselves?

In reference to politics, why is it alright to smear and wage war for your chosen religion domestically, yet, when it pertains to our international battle, religion is kept out of it? Maybe it's because as a nation we are too afraid to look ourselves, and more importantly the general public, in the eyes and say these actions are just as terroristic as Islamic actions.

I often find myself being looked down upon by God fearing, war waging individuals because 1) I continually ask uncomfortable questions which logic dictates must be asked of any belief in the unknown, and 2) according to God fearing individuals I just don't get it, and need to be saved if I personally am highly offended by both.

So, if you find yourself aligned with the two major American parties (religion & the bi-party system) begin to take a look around. If the war is pissing you off, if you're taxes are keeping you broke and if your God isn't answering all your prayers (which, if the first two apply, the third must), why not take a look at the outsiders, the minority.

Maybe they have a good idea to re-vamp the system. Maybe, just maybe, their ideas will change the way you think and, once more, your ears will open, creating change for the better.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DOUBTS ON DEVAL

In regards to yesterday's article, "Patrick and Murray to speak at the Cage," I think it is commendable that Mendez has sent an invitation to all four major candidates for governor; though I do question how it may have been done.

For example; were all four letters sent at the same time, and were they of the same quality, or was Deval's letter sent several months ago and the other three were placed in the mailbox the night before this article was written just so someone could say that it was nonpartisan? Even still ignoring the possibility of this biased act, I continue to question the "nonpartisan" nature of all of this.

I remember a little while back when the Student Government Association worked with the College Democrats (CD) to bring John Kerry to UMass. At that time the SGA members who advertised and spoke at the event were clearly partisan. This is made further evident by looking at who funded and organized the recent voter registration drive: both the SGA and CD.

So, if we accept that the SGA is a partisan body that supports Democrats, and there is no use in changing it, I would like to know the following: does the SGA, or at least the SGA leadership, truly believe that Deval will bring about free public higher education for all?

Nowhere in Deval's "Assuring Excellence in Public Education" (on Deval's campaign Web site) does it saying anything about free education. More importantly, will the SGA and CD be willing to pressure the post-election Governor Deval on this issue with the same amount of effort they have exercised in getting him elected in the first place?

GETTING THE HELL OUT OF DODGE

In September, I came to UMass as a member of the NSE with a mission. I wanted to transfer to UMass. It seemed like the perfect mix of a good educational environment and a thrilling social life.

Much to my disappointment, I find the residents of Amherst and the Board of Regents fighting to kill the party atmosphere at UMass. Well, if they feel that way, I have resolved to boycott Amherst businesses and transfer back to my home school.

I will no longer support the people who want to kill off Zoomass. One last thing, here's a surprise for the Board of Regents: My GPA is 3.6 and I have no criminal record.

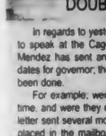
Projects over professors



Adam McGillen

Most of us walk the campus day in and day out and watch as the buildings around us are attacked by scaffolding. We see the very paths we walk on churned up and repaved. We discover new paths to class every day as new detour signs sprout up seemingly everywhere. We feel the ground shake as another dent is put into the campus, soon to be filled with a newer, flashier construction project.

Physically, this campus appears to be in a terrible state of decay, and these efforts of construction are leading the fight against becoming an old and decidedly ugly place. It is interesting to me that this institution seems to be so obsessed with exterior appearance, especially after someone allowed Frederle to be constructed out of a couple of big, grey Legos.

UMass is approaching a time of reevaluation, and it doesn't look promising.

As often happens, when decay begins to happen on the exterior, it has grown within at a much faster and more detrimental rate. The University of Massachusetts currently faces a crisis with its professor population. Sure, I may have riffed on professors before, but I never said I didn't appreciate the education they offer me. Whether I like how they do it or not, I am still thankful for everything my professors have done for me.

UMass is approaching a time of reevaluation, and it doesn't look promising. Once held as a prestigious research institution, UMass is falling behind due to lack of funding and the slowly declining number of professors on campus.

In response to this trend, Chancellor Lombardi launched the Amherst 250 Plan, which, according to the reports on the Campus Budget from the Office of the Chancellor Web site, calls for the expansion of the faculty by 250 professors over the course of the next three to five years. Given the benefit of the doubt, that means over the next five years, UMass needs to gain a net of 50 new professors each year.

This year, Lombardi hired 23 while 11 retired or resigned, according to an article appearing in last Friday's Daily Hampshire Gazette. That means UMass gained a whopping 12 professors — very short of the goal outlined by the 250 Plan.

Funding for this plan is based largely on what we pay, as well as contributions from the state. According to the Gazette, $2 million was spent on hiring, but Lombardi claimed UMass couldn't meet its quota of professors because of a lack of funding from the state.

That's right: $2 million yielded 23 new professors. Logically thinking, this would mean that given approximately $5 million more, Lombardi would have been able to reach the quota of 50 new professors fairly easily and even given some room for those professors who chose to retire or resign.

Despite needing so little money relatively, UMass is still spending hundreds of millions of dollars on construction projects around campus, ranging from the new Integrated Science Building and the Studio Arts Building to prettying up the walkways around the Du Bois Library.

It seems there is a clear answer to the problem of finding money to fulfill the Amherst 250 Plan. What good are new buildings without professors to take up the podiums and guide the intellectual minds of UMass students? What is the purpose in constructing new classrooms when there are hardly enough professors to fill the ones that already exist?

Being an institution of higher education, UMass should put education above all else. Certainly, maintenance issues need to be dealt with, old buildings need their restoration, but it seems the administration has become infatuated with breaking ground and cutting opening-day ribbons.

New buildings, shiny steel, colorful light fixtures and intriguing architecture may make the University more aesthetically pleasing, but have we forgotten why UMass was founded? This institution exists based on the ideal of an affordable, but still credible, college education for the general public.

Has our future been caught up in the generation that prides itself on looks? Is our education only skin deep?

Dunst takes career to next level

Kirsten Dunst and Jason Schwartzman team up in Sophia Coppola's latest movie 'Marie Antoinette.' This is the second time Dunst has worked with Coppola. The first time they worked together was back in 1999 for the movie 'Virgin Suicides.'

BY CHRISTINA FONG
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

As Gang of Four's "Natural's Not In It" starts playing during the opening credits of "Marie Antoinette," viewers will be slightly thrown off by the choice of music and at the same time intrigued by it. It's a sign of what's to come — a revamped portrayal of Marie Antoinette at the peak of her life that made her a legend.

As a biography of the infamous Austrian archduchess turned Queen of France, there are no plot twists to surprise the audience. "Marie Antoinette" is a movie mainly driven by human drama.

It starts off with Antoinette leaving Austria and making the physical transition onto French soil. Sophia Coppola ("Lost in Translation") recreates the fun and playful atmosphere so representative of the Rococo lifestyle, unlike many other stiffer film portrayals of 18th Century Europe.

However, Kirsten Dunst does not give the best performance. The portrayal she gave is commendable as the teenage queen who just wants to have a good time. However, the fact that two American actors were chosen to play the king and queen of France was a bit awkward, and it reduced some of the believability of the movie.

Jason Schwartzman gave a humorous performance as the King who couldn't consummate the marriage until after seven years into it. Everyone blamed Antoinette because she failed to entice her husband, much to everyone's chagrin, especially her mother's.

Unlike many biographical films, "Marie Antoinette" seemed to be less garrulous in terms of conversation. Antoinette spent more time reticent and deep in thought about the many problems that plagued her, which included her unresponsive husband and adjustment to palace life away from home. This stylistic choice was an interesting one, giving the film a more intimate feel by looking into her personal life rather than following her through it.

Whether she was partying until the crack of dawn, gambling her riches away, or indulging in dessert after dessert, Antoinette was portrayed as a teenager who wanted to enjoy her youth and simply didn't belong in the role she was forced into.

The film did a great job of making her more human. History gave the impression that she was a selfish, overindulgent queen, yet Coppola presented a more likable version of Antoinette. Even though her frivolous habits did tend to get irritating, viewers begin to pity her once she gets past the gilded façade that most textbooks present. It makes the knowledge of her execution more mournful.

The bright pastels and exquisite attention to detail in clothing and architecture are inundating, making it practically suffocating to imagine living in such wealth. Watching Marie shop for flowery fabrics for new dresses, rummage through ornately decorated pairs of shoes, and eat lavishly adorned cakes, it was understandable to see how she lost herself in it all. It was easy to forget that outside the bubble that was the Palace of Versailles, there were people struggling to survive in France.

Everything — the clothing, walls, table settings, gardens, food — was all so mouthwatering to look at, being royally spoiled became tempting. It's definitely a film for the senses as well as the mind.

The film crew was actually allowed special permission by the French government to film in the Palace of Versailles. Having it any other way would've diminished any dreamlike regality the film exudes.

The closing scene of the film mutually garnered some unsatisfactory opinions, since it was so abrupt. After a couple days of allowing the film the sink in, the final words and the last scene seemed to be extremely fitting for the movie. It came to represent of the end of era in the life of Marie Antoinette and ended on a sad parting yet poignant note.

The soundtrack of this film is amazing. Some may find it an unusual choice to choose more modern rock and pop music to be played while watching a procession of 18th Century carriages with the Palace of Versailles prominently set as the backdrop. It was a bold idea, and a clever one at that.

Making the film feel modern, as well as making Antoinette appear more like a contemporary iconic figure, the soundtrack helped connect with the very distant and foreign country of another time period.

"Marie Antoinette" is a fresh, comical, and dramatic take on the life of the young queen; a visual and auditory treat. It was enjoyable from start to finish, and it amplified interest in European history. Coppola again creates a movie worthy of time and money.

Students work towards car club

BY MIKKI BARD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

While driving down some of those farm-studded roads of western Massachusetts, do you have that urge to really floor it? Do your friends continually comment on your superb parallel parking? Do you fantasize about upgraded your car's suspension? Well, University of Massachusetts Amherst senior Igor Romashko and sophomore Will Blackwood of the unofficial UMass Amherst Motorsport Club do — and they're on a mission to bring Motorsports to our campus community.

Back in the 1990s, there was a UMass Motorsports Club, but by 2001 it had fallen apart, as clubs often do. The interest never died though, and students like Romashko and Blackwood wanted to re-start this controversial RSO. While browsing Facebook, Romashko noticed that he wasn't alone in his interests.

"I saw that there were a bunch of car clubs — but no one actually did anything. I thought, 'Why don't we have an actual club?'" said Romashko.

Romashko and Blackwood even met through Facebook and have been working hard ever since to make this dream a reality.

To be sure, they aren't alone in this mission — there are 256 Facebook members in the group and a dozen student administrators. The wall for posting comments is a charming mix of administrative matters such as insurance policies and pure guy-talk — such as the need for "American muscle car representation" at the next Dyno Day.

While many Facebook groups dissolve into silliness, the members of the group are committed to using the group as an essential communication tool between serious drivers who want to establish this club. The group description reads, "This Facebook Group is for the RSO UMass Motorsports. So if you don't want to be in the RSO, don't join the group."

The group's goal, in Blackwood's words, is to "make autocross available to anyone who is interested. People should be able to race their car without getting arrested."

The Facebook blurb continues to explain that the clubs activities "mostly revolve around Solo II competition, which is a safe, legal alternative to dangerous high-speed street racing."

Solo II, a standard low-medium speed auto race, is often run on empty parking lots or even airport runways. Traffic cones usually define the course. Racing the clock, one driver at a time competes to finish the course without knocking over any of the cones. Any car will do as long as it passes a mechanical inspection.

Though car races might seem a dangerous sport to some, Igor asserts that Solo II races are safe. "I've known people who have been doing it for over 15 years and they've never seen an accident," he said.

See AUTO CLUB on page 7

Car enthusiasts met on Facebook

The club has been promoting this message, hoping to correct any misconceptions about the sport.

Another misconception is that motor sports are only for guys. Romashko and Blackwood would be happy to welcome some females into this male-dominated world.

"Sometimes they will come along to the competitions," Blackwood says, "but they don't really get involved past that."

Reaching RSO status is no easy process. Romashko and Blackwood contacted the school last June to pitch their proposal for the Motorsports Club and didn't hear back for months. Suddenly, three weeks before classes started, they received word that the school had insufficient insurance for such a club.

"The day we were told that UMass didn't have the right insurance, we found out how to get our own to cover the event," Romashko explained. "But their decision was final."

Naturally, this caused a lot of frustration for Romashko, Blackwood and friends as they had been planning exciting events for the semester.

At this time, the group has been driving to places like Connecticut to participate in racing events. Though driving an hour and a half to compete isn't ideal, it is the best way for them to meet fellow enthusiasts and stay involved in the racing community.

Once insurance policies are reviewed and negotiations are made with Parking Services, the club may be able to hold competitions right here on campus.

Romanowsko and Blackwood are seeking out alternative plans to get permission from the University to have their group become a RSO.

Built to Spill going strong

BY CHUCK MYERS
ARTS & LIVING STAFF/DAILY NEWS SERVICE

Some bands can lose their creative edge when faced with an extended period between albums.

That's not the case with alternative rockers Built to Spill.

The Idaho-based band stayed busy since its last effort in 2001, and in the process produced a brilliant new album, "You In Reverse" (Warner).

The sixth studio album from Built to Spill (singer-songwriter and guitarist Doug Martsch, bassist Brett Nelson, guitarists Brett Nelson and Jim Roth, and drummer Scott Plouf), "You in Reverse" shows that the 5-year gap between albums had little effect on the group's creative edge.

In that break, when we put out our last record, we did some touring and stuff," Martsch recalls. "We spent about a year recording the record, and half a year waiting for it to come out. So, we spent most of that time working on the record."

"You In Reverse" showcases the band's established reputation for potent melodies and circuitous arrangements. Early numbers, such as "Traces" and the appealing "Liar," feature more mid-tempo fare in jam ballad fashion, while "Wherever You Go" delivers a dash of Neil Young-inspired flavor.

One standout on the album, "Gone," quilts together varied melodies at differing tempos, and textured guitars splashes.

"'Gone,' to me, is a bunch of interesting parts that are not quite good enough to warrant writing a whole song around," Martsch says. "It's five or six parts just in a row. Nothing goes back to anything else. Once a part has played out, it changes to something else and doesn't go back. ... There's songs like that on some of our other records, where it's just a lot of cool parts that we like, but nothing that we like so much that we want to play it longer than half a minute or something."

Virtually since its debut release in 1993, "Ultimate Alternative Wavers," Built to Spill has never shied away from opening up throttle on its sonic explorations. Several "You In Reverse" numbers stretch beyond the conventional 3-4 minute pop format, including the album opener, "Goin' Against Your Mind," which runs more than eight minutes.

Yet, the group also tries to keep its song lengths tight whenever possible.

"If something's really long, it's only because that's what it takes to get across everything we want to do on it," Martsch explains. "The first song on the new record is a perfect example, where it's just two chords. But we have all these ideas and different moods and stuff that we think are as good as each other. And we want to try to use them all."

Unlike the attention given to the music, Built to Spill's song lyrics side essentially exists to support the melody. As a result, it's not always easy to decipher the meaning or narrative behind the words of the band's song.

One new piece, "Mess With Time," provides a good example of this approach. Initially, the song's lyrics seem to take a political tact. In fact, Martsch admits, they simply represent the first thing that came to his mind.

"It kind of has some vague political things going on. The first couple of lines are just the first things I yelled out when I was coming up with the melody. That's how a lot of lyrics are — just the first thing I say."

"Basically, I come up with the song, the meter and the melody. I know how I want the singing to go, and then just find things (lyrics) that sort of fit. Subject matter is almost beside the point."

In its early days, Built to Spill was something of a work in progress.

Martsch tried out different musician combinations in the studio to give each new album a distinct sound and flavor. Following the band's third album, "Perfect from Now On" in 1997, Martsch made Nelson and Plouf permanent band members.

These days, Martsch is quite content with the band's dynamic and its creative groove.

"I love playing with these guys ... It's fun now as much as it's ever been."

Built to Spill continues to perform their own style of indie rock with songs that sometimes reach up to 8 minutes in length.

Many of television's new programs lack in viewers

BY JONATHAN STORM
THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

"No one ever went broke underestimating the intelligence of the American people," said pundit H. L. Mencken. But TV people are licking their wounds this fall for overestimating it.

Studios spent lavishly to achieve feature-film production values. Creators fashioned complex characters and plots. But a month into the new season, only one-fourth of the 16 new dramas have found solid ratings success. All tell simple stories.

So why aren't people watching some of the best new shows to debut in years?

Many viewers can't fit any more on their dance card, overloaded by a TV schedule that was crammed with good drama before the season began. Some are clearly confused by the complex, serialized plotting of shows like ABC's "The Nine." Others can't sit still for all the characters in the overstuffed enchilada of NBC's "Friday Night Lights."

"Give us the simple life," they cry. ABC's "Ugly Betty" is the top-rated new one-hour series. "She's ugly, but she's plucky, and she's gonna make it after all. We get that."

CBS's "Shark" is the No. 2 success. James Woods screams real loud. He's ruthless, like a shark, prosecuting different bad guys every week. Nothing fishy about that.

NBC's "Heroes," about super-hero mutants, and CBS's "Jericho," where a small town is cut off by an apparent nuclear attack, are the only other winners. While both serials seemingly present a scary future, they tell rudimentary stories that are easy to follow.

Comedies? Nobody's laughing.

Not one of nine big-network sitcoms has shown signs of life, even though five were filmed like little movies with no laugh tracks to appeal to a more sophisticated audience.

No one's crying too loudly that there's no breakout hit. There rarely is, though "Desperate Housewives" and "Grey's Anatomy" may have raised programmers' hopes in recent years.

But there's plenty of consternation that complicated shows with big-money pilots, including ABC's "The Nine" and "Six Degrees" and NBC's "Friday Night Lights" and "Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip," have failed to catch fire. It took only three episodes for CBS to cancel "Smith," a journey into the underworld whose first installment reportedly cost $7 million, nearly three times the price of a normal episode.

"Smith" was not doing much worse, ratings-wise, than those other shows, but CBS Entertainment President Nina Tassler was concerned that future scripts presented murky stories. "Confusion kills," she told the New York Times.

Is the corollary "simplicity rules"? It would seem so. NBC bought 10 new episodes of "1 vs. 100" after one showing. Nearly 13 million viewers squirmed to the edge of their seats in excitement over such puzzlers as "Which judge sits in the middle on American Idol?"

Airing on Friday, the second least-watched TV night, "1 vs. 100" sits higher in the overall Nielsen ratings than all but four new scripted series. They all play on nights when TV viewership is much higher.

The networks have picked up "Betty," "Heroes," "Shark" and "Jericho" for the entire season. All place second in the ratings in their time periods, and that's good enough in any year.

ABC also has ordered a full season of the family saga "Brothers & Sisters," despite lackluster performance in what should be a strong Sunday night slot, and NBC is putting its toe in the water on "Friday Night Lights."

Nine new scripts have been ordered, which will complete a season's worth of writing on the series, but there's no call for producing those shows just yet. The network wants to see how the multigenerational chronicle of life in a football-mad Texas town fares against something other than the feel-good juggernaut of "Dancing With the Stars."

Fox, too, has ordered more scripts for two of its three dramas, "Standoff" and "Justice," but their fates are by no means secure. Fox's third new drama with a cool, single-word title, "Vanished," seems particularly well-named.

Networks generally buy 13 episodes of a new drama, purchasing "the back nine," and what is considered a full season of 22 installments, if the show finds ratings success. There's plenty of time for these series to get a pickup, but so far "Friday Night Lights," "Six Degrees," "The Nine," "Studio 60" and ABC's "Men in Trees" are waiting for the good news.

Besides "Smith," "Runaway" on the CW has been canceled, and NBC has shipped "Kidnapped" to Saturday and announced its pending demise after 13 episodes.

So comedy is thriving, and some appear to be dying on the vine. ABC, overcome with promotion demands for its ambitious schedule, has postponed the premieres of three scheduled sitcoms.

If you're watching any of the six new ones that have actually made it to the airwaves on the big networks ("The Class," NBC's "30 Rock" and "20 Good Years," Fox's "Happy Hour" and "Til Death," and ABC's "Help Me Help You," you may not be watching much longer. A few new scripts have been commissioned for "The Class" and "Til Death," and NBC next month will tuck "30 Rock" into a more comfy slot Thursdays between the returning "Scrubs" and "ER."

And that's all the confidence the big networks have shown in comedy. The CW, however, has ordered a full season of the behind-the-scenes football shtick of "The Game" for its Monday night African-American sitcom block.

Reading ratings is a little like reading tea leaves. ABC's "Six Degrees" lands in the Top 40 on the rare Nielsen season first, not so bad among more than 100 broadcast series. But the show it follows, "Grey's Anatomy," is No. 1, and "Six Degrees" drops nearly 14 million "Anatomy" viewers.

Another problem, and one that sits high on the list of ratings concerns: Like most of the complex new dramas, "Six Degrees" loses viewers in its second half-hour. People watch for a while, go "Uhh," and change channels or head off to bed.

On the other hand, like most of the complex new dramas, it draws a higher percentage of the younger viewers, whom advertisers love, than does its more traditional competition. On Oct. 19, the day with the most current available data, "Shark" bested "Six Degrees" by more than 5 million viewers, but "Six Degrees" had 10 percent more viewers ages 18-34.

And series survival hinges not only on ratings. Touchstone Television, sister company to ABC under the Disney umbrella, produces "Six Degrees." With action, romance and lots of shots of New York City, it has been sold successfully in many foreign markets. So the money is still flowing in, even if it's from a different river.

Nonetheless, it's hard to give "Six Degrees" more than a 50 percent shot of surviving to the end of the season. Ditto "The Nine." With 2.5 million fewer viewers than either of them, ABC's "Men in Trees," the Anne Heche starrer, has a better chance because it lures its audience on the aforementioned dead Friday night.

NBC, reeling in the ratings in recent years, may be patient with ratings-challenged "Friday Night Lights" and "Studio 60." Both shows are critical darlings, and NBC Entertainment President Kevin Reilly has said he feels a deja vu with 1982-83.

That season, NBC was one step up from invisible despite the introduction of "Family Ties," "St. Elsewhere" and "Cheers," which wound up last among all shows in the ratings. But the network stuck with those well-reviewed series, and the next year, they started to find some popular success.

Things, apparently, weren't a whole lot different in the audience than they are today. Two new series premiered in 1983 and 84 that drew droves of viewers to NBC and became the Peacock's top-rated shows. Some folks stayed to sample the quality fare.

The two chartbusters: Mr. T's cartoon-like exploits-a-thon, "The A-Team," and TV's "Bloopers & Practical Jokes."

While many of the fall's new television shows are failing to gain viewers ABC's "Ugly Betty" is gaining fans and critic appeal alike.

There is no harm in telling the truth

Jasmine Monteiro

I'm starting to believe that people want to be lied to. You may not admit it, but you do. Although you claim you want the truth, in all reality, you can't handle it. Well, there are some people who can. Therefore, I can appreciate someone that knows how to manage his or her emotions appropriately.

I know what you're thinking. No, that's not me, I can handle it. But the truth is, many times we ask someone a question, with an expectation behind it. It seems that we do this more frequently with someone we are interested in, it's like our way of flirting.

Also, we assume that if they really liked us too, they would tell us what we want to hear. For example, have you ever asked someone, "Do you miss me?" Yes, I know you have. And have you ever expected them to say no? Or even thought about what you would do or say if they did?

You don't, because the fact of the matter is, we're not really asking them if they miss us, we are telling them. We are backing them into a corner and putting them in a situation where it would be awkward to say anything other than the obvious, which is, "Yes, of course I do." While hearing what you want to hear seems plausible, I'm into a more radical idea — telling it like it is.

It's true that we're all only humans and we're bound to do things for attention, but there are better ways to go about it. Like some girls, for instance, who ask the infamous, "Do I look bad (or fat) in this?"

I can't imagine how many girls really want to know the answer to that. If you're seeing a guy, I'm sure he doesn't always care about what you look like, and therefore would rather not make that decision.

But, if you really want to know, he should be able to tell you. Let's keep the honesty at a respectable level, there is no need to be brutal. I understand that we're constantly looking for ways to fish for compliments. Everyone enjoys an ego booster. However, you should be more confident in your questions like, "How do I look?" Chances are, if you think you look good, so will he. By putting a negative connotation in your questions, you're making yourself sound needy and insecure.

Becoming comfortable with someone telling you what you want to hear can only lead to bigger issues of trust. Yeah, sure, it starts with petty things like, "Do you miss me?" and "Do I look fat?" But it can only get worse from there. It gives it an opportunity to escalate to things like "Do you love me?" or "Will you marry me?"

Well, I would hope that the latter would never really happen, but I'll use it as an extreme example, for the sake of argument. He will become just as comfortable telling you what you're expecting, as you are. When the truth finally comes out, his argument will be, "What was I supposed to say?"

You're not being fair to yourself, or to the other person, by getting used to everything being sugar-coated. This doesn't mean you're supposed to go around being blunt and telling people what's on your mind. Because lets face it, sometimes, your opinion doesn't really matter. But if someone asks you for it, you have every right to give it. Just as equally, the other person has the right to be disappointed, but they should appreciate your honesty nonetheless.

When I ask a question, I prepare myself for whatever the answer could be. If it's something important, it's crucial to take the time to realize what you are, or aren't, ready for. All possible answers should be carefully taken into consideration.

I think the important thing to realize is that the truth doesn't always have to be hurtful. Being able to communicate with someone is half the battle. Then you start to realize what's appropriate, and what's not. Hearing what you want to hear (when it is actually the truth) becomes that much more meaningful.

The Disco Biscuits set to return to Noho

BY LAUREN MOSSETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Disco Biscuits will play at the Calvin Theatre Friday, Nov. 3, continuing what JamBase.com calls a "heady success."

The band began their legacy at the University of Pennsylvania in the mid-90s and have grown up together since that time.

"I think there was the window in the band where we all sort of woke up and realized that we were no longer college students, that we've been a rock band for a number of years," wrote lead singer/songwriter Jon "The Barber" Gutwillig in the band's bio on JamBase. "It just sort of sneaks up on you."

According to Jambase, this is how they lost their drummer, Sam Altman, who realized at this point that he wanted to do other things with his life. Their bassist, Marc Brownstein, had already temporarily removed himself from The Disco Biscuits, but couldn't keep himself away and rejoined.

After holding a "drum-off" last November, Bisco found a replacement drummer, Allen Aucoin. Aucoin, originally a Harley Davidson salesmen, left his old motorcycle-selling days behind and readied himself for the new adventures that were yet to come when he began his new career in the band.

The four-member band has released 11 albums since its start on the jam bands circuit. "Senor Boombox," released in 2002, was voted "Best Studio Record" by Relix magazine and made it to the Top 10 Jam Band records of all time in Guitar Player.

During their performance in Boston this past Halloween, they graced their fans with amazing covers like Pink Floyd's "In The Flesh" and the Rolling Stones' "You Can't Always Get What You Want."

"There's a color behind the music depending on what key, you put it in and what the lyrics are and how they're sung. Those are the ways I can decide if a line is working with another line, it depends on the color of a song. Some songs are very dull and sort of sad and others are bright and really happy," said Gutwillig during an interview with Rob Turner of JamBase.

"Mr. Don" is green and "Mindless Dribble" is red. Me and Sammy [Altman] had this test because I was telling him this color theory and I usually get blown off as a crazy person in this type of situation, but he went through seven songs and we had the same colors for them, with different hue variations. I don't think there's a single song in our repertoire that every single member hasn't had creative input in," Gutwillig said.

Their latest release, "Rocket 3," is the entire third set from their 2004 New Years Eve performance in New York City with fan favorites like "Hope" and "Ting Legs."

They also produced "The Wind at Four to Fly," which was released this year. The album is one of their double-CD live sets. One disc consists of renowned songs like "Caterpillar," "Morph Dusseldorf," and "Sweating Bullets," and the second disc includes "Story of the World" and "Hasis for a day."

The Disco Biscuits also offer a variety of their studio records that have Altman's drumming expertise incorporated into the mix.

To find out more about the band, visit their official Web site at www.discobiscuits.com and browse through the downloads.

The show starts at 8 p.m. Tickets are $24 in advance and $27 at the door. The Calvin is right around the corner from Fitzwilly's and is not general admission.

An interview Podcast will be featured on www.dailycollegian.com after their show, so make sure to check it out.

The Disco Biscuits return to Massachusetts after playing a Halloween show in Boston. The band has recently released a new album.

Award winning author comes to UMass

MATTHEW CADWALLADER BE CULTURE CONTRIBUTOR

World renowned writer and translator Lydia Davis will be making an appearance on campus today as part of the MFA program's Visiting Writers Series.

Author Lydia is known for her unique prose and short stories.

The reading is open to the public and will take place at Memorial Hall, located at 143 Hicks Way. The event will start at 8 p.m. and admission is free.

Davis earned much of her reputation not just from her novel, "The End of the Story," but also for her short stories in collections such as "Break It Down," "Almost No Memory" and, most recently, "Samuel Johnson is Indignant."

"We're thrilled to have her for this fall," said Lisa Olstein, associate director of the MFA Program Poets and Writers and the Juniper Initiative. "She is a master of the short story and the novel ... her work is very important to other artists as well as readers."

Davis' short story writing is considered experimental as it forgoes the literary norms of plot, character development and drama in place of strong narrative in short form. Instead of focusing on normal details, she writes about the things people tend not to pay attention to, the subtleties of life that get lost somewhere in translation.

Her fans take delight in her ability to make every word count in stories that can sometimes be as short as a couple of lines.

Over her career, Davis has been the recipient of numerous awards, including the Whiting Writer's Award, a Guggenheim fellowship and the Lannan Literary Award. In 2003, she was awarded a fellowship by the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation for her "literary miniatures."

In giving out the award, the Foundation asserted that "by enlarging both experiences and the nuances of plain language, Davis grants readers a glimpse of life's previously invisible details, revealing new sources of philosophical insight and beauty."

According to the Foundation's Web site, the $500,000 "no strings attached" award is given out every year "to talented individuals who have shown extraordinary originality and dedication in their creative pursuits and a marked capacity for self-direction."

Apart from her original writing, Davis is also a celebrated French translator and has been named Chevalier of the Order of Arts and Letters by the French government for her English translations of pieces by Maurice Blanchot, Pierre Jean Jouve, Francoise Giroud and others. Recently, her translation of Marcel Proust's "Swann's Way" was published to great critical acclaim.

The Visiting Writers Series has been an ongoing program sponsored by the MFA Program for Poets and Writers and the Juniper Initiative, bringing both established and up-and-coming writers to the University for 40 years. It is made possible by support from the English department, the University of Massachusetts Amherst Arts Council, the Alumni Association, Vice Provost for Research and the dean of Humanities and Fine Arts.

Boyd discusses new book

By Connie Ogle
Miami Herald Newspapers

William Boyd has to laugh at what he's hearing about his 10th novel. "It is taking all prizes for being the fastest read of my books," he says, chuckling, from his New York hotel room. "People tell me, 'I read it in six hours.' I say, 'Go back and read it again. There's more to it.'"

Boyd, 54, is joking about "Restless" (Bloomsbury, $24.95), but it's no surprise readers are propelled through its fascinating pages. Set in the 1970s and World War II and told through two compelling narratives, the espionage thriller explores a young woman's discovery that her mother was a British spy.

Boyd, who won the Whitbread Award for his first novel, "A Good Man in Africa," is known as something of a literary trickster. In 1998 he unleashed "Nat Tate: An American Artist 1928-1960," a fictional homage to an artist that fooled art and literary critics alike. It helped that his co-conspirators included Gore Vidal, David Bowie and Picasso biographer John Richardson, who spoke about Tate's contact with Picasso. Tate even makes an appearance in Boyd's novel-as-journal "Any Human Heart," which features cover art attributed to the nonexistent artist.

"Restless," though, is based on a real, little-known British "campaign of persuasion" to lure the United States into World War II. The British Security Coordination (BSC), a vast covert operations organization operating pre-Pearl Harbor from Rockefeller Center, was entrusted with feeding propaganda to U.S. news media about Nazi plans in hopes of changing public opinion against joining the war.

"There were so many stories," Boyd muses. "They very successfully penetrated the news media. But would it have worked? Would American public opinion have changed in 1943? In a way the British got off the hook with Pearl Harbor and, 48 hours later, by Hitler's declaration of war against the U.S. ... Another irony for the British is that the man who saved their bacon was the mad dictator they were fighting."

Question: How did you get the idea to write about this agency?

Answer: The subject has been brushed very far under the carpet. I stumbled across it researching a film about the relationship between Winston Churchill and FDR. When I found it the novelist in me said: "Bingo." I came across reference to dirty tricks and dug a bit and discovered there'd been this massive operation. For a novelist these secret histories are a gift. You think, "Now I know where my young woman spy can go spying." It's fresh and different; nobody's ever heard of it in England for sure. Maybe they knew in Canada, they were implicated. The man who set up BSC was Canadian, ... but I think I'm right in saying this is the first novel that dealt with the subject in some detail. It was a big operation and very covert, and after Pearl Harbor and World War II nobody spoke about it again. I guess because it was kind of embarrassing.

Q: Because, ironically, Pearl Harbor did what the BSC may not have accomplished?

A: Yes. When you strip away the myths of World War II — which have accumulated thickly — and look at reality, a different picture emerges. One of the things "Restless" does is force us to look again at something we think is carved in stone. It wasn't like that at all. It was a far more random chance-driven set of situations. I think the whole postwar special relationship between the U.S. and the U.K. is a Churchillian myth. Churchill wrote the history of World War II because FDR died, and Churchill reinvented the story to a certain extent. It was far more complex and more difficult than Churchill's story of the English-speaking nations joining to fight a common enemy.

Q: We tend to think of World War II London in a romantic light, don't we?

A: TV and movies have done that for us. I'm sure it wasn't that great a time to be living there, even as a civilian. My mother was a teenage girl at the time, and the life she led was quite constrained, with blackouts and rationing. There's nothing very glamorous about that. It's quite good to revisit these times to strip away a few veils.

Q: Why did you want your protagonist to be a woman?

A: It's liberating to change sex for a novel. But another reason is that I was aware I was entering a genre with a tradition that you could argue is a masculine tradition. I wanted to make the story different. When I thought of writing about a spy I asked myself, "What would it be like if you found one of your parents was a spy, that everything you knew about them was a fabrication?" It seemed much more interesting for a daughter to discover her mother was a spy.

Q: You've written short stories, essays and screenplays, yet you always return to the novel. Why?

A: The thing about the novel is you do have total and absolute freedom. As an artist that's incredibly alluring; to be master of your own destiny, the ultimate one-man band. ... There's no comparison in terms of the pleasures of creation. I love the movies, and I love working in them but creatively it's a world of compromise. Working in other worlds — writing stage plays or plays for radio or a TV series — you suddenly realize that all the people writing those forms are in a way hindered or constrained. You've left your world of total freedom. However much fun it is, you're always incredibly pleased to retreat to your solitary study.

Witherspoon and Phillippe file for divorce after counseling fails

By Michelle Caruso
New York Daily News

LOS ANGELES — America's sweetheart Reese Witherspoon and husband Ryan Phillippe have called it quits after seven years of marriage, their reps said Monday.

"We are saddened to announce that Reese and Ryan have decided to formally separate. They remain committed to their family," the couple's representatives said in a statement.

The "Legally Blonde" star, 30, and the hunky "Crash" actor, 32, have two children, Ava, 7, and Deacon, 3. They married in 1999 after co-starring in the teen thriller "Cruel Intentions," but they never worked together onscreen again.

One of Hollywood's highest-paid actresses, Witherspoon commands $15 million a picture and won an Oscar for "Walk the Line." Phillippe's paychecks are far slimmer, hovering in the $2 million-a-picture range, according to industry reports.

The split comes just weeks after a celebrity lensman spotted the glam couple bickering at the New York premiere of "Flags of Our Fathers" the Clint Eastwood-directed film about the World War II heroes who planted the American flag at Iwo Jima, in which Phillippe stars.

And it follows months of rumors and magazine reports that their marriage was on the rocks, all of which were repeatedly denied.

"They are completely happy, as everyone saw on the Oscars broadcast," a rep declared last March. But witnesses said the couple avoided each other like the plague at a Vanity Fair-hosted bash just hours after Witherspoon won gold for her portrayal of June Carter Cash in the Johnny Cash biopic.

"He sat by himself looking pretty resentful," a partygoer told Life & Style magazine.

Witherspoon, who met the wavy-haired "Gosford Park" star at her 21st birthday party, had confessed marriage wasn't a picnic. "Marriage is hard," she told Vanity Fair in 2004. "[It's] not about expecting someone to make you happy every day or to complete your life."

Phillippe admitted the couple were in marriage counseling in 2002. "The biggest mistake is not doing that, ignoring it and have the marriage fall apart because of laziness," he told the New York Daily News.

Therapy obviously didn't work. More hints of disenchantment appeared in Phillippe's recent chat with Interview magazine when he twice bemoaned being away from his kids while filming, but didn't pine for his wife.

Divorce papers had not been filed Monday, but Witherspoon has reportedly consulted Hollywood heavy hitter Robert Kaufman, who represented Jennifer Aniston, Roseanne and Lisa Marie Presley in their splits, FMZ.com reported.

Over the past seven years Witherspoon has gone from teen star to Oscar winner while Phillippe has continued to play minor roles.

New Who album falls short of expectations

By Brian McCollum
Detroit Free Press

You can't really talk about the Who in 2006 without talking about semantics. Is this Who really the Who? With Pete Townshend and Roger Daltrey as sole survivors, what exactly is in a name, anyway?

Townshend has dismissed the issue: "This is not the old Who. We never said it would be." Fair enough. But it is the Who name, and "Endless Wire" is the first album released under it since 1982's "It's Hard," a limp effort that raised questions about the group's vitality before an ongoing parade of reunion tours raised even more.

Call it a mixed success for classic-rock elders Townshend and Daltrey. The new album is neither a daring innovation nor a heavy-handed retread. It falls somewhere in between, a record at times quiet and contemplative as it seeks to make sense of itself. "Endless Wire" is really a two-part work: nine cuts that make up the album proper and a mini rock opera titled "Wire & Glass" made up of 10 compact songs.

Townshend, the disc's songwriter-producer and all-around governing body winks at his audience early in "With Its Pitter Patter," synthesizer sequence ("Fragments" quite consciously recalls 1971's "Baba O'Riley," one of a handful of nods to classic Who. But the song also introduces the new characters, theoretical Zak Starkey and bassist Pino Palladino, who contribute effective but unobtrusive support throughout.

Lyrically, Townshend is in a familiar mode: his words occasionally biting, more often opaque. He jabs at authority amid his ongoing search of spirituality and sell as on the album's best cut, "The Man in the Purple Dress." As ever, Townshend is an intriguing if frustrating study in contradiction, blasting away at the pretensions of others while yielding to his own high-minded artistic tendencies throughout "Endless Wire."

The 61-year-old guitarist is one of rock's all-time great rhythm players, and with his Gibson strapped on, he provides electric sizzle on such rockers as "It's Not Enough," "Sound Round" and "Pick Up the Peace." The guitar work is typical Townshend, at times classic Townshend: economical, virile, crisp. He provides lovely acoustic work on "God Speaks of Marty Robbins" and "You Stand By Me," among the gentlest tunes he's penned and elsewhere is musically playful, pulling out a mandolin for "Two Thousand Years" and a Tom Waits-style voice for "In the Ether."

Daltrey's performance is a mixed bag. There are moments of genuine vocal vigor, notably the brawny yowling on such cuts as "Mike Post Theme" and "It's Not Enough," which ably summon the full-bodied shout he molded for himself in the early '70s. But too often, he clumsily forces the drama, plagued by slippery pitch as he applies a melodramatic vibrato to his notes.

"Endless Wire," whose interesting moments are too scattered to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the best of the Who's albums. But it's not the liability it could have been to a legacy that has already taken more than its fair share of hits.

'Endless Wire' is The Who's first album in 24 years. Like the bands previous albums 'Tommy' and 'Who's Next' the album has a theme.

O.C. goes to college and faces struggles

Following the third season of the show fans slowly started to stop watching the show. Fox has since cut the season count to 18.

By Charlie McCollum
San Jose Mercury News

It wasn't that long ago when you couldn't open an entertainment or teen magazine without seeing some reference to "The OC." The show cut a wide swath through American popular culture, setting fashion trends, creating buzzwords and kick-starting the careers of such fringe bands as Death Cab for Cutie.

But pop culture can be cruel. After just a bit, and you can find yourself sliding toward the pit of obscurity, where the question to end all questions "Whatever happened to ...?" awaits.

As it begins its fourth season Thursday night (at 9, Fox), "The OC" hasn't totally fallen into the hole of oblivion, but it's clinging to the edge by its fingernails. Last season, its audience deserted it in droves. The critics have bailed on it. The arbiters of cool have dismissed it. Fox has cut the number of episodes this season from the usual 22 to 16.

And did I mention that the network has left it in its 9 p.m. Thursday time period where ABC's "Grey's Anatomy" will eat its lunch?

All of a sudden, the decision of star Mischa Barton to bail on the series, after playing the troubled and troublesome Marissa Cooper for three seasons, is starting to look like a pretty smart career move. Of course, Barton's career since her last appearance on the show seems to consist of hanging out with Nicole Richie and going to every show during New York's Fashion Week, but that's another story.

There's more than a bit of irony in a line from one of this season's early episodes, when Sandy and Kirsten Cohen (Peter Gallagher and Kelly Rowan) have to launch yet another mission to save one of the teens. "How much longer do we keep doing this," whines Kirsten to Peter, "rescuing them every time they're in trouble?"

The truly sad thing about "The OC" is how much it has lost its sense of self-aware humor.

The first few episodes this season notably tonight's opener are relentlessly grim and glum. In one particularly ludicrous story line, Ryan Atwood (Benjamin McKenzie, who really can act when given the chance) tries to get over Marissa's death by dropping out of college, living in the back room of a bar and getting the snot beaten out of him in a fight club.

Now, admittedly, the series always has been near-operatic in its brooding melodrama, but zippy one-liners and sharp verbal exchanges used to keep things from getting too dreary. So you know the show is in trouble this season when teen queen Summer Roberts (Rachel Bilson) tells main squeeze Seth Cohen (Adam Brody) that after a few months in college, "I don't do sarcasm anymore. I'm post-ironic."

There are still some things to like about the show. Brody can still be funny although, more and more, he looks like he's phoning in his performance. On sheer charm, Bilson probably will survive the series' slide. Gallagher and Rowan are seasoned pros who do what they can with their dialogue. And Autumn Reeser who plays Taylor Townsend, the new Summer at Harbor High has at least some of the sparkle of the early "OC."

But that isn't enough to get the series' one-time fans to forgo McDreamy and McSteamy over on "Grey's Anatomy." What we're seeing with this season of "The OC" are the last whimpers of a show whose time has come and gone.

Defense to be deciding factor

Minutemen are riding the momentum of a six-game winning streak that dates back to Sept. 16.

The all-time record between the two schools stands at 39-25-3 in favor of the Maroon and White. But away teams have won the past two meetings with UNH's victory last season and the Minutemen winning 38-21 in Cowell Stadium during the 2004 campaign.

UMass has faced just one other ranked opponent this season in the form of No. 22 Towson on Oct. 14. The Minutemen rose to the occasion, downing the Tigers 35-0.

Advantages in some areas are hard to assign entering this game. Both teams have dominant offenses. The pair ranks one-two in scoring and total offense in the A-10. UNH holds the edge in scoring offense (37.4 to 32.2 per game) while UMass gains more total yards (414.5 to 410.5 per game).

The disparity lies with the defenses. UMass has been its overpowering self, while UNH's defenders have gotten the Wildcats into a number of shootouts this season.

"To sit there and just rely on one side of the ball, I don't care what anybody says, it's going to come back and bite you in the butt," Brown said. "It's just going to get you. You strive for balance in your football team. You want to have quality in all three phases, if you don't, I don't know if you're a championship football caliber team."

UNH has been in three games this season where the teams combined for at least 65 points. It happened on Sept. 30 at Delaware, Oct. 14 against James Madison and two weeks ago in overtime at Northeastern. UNH is 1-2 in those games — losing to JMU and NU, 42-23 and 36-35 respectively.

There's no question that UMass' offense is capable of keeping up in a shootout. But will its defense allow a high-scoring affair to take place? The highest point total the Minutemen have allowed this season is 21. It happened in their 21-20 loss to Navy and their 31-21 win over Villanova.

"The reality is I think we can play whatever game we want to play," Brown said.

According to the coach, that doesn't mean the UNH defense can't play. He conceded that the offense has stolen some of the spotlight away.

"Last year [UNH] created 41 turnovers, I didn't hear anybody talk about that, this year they held Northwestern to 17 points, I didn't hear much talked about that, [they] held Richmond to 17 and they just won a football game 10-6. But I don't hear much about their defense," he said.

But it's tough to not focus on the numbers quarterback Ricky Santos and company have compiled. Their points and yardage averages speak for themselves and the 10 points they used to get by Hofstra was the first time this season that the Wildcats scored under 23 points.

"Obviously we're just looking at what they do, and trying to take the things that we perceive is our strengths and match them against what we perceive as their weaknesses," Brown explained. "At the same time you have to have to some patience. You still have to defend the balance a little bit."

Santos is a big part of that. With 1,871 yards passing and 262 rushing, he's arguably the most versatile player in the A-10. This week Brown assigned reserve quarterback Joe Sanford the role of mirroring Santos.

"He's a good replica," Brown said about Sanford. "He's athletic as hell. He can play safety and do whatever we want him to do."

Sanford has shown this in the special teams playing time he's had this season.

Senior wideout Brandon London leads UMass in receiving with 395 yards on 24 catches. He has a team-high seven touchdown receptions.

Junior J.J. Moore is second on UMass in receiving with 326 yards on 21 catches. He averages 40.8 yards per game and has two touchdown receptions.

Seniors get final shot at UNH

Senior running back Steve Baylark leads the Atlantic 10 with 1,044 rushing yards and eight rushing touchdowns in 2006. Baylark is one of the seniors that UMass coach Don Brown looks at to keep his team focused this weekend.

discrediting their previous opponents, agreed that the Wildcats' offense is the most prodigious they've seen all season.

"We've been waiting for an opportunity like this, where a team is actually going to throw the ball 30 or 40 times down the field," safety James Ihedigbo said. "We were anticipating the match-up with Towson but they didn't have their quarterback so they had to change the game plan.

"This game we've been really waiting for a team that's going to be like, 'OK, we know you're going to pressure us. But we are going to hang in there and throw the ball 30 or 40 times down the field.'" Ihedigbo added. "For the three seniors in the secondary, we've been waiting for this opportunity."

Brown's one-game-at-a-time policy has worked. He maintains the only game that matters is the next one. For the most part, he's right. But UMass players will always anticipate a late-season matchup against UNH with great angst and excitement, especially after the Wildcats entered McGuirk last season and escaped with a six-point victory.

"You kind of have to keep the thing in perspective a little bit," Brown deadpanned. "This is a big game for us. It's a big game because it's a big game. There are three games in November. It's another entity along the way. It's a circle [on the calendar] and it's our last road game. We'd like to finish off the regular season with another win on the road."

Brown has seniors all over the field. There is no replacement for upperclassmen with character Steve Baylark, Ihedigbo, Brandon Smith and Tracy Belton are all seniors. They have won on the road before and have played in hostile environments. They all have one more chance to take down the Wildcats. For the rest of the team, the opportunity to beat a conference rival comes just once a year. They want to make the most of the 60 minutes.

"To tell you the truth, we want to win very badly," Barris said. "All of these games, we know, if we win out the season then we get to play here for the playoffs. You take it one game at a time. This is going to be on TV so everyone is going to be bringing out their "A" games.

"It's definitely a big game that we want to win," he added. "We want a shutout. That's what we want. We want a shutout."

UMass wideout Brandon London, perhaps the most outspoken of his teammates, spoke the party line.

"They're not a better team than us, so we're not looking at it like we're the underdog," he said. "This is just another game on our schedule to get better and to get closer to reaching our ultimate goal. I haven't really known anything about them for the past two years. It's just another game. Everybody else is making a bigger hype out of it. It's just another team in our way.

David Ball, Linkous-Thomas-Hepburn at wide receiver caught four touchdown passes in last year's meeting at McGuirk. London didn't like the foreigner shining on his turf.

"I kind of want to show [Ball] up because the last two years he kind of got me, especially with the four-touchdown thing last year," London said. "I talked to him when we met track together, when we were up there in New Hampshire. We had kind of been talking about the matchup that is about to come up.

"All you do is walk around campus and you get people saying, 'What are you playing, UNH? What's the UNH game?' You hear about them in the paper all the time. ... Santos like Santos that. It's good that they finally are here because we can continue on doing what we do. I can't wait."

Brown knows that the success of his team can keep his team focused this weekend.

"You can have veterans that can be a distraction. It helps to have players that are leaders that can minimize distraction. Some veterans are a part of his class. That's just the way it is. But when you have three guys, they've been to it, they're grounded, they're focused.

"It certainly allows the other guys to have the same type of energy and focus. When you look at your football team, you try to develop along the year. I still trust factor. I trust our guys. I think we're ready to play in a game like this."

We'll find out on Saturday.

Going back to the rivalry's past

of rankings, records and playoff chances, the Minutemen and the Wildcats are going to do battle.

OK, now let's go back in time:

2005: Before last season's matchup, hype said Ricky Santos and David Ball would be the stars. And while the Minutemen had the best defense in the nation, the duo sliced and diced their way to four TDs and a 34-28 victory. The win jolted UNH's season, and began a slide for UMass. Weeks following this contest, the Minutemen were not mentioned on selection day, and the Wildcats were the No. 1 seed. But there were bright spots in the loss. Then-redshirt freshman Liam Coen showed flashes of brilliance in just his sixth start as a college football player. Coen tallied up 401 passing yards and two touchdowns (2nd in UMass history). The Minutemen went into that contest looking for blood. Rankings-wise, it was almost a flip-flop of this season — No. 4 UNH vs. No. 7 UMass.

2004: Speaking of rankings, UMass was not even in the top 25 when it last visited Durham. Two years ago, the Minutemen were 2-5 overall, and 1-3 in the A-10. The Wildcats were 4-1. They were riding high with Santos in his first season at the helm, and had gained a No. 7 national ranking. It seemed like a no-brainer. But then tailback Steve Baylark got the ball handed to him 43 times. And then he gained 192 yards and three trips to the end zone as UMass won the upset, 38-21. It was also a glimpse into the future as Ball caught 15 footballs for 145 yards and Minuteman leading receiver Brandon London had seven for 136.

2003: This season's contest was also owned by UMass, but this time, it was expected. The Minutemen were 3-1 and lossless in the A-10. UNH on the other hand had better seasons to come. The Wildcats were 2-3 and winless in the conference. Ball had a TD against the Minutemen in this game as well ... he was a freshman then, and I think he had several more during the following few seasons (Jerry Rice record reference).

1998 (super flashback): Of course, this year messes up the pattern, but it's recent enough to bring up. It was the Minutemen's National Championship season. They had a 6-2 overall record, and were 3-1 going into the game. A loss against the Wildcats would have put UMass in a tight spot for the playoffs. And while future NFL player Jerry Azumah rushed for a whopping 241 yards on 33 carries for UNH, the Minutemen pulled off the win — by one point. After the 27-26 win, the rest was history.

Back to 2006 again. And back to the unanswered questions for Saturday's matchup. Can UMass make it three in a row at Cowell Stadium? Can David Ball score a touchdown in every game he has played against the Minutemen? Will UMass increase its chances to earn a home playoff game?

Let's go into the future.

McCutcheon to go in different direction to her — and most that don the Maroon and White.

"No, not at all," Sanders declared when asked if Shea's departure will hinder any future relationship she has with UMass. "The program means more to me than just one coach."

Sanders declined comment when asked if any of the blame for Shea's termination belongs on the shoulders of the players — she did the same when asked to describe her relationship with the coach.

The most biting insights came from the mouth of Shea, who collected her 100th win with the program earlier this year. The former coach wasn't completely shocked to hear the news, but after 10 years coaching her alma mater, the finality of it all left Shea distraught.

"I didn't expect it," Shea said. "But it's something that I knew was a possibility. That's the nature of the job. You can have great years, where the wins come easy, but you can have years where you struggle. As a coach, you know going into the season what your expectations are. When you don't meet those expectations, that's when the tough decisions need to be made. [McCutcheon] decided that he needed to do what, in his eyes, was best for the [athletic] department and the program."

Shea's time at UMass can by no means be categorized as a failure. But by the same token, wins and losses are really all that matters to those who make the final decisions. The typical things that hamper success, such as a lack of preparation or a lack of effort, were not the undoing of the 2006 Minutewomen. Injuries, most notably sophomore midfielder Erin Parker, and player regression made life miserable for the coaching staff and the players that performed up to par.

"We had some very key injuries that set us back, but I'm the head coach, I'm the leader of the program," an emotional Shea said. "It's all about wins and losses, and the wins didn't come. So, the blame falls on me. That's the nature of it but when you sign on to be a head coach, that's what you sign up to do. I have to take the consequences, not only the consequences but the responsibility."

McCutcheon's decision, in no way, changes the feelings Shea has for the University.

"I love UMass," Shea said. "I have to support it. UMass has been good to me."

Looking back on her time at the helm of the program, Shea feels good about the role she played in the lives of those that she coached.

"I feel really good about what we've done," Shea said. "The people that have graduated from here, the places that they're going and the things they have done are success enough."

The direction of the Massachusetts field hockey program is as unclear as ever. McCutcheon will conduct a national search for the next leader of the program. He declined to name any candidates he has in mind.

UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon announced on Wednesday that the contract of field hockey coach Patty Shea would not be renewed. Shea went 104-113 in 10 years at UMass.

Atlantic 10 Tournament begins with Richmond as top seed

By Michael Chandler
Collegian Staff

A-10 Field Hockey

The No. 17 Richmond Spiders (7-0, 14-4 Atlantic 10) stayed perfect throughout conference play for the fifth straight year by beating Saint Louis 5-0 over the weekend, guaranteeing it the top seed in this year's A-10 Championship.

The young stars shined for Richmond in their final regular season game. Freshman forward Lindsey Conrad scored a hat trick in the team's 5-0 rout, while goalkeepers Jackt Raithel and Becca Weaver, preserved the shutout. Conrad earned her fifth Rookie of the Week honor in the victory. Richmond outperformed the Billikens offensively with a 16-3 shot advantage in the first half, and a 15-7 advantage in the second half.

Richmond will defend its four consecutive Atlantic 10 titles beginning this Friday at home. The Lady Spiders, who now boast a remarkable 40-game conference winning streak dating back to 2001, will now try to beat fourth-seeded Temple in the first round of the postseason. In their one matchup this season, the Spiders defeated the Owls 2-1 in a hard fought overtime win.

Rams trample Minutewomen

With a 1-0 victory over Massachusetts, Rhode Island propelled itself into the A-10 finals. With the win, the Rams wedged themselves into a three-way tie for second place in the conference with a 4-3 record. All three teams involved in the tie will be traveling to Richmond for the postseason.

The game, which both teams came into needing a win to extend its season, saw early domination from UMass. The Minutewomen stormed out to a 22-3 shot advantage, and an 8-0 advantage in penalty corners in the first half. However, Rhode Island junior goalkeeper M.J. Britt stood firmly and did not allow any of the shots to score.

In the second half, freshman midfielder Jill Powers saved the day and the season, scoring with 20:51 remaining and putting the Rams on top for the remainder of the game. Powers earned her first Rookie of the Week award for her season-extending score.

The Rams enter the postseason seeded third and will face Saint Joseph's. In their only meeting this season, Rhode Island fell to St. Joe's 1-0.

Hawks take flight over Owls

Beating Temple in a dramatic 2-1 overtime win clinched a playoff spot for Saint Joseph's. Senior forward Lauren Luft, recipient of the final A-10 Player of the Week award, clinched the game with the winning goal. After a scoreless first half, sophomore forward Marisa Pizzi opened the scoring with a penalty-corner goal. Temple tied the score and put the game into overtime, where Luft ended the game with her ninth goal of the season.

The Hawks will now travel to Virginia to play Rhode Island in the first round of the A-10 Championship. Despite being in a three-way tie at a 4-3 mark, St. Joe's received the second seed because of its 2-0 record against Temple and Rhode Island. This will be the 11th time the team has extended its season and vied for the championship. Owls stay relaxed despite loss.

Temple lost to St. Joe's over the weekend, but will easily forget the game as the team already clinched a postseason berth. Junior midfielder Alli Lokey scored her career-high 10th goal of the season in the 2-1 loss.

Temple will be put to the test on Saturday when it attempts to end the Spider's 40-game conference winning streak at Richmond. Sophomore goalkeeper Erin Hanshue will be relied on heavily to continue her dazzling play in net in order to give her subpar offense a chance to outscore Richmond's powerhouses in junior forward Shannon Taylor, freshman midfielder Lindsey Conrad, and many other weapons. In their matchup this year, Richmond defeated the Owls 2-1.

Explorers trying to find ways to win

La Salle ended its season in victory, clinching a 3-2 win over West Chester, but came up a game short of postseason play.

The Explorers' final game ended emotionally, with the win coming in the form of a shootout. After one round where both teams had three players score, a second round was required to decide the game. Freshman defender Caitlyn Conk ended the game with a goal. The Explorers outshot the Golden Rams 21-8 for the contest and earned a 6-5 advantage in penalty corners.

Minutewomen fail to capitalize

UMass' season came to a quiet close with a loss in a game where the winner moved on to play in the A-10 Tournament.

The Maroon and White flailed early in the season, compiling a 1-3 conference record in its first four games. A second chance emerged, however, when the Minutewomen took their novelty wins against La Salle and West Chester — the teams with the worst records in the conference at the time — in one weekend. The wins set up a final conference game with Rhode Island with playoff implications. A non-conference loss to the 1-15 University of New Hampshire in which the UMass defense gave up three goals to freshman forward Megan Shea — who only had one score all season — did not bode well for the Minutewomen.

The game against Rhode Island did not go much better. UMass came out strong, holding a 27-5 shot advantage and nearly cornering the market on penalty corners (11-1), but failed to put the ball past Rhode Island goalkeeper Britt. In the second half, it was another freshman who did the Minutewomen in. This time freshman midfielder Jill Powers scored the game's only goal, and ended the UMass season.

Billikens finish season

Despite tying for third with a 3-4 record in the conference, Saint Louis did not earn a spot in postseason play. The Billikens achieved their second seven-win season in as many years, a feat they have not accomplished since 1990-91.

Senior forward Angela Lombardo finished her season as the third person in her family to play for the Saint Louis Billikens. Lombardo played 71 games in her four-year career as a Billiken and finished the season with one goal and one assist. Also ending her career was senior defender Michelle Sinclair.

Golden Rams lose shootout

In a game symbolic of its pitiful season, West Chester lost a 3-2 shootout to La Salle, concluding the Golden Rams' 0-7 season in the A-10.

West Chester won two games this season, once to UMBC and once to Colgate. The Golden Rams hope to improve their luck and performance next season. They were the only team in the conference to have fewer than three wins.

The No. 17 Richmond Spiders enter the Atlantic 10 tournament having posted a perfect conference record (7-0) for the fifth straight year. The Spiders are the top seed in this year's A-10 tournament.

Shootout in Durham

"You're going to have to hit me harder than that to keep me out of this game." –Ricky Santos to James Ihedigbo in last year's game vs. UNH

UNH quarterback Ricky Santos has thrown for 1,871 yards and has a passer rating of 156 this season. He has thrown 19 touchdown passes and three interceptions, and averages 224 passing yards per game.

UMass quarterback Liam Coen has thrown for 1,662 yards and has a passer rating of 183 this year. He has thrown 15 touchdown passes and four interceptions, and averages 208 passing yards per contest.

High-powered offenses collide

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

All the talk surrounding the Massachusetts football them this season about not looking ahead is directly related to this Saturday's game. UMass goes into Cowell Stadium to square off against New Hampshire this weekend in the Atlantic 10 game of the year.

This game has been highly anticipated since UNH knocked off UMass 38-24 last season in Amherst.

The Minutemen (7-1, 5-0 A-10) enter as the No. 3 team in Division I-AA. Despite its recent slide, UNH also carries a top-ten ranking into Saturday, checking in at No. 9.

Wide receiver David Ball and quarterback Ricky Santos provided the edge for UNH a year ago. The pair hooked up for four touchdowns, including the go-ahead score to put the Wildcats up for good with just over four minutes remaining in the third quarter.

UMass coach Don Brown feels his team has a statement to make against UNH (6-2, 3-2 A-10) this weekend.

"Yeah we have something to prove," he said. "We have something to prove every week. That's the beauty of it. We didn't get to eight wins last year and here's our chance to get to eight wins."

Maine's loss to Rhode Island last weekend keeps UNH in the hunt in the A-10 North. However, the

UM to face toughest challenge in UNH

By Ryan Greenblatt

UMass coach Don Brown changed his team's mindset at the beginning of this season.

No more looking ahead. One game at a time. Every game is just a rung in the winning ladder — New England Patriots style.

The Massachusetts football team has been successful so far this season. The Minutemen have smashed Atlantic 10 opponents en route to a dazzling 5-0 record in the conference. Strong senior leadership has kept UMass in the "now" this year.

Now the Minutemen face their toughest A-10 opponent this season, the New Hampshire Wildcats. Ricky Santos and David Ball, the most highly touted connection in Division I-AA, await the Minutemen in Durham.

For the many seniors on the team, this could be the last game against the Wildcats, the Minutemen's most despised in-conference opponent. Last year, UNH dealt UMass a 34-28 loss at McGuirk Alumni stadium.

Nobody wearing maroon has forgotten about that — especially the guys with one more shot at their biggest conference rival.

"[UNH] was pretty good last year," defensive end David Burns said. "They had a lot more bigger plays than we did. Offensively, they had a really good scheme against us. David Ball and Ricky Santos connected a lot last year. We're a lot more understandable as far as what type of game this is. We're more focused this year."

In the 2006 campaign, the Minutemen haven't had much to complain about. Other than the one-point loss to Navy on Sept. 9 — that UMass should have won but paid for some costly turnovers — the Minutemen are without a blemish on the schedule.

They have beaten the lesser teams by significant margins — a 35-0 defeat of Towson minus its starting quarterback Sean Schafer, 48-7 wins over Williams & Mary and Stony Brook, and a 28-7 defeat of Colgate on Opening Day.

Minutewomen to move on without Shea

By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

The holiday shopping season is among us, and amongst the items on UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon's wish list is a new field hockey coach.

McCutcheon informed now-former UMass coach Patty Shea that her contract — which expired after Saturday's loss to Rhode Island — would not be renewed, ending her 10-year reign as UMass' head coach on Wednesday.

The Minutewomen struggled through the last five seasons posting a 32-72 record. The beginning of Shea's tenure could not have been more successful. The UMass alumna led the Maroon and White to five consecutive Atlantic 10 Championships and five NCAA Tournament appearances.

But in the modern "What have you done for me lately?" world that is NCAA Division I Athletics, five years ago couldn't matter less.

"We felt the program had not made the progress that we hoped it to," McCutcheon said. "We are committed to our [field hockey] program and we want to bring it back to the levels we have enjoyed in the past. And to improve, we felt that a change was needed."

McCutcheon certainly needed no justification for his action. Although Shea is the embodiment of the UMass field hockey program, the numbers simply weren't there in recent years. Aside from the poor record, UMass is no longer the institution of field hockey it once was.

Southern schools traditionally dominate collegiate field hockey, however, coming to UMass is not supposed to be the cakewalk it has become. At the beginning of Shea's tenure and in the years prior, seeing UMass on the schedule struck fear in the opponents. The Minutewomen were a team you knew you weren't going to defeat easily. In the last three years alone, Richmond — a conference rival — outscored UMass 26-5 in five contests.

Coming into this season, Shea knew that her team must improve on its dismal performance in the four years prior.

"We had very frank conversations with coach Shea last year as to what the expectations were for this season," McCutcheon said. "Unfortunately, we didn't meet those expectations, and improving the direction of the program required a change."

Firing a coach is never easy, but the history Shea has with UMass only makes it more difficult.

"Any kind of a coaching change is very difficult because you know it affects people's lives and you know them personally and you know they're trying to do a good job," McCutcheon said. "Sometimes, situations get to a point where regardless as to what they might try to do to turn things around, it's just not possible."

The players, too, weren't particularly shocked by the decision, but that doesn't mean the decision didn't affect them. However, the prospect of a fresh start is something that excites the team.

"[McCutcheon] explained to us that the decision he made was in the best interest of the team," senior Gina Sanders said. "The players are very excited to move forward and have a fresh start. We didn't fully expect it, but the last few seasons hadn't been winning seasons, so we knew something might happen."

Although Sanders will not play for whoever the new coach happens to be, the direction of UMass field hockey means a lot

Patty Shea led the Minutewomen to five Atlantic 10 titles and five NCAA Tournament appearances in 10 years with the program.

Looking back at the history of the rivalry

Let's go back in time.

But first, focus on Saturday, Nov. 4, 2006. The Massachusetts football team will clash against New Hampshire at Cowell Stadium in what will be the apex for both sides. But it's no surprise. Since the beginning of the season, we all knew it would be. Every year, it is a significant game for both teams. What predictions and hype do not outline, however, is which team would be the underdog, and which would be favored.

Eric Athas

At the start of the season, I doubt there was a sportswriter who predicted the Wildcats (6-2, 3-2 Atlantic 10) would be ranked six slots lower than the Minutemen (7-1, 5-0 A-10) on Nov. 4. Ricky Santos and company were No. 2 in the preseason, while UMass rounded out the top 10. And in the Atlantic 10 preseason rankings? UNH: No. 1. UMass: No. 2.

Rankings, however, will not determine a football game, and both teams have a lot at stake during Saturday's game. If UMass wants to extend its season at home in November, the next three contests are crucial. And for UNH, the very thought of playoff chances are in jeopardy.

Which is why Saturday will be just like the recent battles between these two teams — close. And history shows that regardless

UM scientist given $5 Million grant

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

The National Institutes of Health awarded a University of Massachusetts professor and two other researchers a $5 million grant to study the role of an enzyme in immune function and the pathologies of cancer, Alzheimer's and other diseases.

Professor Barbara Osborne was awarded the grant along with Lucio Miele of Loyola University and Todd Golde — an Amherst College graduate — of the Mayo Clinic. Osborne's lab, which will be the center of the grant, will further study the role of gamma-secretase in the immune system and the effects of inhibitors.

"We're trying to design a therapy that's more rational and more holistic in approach, looking at a variety of different effects that it might have on both normal and pathological situations," said Osborne.

While examining the role of gamma-secretase in the progress of Alzheimer's, it is easy to see it as a simple problem and according to Osborne it is common in medicine for researchers to concentrate on the impact of treatments on a disease rather than on the organism as a whole, which is part of what makes this grant fairly innovative.

University of Massachusetts professor Barbara Osborne.

"We expect that this is going to be a double-edged sword," said Osborne. On the one hand, gamma-secretase inhibitors can arrest the progress of Alzheimer's disease, but they can also lead to a compromise in the immune system where gamma-secretase plays

Putting the pre-vent in pre-gaming

By Holly Seabury
Collegian Staff

When students at the University of Massachusetts go out on the weekends, it usually means they are attending a party, perhaps at a house off-campus, at a bar uptown, in Puffton Village, or even in their friend's dorm room.

But before the partying can begin, many students pre-pare with some pre-gaming.

Pre-gaming, the idea that students need to drink a little before drinking a lot, is like a warm-up run before a football game. It often makes students act more comfortable and gets them feeling ready for the big event.

However, a recent study done by health officials and a Boston University professor says that pre-gaming is a major public health concern, and can lead to serious health effects for college students.

The study was done by Beth DeRicco, the associate director of the U.S. Department of Education's Higher Education Center for Alcohol, and Professor William DeJong of the Boston University School of Public Health. It was presented last week at the National Meeting on Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse and Violence Prevention in Higher Education in Arlington, Va.

"The most dangerous effect that pre-gaming has on a student is the quantity of use in a short amount of time," said DeRicco. "There is the obvious issue of high blood alcohol content, but frequently, when students pre-game before a party, they are not clear on how much they have consumed."

DeRicco and DeJong studied 112 students from 10 Pennsylvania colleges, including prestigious schools like Bucknell University, Villanova University, and Gettysburg College. Each of the 112 students was either enrolled in a substance-abuse seminar or had violated their school's alcohol policy.

According to the study results, 25 percent of the students pre-gamed between three and nine times a week, while 64 percent said they pre-gamed on a regular basis, and about 75 percent pre-gamed at least once in the last month. Also, almost 65 percent of the students were under the legal drinking age.

Students who contributed to the study also noted the most popular and likely places to pre-game are in residence halls, apartments, and cars. They also said that mixed

SGA funds Sylvan kitchen renovation

By Samantha M. Frontiera

Voices were raised while motions were discussed during the second general meeting of the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts.

The Sylvan Area Government submitted a proposal to the SGA for support of a kitchenette renovation process that would provide an even safer environment for students living in McNamara, Brown and Cashin.

Sylvan Area governor Alan Chow stressed to the SGA that, "We will not put a price of the safety of Sylvan students."

Inadequate equipment was found in all three buildings. Refrigerators in both McNamara and Brown were sighted for problems with mold and a refrigerator in Cashin was found broken.

McNamara has a stove that is missing a vent while vents in Brown and Cashin are semi-functioning and problems with the cabinets were also found in each of the buildings.

One of the main issues raised in the meeting involved the installation of antiquated smoke detectors in each building.

The motion was passed unanimously.

"The student government is for students helping students," said Chow. Chow believes that the passing of the motion will help the Sylvan government and students to stand together.

Many senators voiced their concerns over the motion.

One senator asked where funding would come from to pay for all the renovations.

"We believe it's the responsibility of the University," said Chow.

Another senator asked if an environmental health official was contacted. Chow said that a health official was not contacted but that there were numerous proposals sent to housing services.

Senators were placed into one of six standing committees: Administrative Affairs, Ways and Means, Finance, Public Policy and Relations, and RSO advocacy. The committee is a statewide student organization. Speaker Peter Barros commented that less than half of the senators did not show up to discuss the committee they would like to be placed in. Barros asked senators to at least attend the first meeting of their assigned committee before deciding to change.

Before next weeks' general body meeting, SGA members and friends are asked to participate in the annual Walk for Lights event. While walking around campus, the SGA, along with UMass officials and police officers, will be searching for dimly lit areas, broken street lights and defunct call boxes.

SGA President Elvis Mendez addresses students before introducing Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Deval Patrick, Tuesday.

UMass groups look to kick 'butts'

By Lorraine Burger

The first ever "No Butts About It Day"—an event put on by the Student Health Advisory Board (SHAB) with support from the American Cancer Society's Colleges Against Cancer Program (CAC) will include picking up the improperly discarded cigarette butts around campus. It will be held this Sunday, Nov. 5.

During the event, running from noon to 2 p.m., the butts collected by volunteers of the campus community will be brought to stations at the Berkshire, Franklin and Worcester Dining Commons where students will receive gloves and clear plastic bags so it is visible how many butts have been collected.

All of the butts collected will be put on display in the Campus Center for the American Cancer Society's 30th annual Great American Smokeout on Nov. 16, spreading the awareness of the dangers of smoking and the risks associated with cancer, as well as to provide help and support for those who wish to quit smoking.

"CAC and SHAB are also working on a visual display that will include students' faces to represent how many people die of smoking in a certain time period," said Helene Phelan, President of Colleges Against Cancer.

Some students on campus don't seem to find cigarette butts a problem at all.

"I never throw butts away properly," said George Mansour, a freshman. "I don't think butts are a problem on campus, but I guess because I'm a smoker I don't mind it as much."

"I don't think they're too much of a problem, but I think outside of buildings they do look bad," said Aine Creedon, a non-smoker at UMass.

Anyone who wishes to volunteer for "No Butts About It Day" or become involved with Colleges Against Cancer or the Student Health Advisory Board can contact Helene Phelan at hphelan@student.umass.edu.

Kerry slip-up not costing Democrats in polls

By Thomas Ferraro
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Sen. John Kerry's "botched joke" about the Iraq war riled fellow Democrats and temporarily energized Republicans, but it is unlikely to have much, if any, impact in Tuesday's congressional elections.

That was the view of political analysts on Thursday as polls continued to show Democrats headed toward winning control of the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate from President George W. Bush's Republicans.

The biggest casualty of Kerry's remarks may the Massachusetts Democrat's own chances of making a second run for the White House in 2008, the analysts said.

"It will remind us of why he's not president and why he's never going to be," said Stephen Hess, a congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution.

Kerry's remarks on Monday drew fire from Bush and other Republicans who accused him of insulting American troops with his remark to California students that they could get "stuck in Iraq" if they did not study hard enough.

His office said he misread his text and had intended to say, "You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush."

Kerry, who unsuccessfully challenged Bush in the 2004 White House election, said his comments were "a botched joke."

Under bipartisan pressure, he apologized on Wednesday.

While a Republican backlash against Kerry could help determine the outcome of a few razor-close congressional races, it's highly unlikely to change enough votes to determine the battle for control of Congress, analysts said.

"The impact will be very, very minimal," said Stuart Rothenberg of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report. "This election

Study reveals dangers of 'pre-game' drinking

drinks were the most preferable pre-gaming drinks, because of their high alcohol content and trouble-free disguise in a water or juice bottle if they need to drink on the way to a party.

According to the study, pre-gaming leads to a quicker intoxication, if the student is not already there. Consequences include a greater possibility of alcohol poisoning, blacking out, drunk driving, and unintentional sexual promiscuity.

Students feel the need to pre-game for several different reasons, according to DeRicco. First and most commonly, students want to be socially comfortable at large parties, and believe that by taking a few shots or funneling a couple beers they will seem at ease in a large group of people.

Another reason for pre-gaming is to cut costs. For college students, five dollars for a keg cup at a party can add up every weekend, but if there's pre-gaming involved beforehand, there just might not be a need for a cup.

"I don't recommend high-risk choices," said DeRicco. "Students who pre-game are not typically thinking about their own safety and the safety of others when they make this choice."

Grunting carries no weight in this gym

By Candice Choi
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. – Some gyms forbid hogging machines and or wearing flip flops. At one gym, grunting is grounds for expulsion. Albert Argibay of Beacon, N.Y. was escorted by police officers from a gym this week for grunting – which is against Planet Fitness' rules for maintaining a non-intimidating atmosphere.

"Perhaps I grunted, perhaps I didn't. It's open to interpretation," said Argibay, a 40-year-old corrections officer. He said he had his headset on when he was lifting 500 pounds on a squat machine at the gym in Wappingers Falls, about 80 miles north of New York City.

Planet Fitness, which has 120 locations across the country, markets itself as a place where anyone can feel comfortable in its "Judgment Free Zone."

Its rules, posted around the gym, state members cannot wear bandanas, grunt or bang weights on the ground. When an offender is spotted, a "lunk alarm" sounds to warn the member.

Across its locations nationwide, there is at least one expulsion every two weeks, said Mike Grondahl, CEO of Planet Fitness. He said grunting and dropping weights are the most common offenses.

"When somebody's in there and they grunt and they grunt loud, it's trying to bring attention to themselves to show everyone how strong they are," Grondahl said.

Argibay emitted the offending grunt Monday evening, a peak time for gyms, said Carol Palazzolo, the gym's general manager. She said she heard it from across the room, even though "the place was a zoo."

"He was looking directly at me and he did it four times," she said. "I'm not a doctor, but as far as I know, a grunt is a noise that comes out of one's body that is loud and is intimidating."

An argument ensued when she confronted him, and the police were called. Argibay was escorted out, but no charges were filed.

"It's an embarrassing situation to be in, over a grunt," Argibay said.

Most clubs have policies regarding proper gym manners, although expulsions are rare, said Brooke Correia, spokeswoman for the International Health, Racquet and Sportsclub Association.

Grunting might be more taboo in gyms like Planet Fitness, which cater to exercise novices, Correia said.

The heaviest dumb bells at Planet Fitness are 80 pounds, meaning it's a place geared toward the general public, Palazzolo said.

New therapy may help patients

an important role.

The immune system has several types of cells, including T-cells, which aid in the production of antibodies and kill other cells that have been infected by viruses and bacteria. During the course of a T-cell's development, gamma-secretase activates the "notch" protein in nascent T-cells, which activates the protein and allows the cells to reach full maturity. Because of this role, treatments that inhibit gamma-secretase also inhibit notch, which leads to a reduced immune function.

Sometimes doctors may want to reduce the capacity of a patient's immune system, like when they have an auto-immune disease such as lupus or rheumatoid arthritis. Osborne's lab tested gamma-secretase inhibitors on mice with a form of multiple-sclerosis – a progressive disease where the immune system destroys the insulating sheath of neurons, making them less effective – and found that the drugs were effective in controlling the symptoms of the disease. Normally the disease manifest as paralysis in the rear appendages.

Gamma-secretase inhibitors have also been shown to slow the progress of Alzheimer's by reducing the formation of plaques. These plaques are formed when gamma-secretase cleaves amyloid precursor protein into smaller proteins, but because Alzheimer's is generally diagnosed after the plaques have formed, gamma-secretase inhibitor therapy cannot reverse the damage caused by the disease.

Coupled with the potential negative impact of the therapy on the immune system, this therapy looks promising for high-risk patients, those with a family history of Familial Alzheimer's, and if more targeted delivery systems can be developed that would keep the drug from interfering with the development of the immune system.

Osborne's work with the "notch" protein started serendipitously. A student obtained an odd result from an experiment 10 years ago where they noticed that "notch" was expressed on a white blood cell. Taking a gamble, Osborne decided to look further into the protein and its function in the immune system. While many things are still unclear about notch's function in the development of T-cells, it is clear that this research has very profound implications.

Kerry apologizes for Iraq remark

is not about John Kerry. It is about George Bush and the war in Iraq."

Rothenberg said he doubted the flap would cost Democrats a seat in the Senate, though it could have an effect on a few tight House races.

"But I don't see it as a significant factor given the weight of Democratic message and overall public sentiment," he added.

Democrats need to gain six seats for a Senate majority, and they lead in six of the seven most vulnerable Republican-held states, according to Reuters-Zogby polls released on Thursday.

James Thurber of Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University said Democrats should prevent Kerry from stepping back into this year's political spotlight.

"They should lock him in his Georgetown home (in Washington) for the rest of the campaign," Thurber said.

Many Democrats fumed about Kerry's remarks, complaining they had become a distraction. Republicans denounced Kerry, but also saw his comments as fresh political ammunition.

"The insulting remarks John Kerry made about our troops does not come as a surprise to those of us who watch Democrats neglect national security issues every day in the Congress," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio.

Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record), a Michigan Democrat, said, "I don't think there is any impact now because he has apologized, and I think people are again focusing on botched policies instead of a botched joke."

Seafood could collapse by 2048

By Deborah Zabarenko
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The world's fish and seafood populations will collapse by 2048 if current trends in habitat destruction and overfishing continue, resulting in less food for humans, researchers said on Thursday.

In an analysis of scientific data going back to the 1960s and historical records over a thousand years, the researchers found that marine biodiversity – the variety of ocean fish, shellfish, birds, plants and micro-organisms – has declined dramatically, with 29 percent of species already in collapse.

Extending this pattern into the future, the scientists calculated that by 2048 all species would be in collapse, which the researchers defined as having catches decline 90 percent from the maximum catch.

This applies to all species, from mussels and clams to tuna and swordfish, said Boris Worm, lead author of the study, which was published in the current edition of the journal Science.

Ocean mammals, including seals, killer whales and dolphins, are also affected.

"Whether we looked at tide pools or studies over the entire world's ocean, we saw the same picture emerging," Worm said in a statement. "In losing species we lose the productivity and stability of entire ecosystems. I was shocked and disturbed by how consistent these trends are – beyond anything we suspected."

When ocean species collapse, it makes the ocean itself weaker and less able to recover from shocks like global climate change, Worm said.

The decline in marine biodiversity is largely due to over-fishing and destruction of habitat, Worm said in a telephone interview from Dalhousie University in Halifax, Nova Scotia.

The loss of biodiversity makes ocean ecosystems less able to recover from the effects of global climate change, pollution and over-exploitation, Worm said.

He likened a diverse ocean environment to a diversified investment portfolio.

With lots of different species in the oceans, just as with lots of different kinds of investments, losing productivity and stability, by losing stability, we're losing the ability of the system to self-repair."

Upcoming Events at UMass

Japanese Author Yoko Tawada Speaks at UMass

Japanese writer Yoko Tawada will be giving a public lecture at 7 p.m. in room 104 of Thompson Hall, today. Her lecture, entitled "Writing in the Web of Words: An Evening with Yoko Tawada," is aimed at introducing American readers to Japanese literature.

Tawada lives in Germany and writes in both German and Japanese. She won the Akutagawa Prize, Japan's highest literary award, for her book "The Bridegroom Was a Dog." Her work deals with national and personal identity as well as living between national borders and the borders between fantasy and reality.

Her lecture is free and open to the public, and all are encouraged to attend.

Speaker for Public Health and Reproductive Freedom

UMass is hosting Gloria Feldt, former president of Planned Parenthood, to speak on "Sexual and Reproductive Justice: A Public Health Imperative" in room 1009 in the Campus Center on Nov. 16. Her speech will be followed by a book signing.

Feldt is the author of Behind Every Choice Is A Story and The War on Choice. At the age of 20, Feldt was already a mother of three, and claimed that the birth control pill saved her life in allowing her to restore her health and pursue her education. After serving as President of Planned Parenthood Federation of America from 1996-2005, Feldt will speak of her commitment to sexual and reproductive justice. She emphasizes the need for bold public health leadership to protect advances and to assure health services to all people.

Veteran's Vigil

Tuesday, Nov. 7 at 4 p.m. will be the kickoff time to the 2006 Veteran's Day Vigil. The event will continue until 4:30 p.m. on Wednesday, Nov. 8. It will both begin and end with a ceremony conducted by the UMass Amherst Air Force ROTC program, which will include a 21-Gun Salute at approximately 4:25 p.m. on Wednesday.

All members of the community can rest assured that the ammunition used during the salute is blank and designed solely for realistic sound affects.

There will also be a special wreath-laying ceremony in honor of Lance Corporal Eric Valdepenas, a former UMass student who died in Iraq in September of this year. Everyone is encouraged to attend to pay tribute to the Veterans of UMass, the community, and the nation in the duration of these two days.

Girl Scouts Are Engineers for a Day

On Saturday, Nov. 4, two-dozen Girl Scouts from across western Massachusetts will be meeting in Marcus Hall's Gunness Student Center from 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. to learn about the world of engineering.

The College of Engineering holds its yearly Girl Scout Day to expose the girls to ideas such as tools of chemical, mechanical, civil, environmental, and electrical engineering, in hopes to spark enough interest and excitement about engineering in the girls so they might want to pursue such careers further down the line.

"We want to create a pipeline of young women into engineering," says Vanessa Rivera, assistant dean of student affairs in the College of Engineering.

The girls will make circuits, learn about drafting software, and create designs for a recycling system of polymers. The goal is to teach the young girls exactly what engineers do on a day-to-day basis.

There is a new coffee haven in the Pioneer Valley. Located just a few miles away from The Yankee Candle Factory and Sugarloaf Mountain, the GoNOMAD café, is located in the center of picturesque South Deerfield. It is on the PVTA bus line and more and more students are discovering it.

This cheery new java spot features all the standard coffee shop amenities – but with a little twist. Not only is it a café, but it is also an internet café and headquarters for an online travel guide. The café has five computers that customers can rent to use by the hour, by purchasing a "cyber card" good for 60 or even just 15 minutes.

"When I'm looking for a few moments to be a part of the scene, I go to the café. The coffee is great and it's nice to have the bus service," says Jim Kelley, a University of Massachusetts librarian, and 12 year resident of South Deerfield.

"Before, South Deerfield was known as a traditional kind of town," said Kelly. "The café's a good place for South Deerfield, showing that we can hold our own against Amherst and Northampton shops."

GoNOMAD.com, the online travel guide, is an easy to access Web site that features "original, unusual and inspiring travel articles" written by hundreds of travelers. GoNOMAD.com says that GoNOMAD is not a traditional travel agency.

"We don't sell tours, book flights, or reserve hotel rooms," said owner Max Hartshorne on the company's Web site. "We are a comprehensive resource center, designed to provide independent and alternative travelers with all the information and inspiration they need to plan their travels in the U.S. and abroad."

People can use GoNOMAD to do their research and then book through online agencies such as Travelocity, Expedia, and Orbitz without leaving the GoNOMAD Web site.

"We'll point you in the right direction for any trip you want to take," Hartshorne said.

Offering a wide selection of menu items from toasted lunch bagels, breakfast egg sandwiches to homemade cookies, breads and espresso, GoNOMAD is proudly exploring an interesting menu. They even serve fresh, hard boiled eggs (situated conveniently next to the coffee where customers can help themselves) from a local farm.

Christopher Jenkins, a wildlife conservationist in Idaho Falls, ID. and customer at the café can be found with his laptop and a tall cup of coffee on return trips to his hometown.

"I grew up in South Deerfield and have been away on the west coast for a while," Jenkins said. "But it's a nice addition to the town, it's brought some culture. When I was growing up the downtown was real rural. You couldn't get a good cup of coffee."

The café also offers computer classes on a variety of topics by Hartshorne, for those less technologically savvy. The topics include Photos on the computer, Music on your iPod, Beginner's eBay buying and selling, and Beginners Internet and e-mail.

From throwing bagels into the toaster to brewing coffee, Hartshorne, 48, is the creative mind behind GoNOMAD.com. He is a travel fanatic who loves what he does and it shows.

He enjoys traveling as much as his readers, and visits many countries by invitation of their tourist boards.

Just this week, Hartshorne takes off for Greenland via Air Greenland on a week long expedition of the area. The trip is designed to promote the island as a new tourism destination, and will include more than 30 other journalists from around the US and Canada.

"I try to go somewhere new every month," says Hartshorne, who has been traveling across the globe since 2000. He first got into the travel editing business when he was just 21, for a travel magazine that was once published in Amherst.

With his company Hartshorne has been able to travel extensively and share his experiences with his readers.

"I went to Cyprus in February, Malaysia in July, Austria in October, Sweden in December, New Zealand next February and Greenland this Thursday," he said.

"I can't wait to join my pal [Advocate Photographer Pau] Shoul in this frozen and desolate place where almost nobody goes," he wrote Saturday on his GoNOMAD Café blog.

These real life experiences that Hartshorne embarks on make the information he provides on his site that much more personal and that much easier to relate to.

"Having the opportunity to take these press trips gives me a perspective to be a good travel editor," said Hartshorne.

"It makes the site richer because it brings us a lot of original content," he added.

Hartshorne is also eager every year to train interns in the field of travel editing. He is always on the search for college-aged students who are attending one of the Five Colleges in the valley to work for his company and gain experience in the writing and editing business along the way.

Although this internship is unpaid, credits can be received through the participating college or university towards one's major and the benefits of possible travel are also a big draw.

"We have sent our interns to Trinidad, Colorado, Italy and Mexico, all to write stories for the Web site. It's a pretty cool perk," Hartshorne said.

At GoNOMAD.com the company recommends that its travelers look outside the box and offers a new flair on typical travel called Alternative Travel or "Participatory Travel."

"Beyond passive sightseeing, participatory travel engages travelers with the people, culture and environment of a destination," according to the GoNOMAD.com Web site.

"Whether through taking a weaving course in Guatemala, volunteering in Nepal, joining an active education tour through Europe, or staying with a local family in Africa, alternative travel brings travelers into close contact with communities and destinations, and returns them home changed by their experience: enlightened, challenged and rewarded."

The GoNOMAD Cafe is located at 4A Sugarloaf St. in the center of South Deerfield, on the South Deerfield/South Amherst UMass bus line. It is open Monday through Friday 7 a.m. to 5 p.m., Saturdays 8 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Common misconceptions

World Perspectives

Katie Huston

When I told my mother I wanted to study abroad in Africa, she relayed the worried words of my grandpa's wife: "Katie, they have civil wars all the time over there... They just go in and shoot up whole villages."

I rolled my eyes, exasperated. Cape Town, South Africa, where I'm studying abroad for the year, is far from a village, and the African continent is anything but homogenous.

But I knew where her stereotypes were coming from. By and large, the Western media's portrayal of Africa is of a "dark continent," a festering bed of AIDS and war and despair.

The only news that seems to come out of Africa is bad news. South Africa has one of the highest HIV infection rates in the world and a staggering level of violence and theft. Since the Darfur genocide began in 2003, over 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million have fled Sudan. Inflation in Zimbabwe topped 900 percent earlier this year, and staples like bread and tea have become luxuries in a country already struggling with 70 percent unemployment.

No wonder we're afraid of Africa. And because of that fear, most people stay away.

This western image of Africa is founded in reality. South Africa is dealing with sobering amounts of crime, disease and poverty. Although the murder rate has fallen since 1994, South Africa still saw 18,528 reported murders in a 12-month period from 2005-06. Life expectancy there is only 44.8 years, and 1.1 million children in South Africa have been orphaned by HIV/AIDS.

Rural and township schools suffer from a lack of resources and qualified teachers. Unemployment in South Africa is estimated at 40 percent. I need only drive from the glitzy, luxurious Cape Town suburb of Camps Bay to the nearby township of Khayelitsha, where half a million people live in tiny shacks patched together from plywood and corrugated metal scraps, to see South Africa's staggering income inequality.

And yes, it is less safe in South Africa than it is in Amherst. In the States, I didn't always lock my car or my dorm room, even when I left my computer and my iPod on my desk; here, I have to unlock three gates to get in my front door.

At home, I never carried 20 Rand

Yes, there is conflict here, but to me, South Africa feels far more connected and full of hope than it feels like a place of fragmentation, conflict and despair.

(about three dollars) in my front pocket so I wouldn't have to hand over all my cash in case I got mugged, and I never carried my cell phone in my bra; here, it's become second nature.

In South Africa we can't take public transport after dark, and believe it or not, paying cab fares has really made me miss those crowded Saturday night PVTA buses.

But when the western media zeroes in on the statistics – the disease, violence, crime and inequality – the Africa it creates is completely missing the reality of life here. "All I really know about South Africa is that AIDS is a huge problem there. What's going on with that?" my aunt wrote me the other week. When my friend wanted to volunteer abroad in Ghana next summer, her family told her she was naïve and stupid for wanting to go to Africa and tried to talk her back to "reality."

Yes, South African townships are desperately in need of help. However we don't hear about the amazing high school students I've been teaching journalism to, who show up every Wednesday without fail. We don't read the passionate articles they write about taking pride in your own language, staying away from drugs and improving education in tertiary schools. We don't meet their principal, who bends over backwards to expose his students to as many opportunities as possible.

Yes, apartheid's legacy is far from erased, and structural and economic inequalities between races are striking. But we don't often hear about Cape Town's vibrant multiculturalism and the way the younger generation moves fluidly across any color lines. Our senses can't absorb the intoxicating blend of halaal food and midday Ramadan prayers, of thick Afrikaans accents and the animated clicks of Xhosa speakers, of kwaito and hip-hop, of township beer and good South African wine.

But because we're afraid, we stay away, fueling this frightening, bleak myth of Africa. Yes, there is conflict here, but to me, South Africa feels far more connected and full of hope than it feels like a place of fragmentation, conflict and despair. For westerners to stop seeing it as a dark continent we need to experience Africa ourselves and share it with the world.

Don't wait too long – there's too much here to discover.

Good or bad: you have options

Kevin Pascucci

Most students may not have noticed, but for each week in the UMass Daily Planner, there is an official "Success Tip" at the bottom of the page. As I was reading through these tips the other day out of boredom, one of them happened to catch my attention. "Go to class or sleep? Finish your assignment or go to a party? Study early or cram? Pass or fail? It's your choice." How true this is.

Throughout life, we will all make important decisions. You did so when you chose to attend this University. When you graduate, you will have to decide what kind of job you want to get, whether or not you want to get married, where you are going to live, etc. These choices are ones which obviously have an effect on the outcome of your life.

Some choices are not so obviously important though. These choices could be as trivial as deciding what you are going to wear in the morning, or whether or not you are going out tonight. Even decisions like these can have a larger impact on our lives than we think.

The idea of the butterfly effect was first introduced during the 1970's, and plays a central role within the chaos theory. The concept is the flap of a butterfly's wings on one end of the earth has the capability of causing a tornado on the other end of the planet. In other words, even the smallest changes can have a massive effect on our surrounding environment. This theory plays well into the idea of choice and consequence.

Unfortunately, the concept of choice seems to be one that is forgotten by a large number of people today. It's a very simple idea; for every choice you make, there is a consequence or outcome. Yet, there are so many living their lives without regard for something as trivial as consequence. This observation especially applies to students here at UMass.

Anyone who has heard of UMass is aware of what we are known for, and it's not our well-behaved student body. Now, I'm not saying it's bad to have a good time, and I realize most students here are involved in a never ending pursuit of said times. The problem is that too many people can't have fun unless they are pushing the boundaries of their own health and well-being. Sadly, the behavior of a large number of students here on this campus reflects a group of people who don't seem to fear consequence.

Yet, there are so many living their lives without regard for something as trivial as consequence. This observation especially applies to students here at UMass.

Another thing which also tends to be overlooked is consideration for those around us. Few people seem to think of others when they make personal choices in their lives. The fact of the matter is every choice we make in life has some sort of effect on the people in our lives. Sometimes they even affect people who we don't know. In both cases, the effects can be either positive or negative. Again, this is our choice.

Despite ongoing issues involving civil liberties, we are pretty much free to do as we please in this country, as long as we remain within the law. Many of the choices we make in life are not overseen by anyone, leaving us responsible for the ones we do make.

On top of not thinking about consequence, many people tend to blame the outcome of their actions on something other than themselves. Many students will use intoxication as a get-out-of-jail-free card when it comes to facing the music for something they did last night. The fact of the matter is, that person made the choice to drink, therefore anything resulting from that choice can be blamed upon no one but that person.

I can't tell you how many people I know who have ended up regretting bad decisions made in their lives, not only because of the effect on their life, but also on those they care about. I can even say this about choices I've made in my own life. The thing we need to remember is while some problems are fixable, many are not, and often we must live with the outcome of our decisions.

This is not intended to be preachy, but rather to serve as a wake-up call for some. For many of us, college is our first time living on our own. Mom and dad aren't here to oversee what you choose to do or take part in, leaving you in charge of your own actions.

It's for that reason that more of us need to be conscious of consequence, as well as taking responsibility for our actions. This concept is one that will not only help us now, but for the rest of our lives.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

GALVIN BAD FOR MASSACHUSETTS

Almost overnight the name "Diebold" has become a household word. Whether in the blogosphere, in e-mail forwards or in traditional print and electronic media channels, we hear from all quarters now. From university computer scientists from Princeton to Stanford and from state election officials, the same information is coming forth: Diebold electronic voting machines can be hacked from afar and their tabulations of the vote do not comport with the tabulations from exit polls.

The elephant in the room we are now being forced to see is that all elections, state and federal, are administered by the secretaries of state in all our 50 states. We have no federal agency to administer them. Every detail of a state's election system and process is overseen by the Secretary of State.

So, it is rapidly dawning on us that the Secretary of State office, whose tasks heretofore most people had no inkling of, is of vital importance in holding a democracy together. We need this office in good standing to ward off the onslaughts of corporete thugs who would steal it. Remember Bush In the 2000 election (with Florida) and in the 2004 election (with Ohio)?

Utilizing these Diebold computers makes stealing elections easy becuse computer processing goes on beyond the keen awareness of human eyes, ears and hands. These machines have no paper trail, by the way. And puttiig two and two together, the CEO of Diebold is a major contributor to Bush. He was reported to have said he could help deliver states to the Bush column.

We have just learned that Bill Gelvin, the 12-year Democrat incumbent Secretary of State is utilizing Diebold machines in this year's election in Massachusetts. What in the world is he thinking?

I thought we lived in a Blue state. Many Beacon Hill watchers have asserted that Galvin has been totally absent from his duty to oversee lobbying, which is one of the main duties of this office besides overseeing the voting process and going after investment fraud.

In fact, some heve effectionately called him "Darth Vader," as a way of making light of his secrecy and insider bureaucrat mentality. It fits that he has been called "Darth Vader," and it also fits that such a mentality would install these Diebold (diebolically bold) machines.

Hence, I was drawn to see in his title Secretary of State the root word "secret." So, we have to beware of who we put in es our secretaries, don't we? We don't want somebody who has a strong proclivity to be secretive.

Jill Stein M.D., a former instructor at Harvard Medical School, is now a health and economic justice organizer who has been arguing for the virtues of openness end democrecy for a long time in the medicel delivery system. She commenced this new career once she became aware of the dark recesses of lobbying by the insurance industry and the big drug companies. It is not for nothing that we Americens face such huge medical costs compared to other Western nations.

Stein will be a Secretary of State, not a Secret-ary of State. Please get off your coaches, computer chairs or whatever for just 20 minutes on Nov 7. Go outside for some fresh air, walk to your precinct and vote for Stein. You young people can meke a huge difference in this momentous election.

Larry Ely
Amherst writer and spiritual researcher

MORE DEMOCRACY ON BEACON HILL

In Massachusetts, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate most likely will win the Nov. 7 election. Thus, it is more important than ever to have someone in the state government willing to challenge the status quo that is too often invisible In the legislature controlled by the Democratic Party. We need someone to keep our elected officials – especially our legislators – true to their democratic ideals.

Jill Stein is the Green-Rainbow candidate for the Secretary of State, who is running ageinst the Democratic Incumbent, William Galvin. There is no Republican running for the office.

She vows to be a watchdog over the insider network that dominetes Beacon Hill. She intends to use the Secretary's constitutionally granted powers over lobbying and licensing of corporations to get rid of the excessive lobbying money that is so dominant in state politics.

Massachusetts ranks first among states in the amount of lobbying money per capita that trades hands in Boston. She supports public records laws, stricter disclosure requirements for lobbyists end open meetings, from which the legislature exempted itself.

Stein is e physician, en accomplished musician and the founder of the Massachusetts Coalition for Healthy Communities, e non-profit organization that helps citizens build healthy communities, a sustainable economy and a reel democracy.

As a candidate for Secretary of the Commonwealth, Stein's goal is to end the influence-peddling on Beacon Hill thet obstructs badly needed legislation – such as single-payer universal health cere, a living wage, affordable housing, a healthy environment, a sustainable economy and fair tax reform.

In short, Stein backs a revitalized democracy thel is essential to good governance and a just society.

Iron Horse serves The Breakfast

The Breakfast will perform at the Iron Horse tonight at 10 p.m. for the debut of their newest album, "Moxie Epoxy."

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

On the eve of Halloween just eight years ago, a sonic beast was born in the basement of Butterfield Dormitory. Perched atop the hillside home of the Central Residence Area, the hotbed of music and artistry at UMass, residents of Butterfield witnessed the genesis of a group then known as the "Psychedelic Breakfast."

The group will rock the Iron Horse in Northampton tonight, celebrating the release of their fifth album, "Moxie Epoxy" on the doorstep of where it all began. Tickets are $13.

While the band has since dropped the "Psychedelic" from it's name, Tim Palmieri (Guitar, Vocals), Ron Spears (Bass, Vocals) and Adrian Tramontano (Drums, Vocals) have continued to advance their musical composition, pumping out set after set of progressive, funky, hard-hitting rock and roll.

The East Haven, Ct. residents had many friends who attended UMass, where they quickly captured a loyal fan base, and subsequently used the region as a jump off point to expand their horizons.

The scene in the late-90's around Central was even headier than it is today. The notoriously creative and communal residential area, and Butterfield in particular, has been a musical breeding ground for years.

"We had a friend, who lived in Butterfield," said Palmieri. "We hung out there a lot probably about a year before the band was formed, and played one gig there as a three piece...and then we played our first gig as "Psychedelic Breakfast" at Butterfield, October 30, 1998."

"It was a lot of musicians and artists," said Palmieri. "It was a pretty cool environment to be learning in, everyone mixing and hanging out in Butterfield. Maybe there was like fifty people there. [most of them residents] and we played four hours straight, we had maybe seven or eight originals and played a lot of covers and did a lot of jamming."

Palmieri was quick to point out that The Breakfast did not pioneer the use of the Butterfield basement to put on a show.

"There were a lot of bands who played there before us," said Palmieri. "The Disco Biscuits played there, we actually did a show with Soulive, one of their first ever in the Butterfield basement."

The Breakfast mentions Butterfield in one of their songs off their newest album "Piled "Honey Butter," the song ends with the verse "She's getting all excited cause she knows the deal I take her to my palace up on the hill Honey Butter playground called Butterfield."

"I finally get to pay my homage to Butterfield," Palmieri said commenting on the track.

"We used to have a lot of friends who went to UMass, everyone's pretty much graduated by now," joked Palmieri. All kidding aside, the Butterfield show has reached legendary status among fans of the band, and former residents alike.

According to several attendees, the music was loud enough to be heard by the Chancellor at his nearby home, who promptly called the police.

The Breakfast soon moved out of the basement and onto the Baker Quad, playing before hundreds of UMass students, along with sporadic shows in and around New Haven, Ct.

Conceived long before that fateful October night, the trio had been playing regularly since the 9th grade. It wasn't until they found the musical womb of Central before the band congealed and took off, going national in 2001.

Six months into their formation as a group, the trio picked up another member, keyboardist Jordan Giangreco. This past summer, Giangreco left the band after seven and a half years. Palmieri has since taken over keyboard duties.

Undeterred by the loss of a "brother and friend", the Breakfast are running strong, coming off a national tour that has brought them to new markets and venues including Colorado, Idaho, Oregon, Vancouver, and California. The career highlight for the group came in 2004, when they received a Jammy for best new music group.

The Breakfast has a combination of influences that contribute to the band's unique sound.

"Growing up I loved the Beatles, Led Zepplin, Jimi Hendrix, Frank Zappa, [and The Red Hot] Chili Peppers," said Palmieri. "Whether its good playing, fast chops, or good song writing, whatever could inspire me, I would try and take it and turn it into my own somehow."

Combine these inspirations with the creative abstractions of Phish and the Grateful Dead, along with the groove of P-Funk, and you have a taste of The Breakfast. Regardless of the genres employed, The Breakfast are consistently high energy, complex, and brimming with raw talent.

"Anyone who likes good rock and roll, and wants to let loose [should come] to the show," added Palmieri.

The group which recently played their 1,000th show on June 17, teeters on the cusp of widespread success. They are well established in certain musical circles, and have a devoted following, but in some markets they are virtual unknowns. Despite playing with the likes of The Wailers, Moe, North Mississippi All-Stars, Gomez, along with contributions at several festivals, the band has not received extensive acclaim.

Regardless of their popularity, those familiar with the music are grateful for the hard work and talent dependably on display at each show.

Back on Oct. 30, 1998, the ripping groove of The Breakfast surged from the ground beneath Butterfield, and hasn't stopped growing since.

Doors open at 10 p.m.

Bowker hosts Niyaz

Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Tonight Bowker Auditorium will awaken with an ethereal performance that blends ancient Persia and modern music. At 8 p.m. Niyaz, an internationally acclaimed musical trio is set to deliver their unique sound to Easton.

The trio is renowned for their sonic art, which combines the traditional sounds and instruments of ancient Persia, Turkey and India intertwined with modern electronica. The group is composed of three musical artists. Niyaz vocalist Azam Ali, Axiom of Choice's Erkan Ramin Torkian and two-time Grammy Award nominee Carmen Rizzo.

Niyaz vocalist, Ali, and multi-instrumentalist Torkian spoke with the Daily Collegian about the artistic intention behind their music and what inspired them to infuse ancient sounds with modern music.

"A reflection of the generation of Central Americans that essentially have little outlet otherwise," said Torkian, who also feels that much mainstream pop can be "cheesy" and mindnumbing. He said the reason they launched Niyaz was to represent their culture with substance and also reflect their time and generation.

"When people thought of international music they thought of very traditional music," said Ali. "I think that's really changing now because there are a lot of ethnic artists living in different parts of the world creating different music."

The group came together in the hopes of creating a sound that is accessible to an international community, particularly the Persian, Turkish and Indian communities both within the U.S and world wide. The native music of these countries is represented on their self titled album, "Niyaz" (2005).

The word "Niyaz" translates to "need" or "yearning" in both Farsi and Urdu. In choosing this name, the group aims to reflect the feeling of longing that many foreign born people experience when living away from their homeland.

Internationally acclaimed musical trio Niyaz will perform tonight in the Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m.

Although their lyrics are in both Farsi and Urdu, the members of Niyaz never worried that a language barrier would be a problem. Although they include all of the lyrics' English translations in their album's sleeve, the group still feels that their music is relatable even if one doesn't understand the languages.

Iranian born (but Indian raised) Ali originally hails from Tehran, as does Torkian.

Torkian's multi-instrumental skill is a tapestry on which Ali's voice spills with hypnotic beauty. The lyrics she sings are the poems of traditional Persian and Indian mystics and poets. Their album is roughly half in Farsi and half in Urdu. Most of the Farsi poetry Niyaz sets to music is by the revered 13th-century poet Jalaluddin Rumi. The Urdu poetry comes from various other poetic mystics from the Indian subcontinent.

The group chose to set much of their music to Rumi's poetry because he is so well respected not only in Iran, but in Turkey, Pakistan and India. Niyaz also considers Rumi a universal character that people relate to in Western culture, as well.

"He was very improvised and spontaneous. He captured the essence of the truth, as he saw it, so well. He's really one true poet who belongs to the people," said Torkian.

Vocalist Ali says she doesn't have a preference when it comes to singing her own lyrics or singing traditional poetry because both serve a different purpose.

"There is something really beautiful about singing this timeless poetry. It's a completely different experience using my own lyrics, or not using any lyrics – just using my voice as an instrument," said Ali. "I don't think I could just do one. I think the combination of doing all of

Man produces online film festival

By Kathy Lauer-Williams
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

KUTZTOWN, Pa. – Hayden Craddolph always dreamed of directing his own film.

Now the Kutztown resident, the creator of a nationally recognized online film festival in its second year, is looking at filmmaking in broader terms.

"I'm seeing my ideas become real and actually help filmmakers," Craddolph says. "I've since I started helping filmmakers, doors have opened that wouldn't have if I were just doing my own films. Now I can take the producer role."

The Haydenfilms Online Film Festival, created as Craddolph's graduate thesis at Kutztown University, is among only a handful of online film festivals and the only one that lets viewers vote for their favorite films, says Craddolph. The top film gets a $10,000 cash prize.

In the age of YouTube, where digital cameras and streaming video online make filmmaking accessible to everybody, Craddolph says online festivals like his give independent and student filmmakers "the opportunity to have their work seen by worldwide audiences."

"I think brick-and-mortar film festivals are important, but some of these films might not find their audience at a festival," Craddolph says. "Online it is seen by a large audience. I'm completely passionate about this."

Haydenfilms has been making a name for itself in the film community. Craddolph has been profiled in MovieMaker Magazine and has forged partnerships with other businesses, including withoutabox.com, which maintains a database of film festivals for filmmakers, and Getty Images, which provides stock film footage.

Craddolph, a native of Philadelphia, says he has always loved film and grew up a "huge fan" of maverick filmmaker George Lucas, whose groundbreaking 1977 film "Stars Wars" was originally turned down by several studios.

"They thought he was crazy," says Craddolph as he sits in his office, decorated with figures of "Star Wars" characters Darth Vader and C-3PO.

Craddolph's path in the film world has been roundabout. He earned an undergraduate degree in finance from Kutztown University and went to work on Wall Street in the early 1990s.

But Craddolph could never get the dream of filmmaking out of his head, and after seven years in the

Website of the Week

WWW.WAVELIT.COM

This website, though small in design, has an interesting twist. It features a 24/7 live, streaming video of Nkorho Pan, a watering hole in the Sabi Sands Private Game Reserve, in South Africa. A variety of African wildlife can be seen drinking, but of course, you've got to catch them at the right moment. The camera was established back in 1998, and was the world's first streaming videos of some of the wildest places.

Another video which the website features is one of hummingbirds, sipping at the nectar of a plastic feeder outside of a window. Observers can actually see with the naked eye hummingbirds hover and eat as they flap their wings roughly 75 times per second.

Got an idea for website of the week? Send us the link! Include 2 short paragraphs and the website address to Arts@DailyCollegian.com and we can feature it for next Friday's paper!

it is really what's so fulfilling to me as a singer."

In their opinion, the lyrics are what provide the deeper nourishment in their music, because of their spirituality. Even though their music has a beat ideal for dancing, their intent is a much more substantial one. The group says their music aims for fulfillment rather than simple entertainment.

"It's a very personal individual growth. The individual search that, I think, we are all on — the lyrics really reflect that," said Ali.

The group has yet to face any criticism about putting the venerated poetry in their music. Ali feels they've utilized the poems with so much reverence that they have no qualms about it.

Rizzo adds his distinctive electronic mixing to the music, and skillfully adapts modern electronics to Turkian's traditional instrumentation. When combined with Ali's mystical voice, their music truly represents a cultural blending of tonalities with new sounds. The result a tasteful mingling of the textures of traditional acoustic music with new electronica.

Tonight will feature the talents of two other virtuoso musicians as guest performers, Tabla player, Satnam Ramgotra, and multi-instrumentalist Dimitris Mahlis — both were featured on their album.

Online film fest grows

business world, he decided to go back to Kutztown in 2001. There, he was offered an assistantship in the university's electronic media graduate program.

Craddolph, who has never made a film, says he doesn't think he has the creativity to make films, so he decided to focus on the business side instead.

"I needed a different way of thinking of getting into the film business," he says.

Craddolph took all the required courses in scriptwriting and production and filled up his schedule with undergraduate theater classes and was assistant stage manager for plays.

"I wanted to take theater classes, because a good director understands actors," he says.

For his graduate thesis, Craddolph originally proposed soliciting collaborative videos from filmmakers and editing the scenes into his own film. But after consulting with his advisers and the university's Small Business Development Center, he came up with a plan to create an online film festival.

"I had no creative experience and no film contacts," Craddolph says. "Video content on computers was new and I thought, why not create my own film festival?"

He says there are more than 2,000 film festivals worldwide but only around 10 are online. Most, like the online film festival run by the venerable Sundance Film Festival, offer winners no real prize other than recognition, Craddolph says.

As he started raising money through donations and sponsors like Sposto Interactive, a Kutztown Web design firm for whom he worked, Craddolph decided to offer a $10,000 prize to give the contest credibility.

"I wanted to create a brand name for Haydenfilms," he says.

With the help of Sposto Interactive, Haydenfilms.com was created in 2004.

As he developed the film festival, Craddolph presented the Web site as a community for filmmakers by letting them post for crews, shop for equipment and take part in message boards.

In preparation for the contest, Craddolph solicited submissions of short films under 35 minutes long through ads in industry publications like MovieMaker magazine and at filmmaking schools like UCLA.

He says he decided to include only shorts because of the lack of a market for the form, concerns about the attention span of viewers watching films online and the technical limitations of viewing longer films on the Internet.

Craddolph received 105 submissions, including films from Australia and Taiwan, each paying a $30 entry fee.

"The entries were fantastic," he says.

Craddolph secured national media professors and film-industry experts to serve as judges to winnow the films down to 36 semifinalists that could be viewed online.

For two months, beginning in Aug. 2005, the public could view the entries and cast their votes. In the end, 6,500 votes were cast.

The second competition kicked off last month and has attracted 195 submissions from 10 countries. This year the panel of judges chose the 50 semifinalists that are now online at Haydenfilms.com. Voting continues through Nov. 15. The winner of the $10,000 grand prize will be announced later in November.

"It's truly an international film festival," Craddolph says. "We have top notch filmmakers sending in films. The production values are superb."

Aardman strikes again

By Roger Moore
The Orlando Sentinel

There's something about the Brits and their toilets. That's an obsession at the heart of "Flushed Away," a new animated film from the folks at Britain's Aardman Studios, the folks who gave us "Chicken Run" and "Wallace & Gromit."

"We do like a good loo joke, don't we?" notes "Flushed" co-director David Bowers.

"I was actually afraid of them as a small child," adds co-director Sam Fell.

And then there were the rats.

"Rats and toilets, they sort of go together, eh?" Fell says.

So "Flushed" started life as a trip down the toilet. In the movie, a pampered, lonely house-pet rat (voiced by Hugh Jackman) loses his digs to an interloper, who flushes him into a secret parallel London of imitation double-decker buses, shops, pubs and boats, all whipped up from everyday household items by inventive rats and frogs living down there.

"The real fun is filling this rat world with all these familiar objects," Fell says. "An egg whisk can become a waterbike, a passport can become, well, you'll have to look for that."

"We didn't want to make it too slick," Bowers says. "That's part of Aardman's charm."

It is. The studio — famed for its hand-modeled Plasticine figures, moved in tiny increments, and photographed, animated, stop-motion style — was setting a movie in a watery world of pipes and sweating walls and green, green sewage.

That is why this Aardman film, done for "Shrek" studio DreamWorks, looks a bit more like "Shrek" than anything they've done before. Blame it on the water, but Aardman isn't quite as hand-made as it once was.

"We wanted to do it all hand-crafted, with Plasticine," Fell says. "Building this elaborate set, all of it. But it would've taken years and cost a fortune, all that water, for instance. And it wouldn't have looked right.

"All that water," Bowers says. "Couldn't get it to look right. We had our hearts set on making this a complete world, detailed. It simply wouldn't have been possible to do with the traditional way."

So they modeled the characters by hand, and digitized them, computer-animating the film's extensive action (lengthy chases, through green water). But aside from that, it's vintage Aardman, the directors insist.

"Comedy is comedy," Bowers says. "And all the Aardman films, from the very beginning, have these references and jokes about earlier movies. That's all 'Chicken Run' was, really."

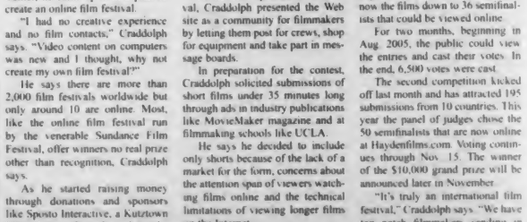
"What do we have here?" Fell asks. "James Bond, 'Risky Business,' Laurel and Hardy, Lara Croft. The chase, the sorts of jokes, they're universal, really."

That universality has been a reason for Aardman's success. After hitting it big with "Chicken Run," the studio had no trouble landing the voice talent it wanted here, from Jackman and Kate Winslet to Sir Ian McKellen, Jean Reno, Bill Nighy and the one-and-only "Gollum," Andy Serkis, who plays a rat thug.

"Oh, they're very British, in that way they love tinkering, all this hand-crafted looking and quirk[iness]," Serkis says. "And they give you the luxury of working with some of the voice actors you're appearing with. I did scenes with Bill Nighy (who plays a rat enforcer, named Whitey) in the booth, together, so that we could work out that whole Laurel and Hardy thing we did. It was funnier, and they went to the trouble to make it happen."

Bowers and Fell say there will "always be an Aardman," even if the studio has to adjust what it does to battle rising costs and rising ambition.

"I don't think the old ways, stop-motion animation, will go away," says Bowers. "But with so much water and so much depth to this world, so many characters, so much action, we really did need to go CG. All of Aardman's previous films showed smaller worlds, rural settings, really. This one is a city, a whole world, really. I can see simpler films with fewer characters and no water being stop-motion."



Hugh Jackman and Kate Winslet star as rats in Aardman Studio's newest animated film, "Flushed Away."

Rockstar Games' newest venture 'bullies' the competition

By Stephen Kushner

DAVIS, Calif. — While some people's high school memories are filled with parties and fun, others contain humiliating experiences students would rather forget. For those who remember daily wedgies and being stuffed in lockers, Rockstar Games' "Bully" provides a source of revenge.

Rockstar has come under fire for its highly controversial and sadistically fun "Grand Theft Auto" series. The company's latest game, "Bully" for PlayStation 2 can be described as "GTA" meets high school.

Recognizing the touchiness of school aggression and the fact that many adults believe mature video games are the work of Satan, Rockstar toned down the violence and rashness in "Bully" to produce a Teen-rated game.

The new rating does not mar the gamer's enjoyment. "Bully" is every bit as entertaining and even more hilarious. The main character, 15-year-old Jimmy Hopkins, is a no-good scoundrel who is sent to Bullworth Academy, a boarding school from hell, by his parents.

From the second Jimmy steps on campus, he is harassed by students and faculty. In order to survive, Jimmy must learn to hold his own at Bullworth, and kick some ass doing it.

Any fan of "GTA" will feel right at home playing "Bully." The story system is similar to other open-ended games. There is a main quest to accomplish, but also tons of secrets and side-missions that improve abilities.

Being at Bullworth is just like being at a real boarding school. There are various cliques that Jimmy must befriend or defeat, such as the nerds, jocks, greasers and preppies. The environment is huge, filled with over 100 other characters and a plethora of activities. One of the most interesting and unique parts of the game, however, is the fact that Jimmy must attend five different fun classes in order to learn new skills and fighting moves.

As the game progresses, the player has a wide variety of different missions to complete, such as helping out classmates and teachers and earning some spending money. The game is extremely deep and would probably take a good 40 hours to complete.

The graphics and sound in "Bully" are top notch for PS2, but nowhere near the levels of the next-generation systems like Xbox 360 or PlayStation 3. At this time, there is no plan to release "Bully" on any other systems.

Overall, "Bully" is a great game for the aging PS2. There are tons of tasks and the environment accurately depicts the feeling of being at a boarding school. Just watch out for the meathead jocks, go to class, and if Jimmy plays his cards right with the ladies, he may even get some.

Gamers will enter the mind of 15-year-old Jimmy Hopkins, a no-good scoundrel who has just entered Bullworth Academy in "Bully."

Hot Friars team visits Amherst

Junior P.J. Fenton and the Minutemen had their share of struggles against the Providence Friars last season. PC took all three games between the two teams by a combined score of 11-3.

said. "I think our guys finally understand that if you take a night off, you don't win."

The Friars earned their first conference win against BC, and their first against the Eagles since January 24, 2003.

"It's crystal clear that [the Friars] are plenty good enough," Cahoon said. "It wasn't about whether they were capable. It's just a question of how they were playing, and what their mindset was. Now that it's clear that they've got their act together we've got to get ours [together as well]."

The home-and-home series is the first of five the Minutemen will take part in this season, and the first of seven two-game sets against league foes. Cahoon said he prefers playing the same team twice in a row.

"It's easier than playing two different teams on the weekend," Cahoon said. "We had the struggle of playing [New Hampshire and Maine] last weekend, but we had a day in between, and that was a benefit. Some weekends we play one team on Friday night and another team on Saturday, and that is a challenge.

"The game ends on Friday night and there's no joy in Mudville, even if you win a game, because it's right back to work trying to break down and dissect another opponent that you haven't given that much thought to. At least this week we're dealing with the same opponent with similar criteria, except for the size of the rink."

One player that will factor into this weekend's matchup is the Friars' leading goal-scorer Colin McDonald. The senior's five goals are easily a team best. He scored a goal last year against the Mass Attack in a 4-2 victory for Providence.

"We'll try to match lines as best we can with McDonald and John Rheault and their more productive players," Cahoon said. "We just have to pay attention to who's on the ice and when they're on the ice. McDonald is an NHL-caliber prospect. Every team that plays against Colin McDonald is aware that he's in the lineup and when he's on the ice."

Goaltender Jon Quick was named UMass-Dinn. Brothers Co-player of the Week for helping lead the Mass Attack against a favored New Hampshire squad. Quick made 58 saves over the weekend, recorded a .935 save percentage, and a 2.02 goals-against average.

"Jon is a young person who has great athletic ability and is working on his game just like anybody else works on whatever they're devoted to," Cahoon said. "Jon is making good progress. My biggest challenge in that position is that I've got a very good back up in Danny Meyers, and I've got to figure out how I'm going to develop him while Jon is getting most of the starts."

Meyers played in one game so far this year, the season opener against Sacred Heart, making 18 saves on 20 shots. Regarding whether Meyers would be worked into the games this weekend, Cahoon was mum on the subject.

"I don't even care to go there right now," he said. "Right now, Quick is the guy that we're going to."

Providence has Mass Attack's number

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Most every team in sports has that one counterpart who always gives them trouble. For the Yankees, it's the Tampa Bay Devil Rays. Providence 2, 3 that one team the Massachusetts hockey team just couldn't get past last season.

No matter how close the Minutemen and Friars played on the ice, Providence always found a way to come out on top.

UMass gets its first chance to turn its luck this weekend in a home-and-home series that begins in Amherst tonight, and shifts to Providence tomorrow.

Last season the Friars took all three meetings from UMass. First in a home-and-home series on Nov. 4 and 5, and once more on Feb. 11 at Schneider Arena. Despite the Friars outscoring the Minutemen 11-3 in those contests, Providence relied on goals in waning minutes of the third period in two of those contests.

One of those occurred in the Friars' 4-2 win at Schneider Arena in the first meeting of the season. With the score tied 2-2 deep into the third period, winger Chris Davis ejected from the game for hitting from behind and the Minutemen were forced to play a man down for 10 minutes.

Providence took full advantage of the opportunity. Tony Zancanaro and Torry Gajda both tallied power-play goals put away the Mass Attack. The game at the Mullins Center the following night was just as close.

Play was controlled by the Friars until the Minutemen turned it on in the third period. Down 2-0 entering the final period, Chris Davis and Cory Quirk netted a goal each to tie the game. Providence's Cody Wild scored the winning goal with just over a minute remaining in the game.

"It's dawned on me that we struggled with them last year, but this is a different season and a different set of circumstances with our team constructed a little differently," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "In college hockey that's a year in year out proposition pretty much. I'll just try to keep it fresh. What we've done in the past against them has very little bearing. This is a good team we got to ready for them."

But Providence crept up on a lot of teams last year. Slated to finish in the lower middle of the pact last season, the Friars turned a lot of heads in Hockey East last year with their strong start. They were 9-6-1 before the break before a tapering off in the second half and finishing 17-16-3.

Cahoon attributes some of that early success to the hiring of Tim Army — who is now in his second year coaching Providence.

"Teams get spikes with new situations. When Timmy Army — a terrific coach, a very capable coach — went there they had the spike of a new coach, fresh ideas and a new set of circumstances," Cahoon said. "I think the whole team responds to that. Everybody has a fresh start. Teams benefit from that spike initially, and then after a while all those factors that coaches have to deal with come into play."

With Army's first season under his belt, things may be a little different in Providence.

"[Army's] honeymoon is over and he's coaching as he's capable of coaching on his own merit," Cahoon explained. "He's dealing with the same things that all of us that have been with a program for a while are dealing with."

With strong showings in the early going, Cahoon balked at saying his team could be this season's version of Providence last season. However, the first step towards that could be this weekend if the Minutemen can exercise their Friar demons.

Brady and Manning rivalry renews Sunday

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — Peyton Manning vs. Tom Brady. The unbeaten Indianapolis Colts vs. the New England Patriots, who have only one loss.

The hype vs. the reality.

There are plenty of subplots to Sunday night's game between two of the NFL's best teams — Adam Vinatieri's first against the team for which he kicked two Super Bowl winning field goals, Manning's struggles against the Patriots and Brady's growing comfort with his new receivers.

Floating above all that is the perception that it may be the NFL's biggest game so far this season.

"You would love to hype this thing up like it's the AFC championship, but it's really another game on the schedule," Brady said. "We're really not even halfway through the year."

But what about his matchup with Manning, the NFL's top-rated quarterback? Brady, after all, is coming off his best game — ever — a season — 372 yards passing and four touchdown strikes in a 31-7 rout at Minnesota.

"If that's what it takes to get people to watch the game or whatever, that's fine," Manning said, "but it will be about a lot more than that. It's about who blocks better, who tackles better."

There's no denying that the game is more important than most. And they'll have a good surface to play on. The Patriots put new turf up the middle third of the field, replacing the slippery, sandy surface that Patriots safety Rodney Harrison said, "was terrible, to say the least."

Indianapolis (7-0), New England (6-1) and Denver (5-2) represent the class of the conference. The only NFC team with a better record than those three is Chicago (7-0).

The Patriots lost to the Broncos 17-7 in the third game of the season. The Colts came from behind last Sunday to beat the Broncos 34-31 on Vinatieri's 37-yard field goal with two seconds left.

"That was the first time that I have had the opportunity to really, help the team out," said Vinatieri, who signed as a free agent after 10 years in New England. Could it come down to that on Sunday?

"It would be fun if it was that way," he said.

A New England win would tie the Patriots' best start through eight games. They were 12-1 in 2004 on their way to their third championship in four seasons.

"If you think things are going well and you need a measuring stick, this would be the game," Patriots linebacker Mike Vrabel said.

A victory by the Colts would make them the only team to start consecutive seasons at 8-0 since the 1929-31 Green Bay Packers did it three straight years. It also would give Manning and Tony Dungy the franchise record for most wins by a quarterback-coach tandem at 56-16. Johnny Unitas and Don Shula were 55-20-3.

"It's such an important game and it's been an important game every time we play these guys," Manning said. "What's happened in the past is really kind of irrelevant and who plays the best this Sunday night will win."

The teams will meet in Foxborough for the fifth straight time, including New England's wins in the 2004 AFC title game and the 2005 first-round playoff game.

Recent history is definitely on New England's side. Brady is 6-1 against the Colts, Manning is 3-10 against the Patriots, often looking confused by the defensive alignments.

But midway through last season, Manning threw for three touchdowns and 321 yards in a 40-21 win in Foxborough that ended the Colts six-game losing streak against the Patriots.

"He wasn't befuddled last year," Harrison said. "Maybe he struggled at particular times. We look for his best on Sunday."

Manning couldn't have been much better last Sunday when he threw for 345 yards and three touchdowns and led the Colts to scores on all five of their second half possession to overcome a 14-7 halftime deficit.

Dungy said Manning has improved since throwing an NFL record 49 touchdown passes in 2004.

"Since then, everybody has looked at us and done a good job of doing their homework to adapt and do different things," Dungy said. "I think that he's been more adaptable. He's taken care of the ball better every year, and really just has a better grasp of our offense every year."

Manning has thrown 14 touchdowns and just one interception in his last six games. The Colts have scored at least 30 points in each game. The Patriots haven't allowed more than 17.

"They play in front of you, make you make the turnover or miss a protection here and then they jump on it," Indianapolis tight end Dallas Clark said.

The Patriots simply bypassed Minnesota's strong run defense Monday night by passing over it. Now the circumstances are reversed. Indianapolis has given up the most yards rushing this season, so Brady is more likely to hand the ball off to Corey Dillon and rookie Laurence Maroney, a solid double threat.

But the focus will be on Manning and Brady, perhaps the two smartest, most accurate and hardest working quarterbacks in the NFL.

"You have two guys who get put in the showcase in just about every game because they do so much for their team. It's just the flavor that you like. Julius Erving or Larry Bird?" Dungy said. "They're both tremendous players."

Coach of Shea's caliber not easily replaced

Joe Meloni

NCAA Division I Athletics may be the single most stressful arena for its coaches. The job security of these coaches, or lack thereof, is well-documented. Every off-season, ESPN's "Bottom Line" lists a seemingly endless amount of hires and firings – many of which spark debate within the university, alumni and its fan base.

The coaches and players of the lesser-known sports typically avoid the scrutiny of the coaches and public at large that those in revenue sports experience. An athletic director rarely garners praise or criticism for the dismissal of a field hockey or volleyball coach.

If Patty Shea was merely a typical coach I wouldn't be writing this column. But to paint her as just another coach would be an injustice to Shea and the astounding resume she amassed as a player and a coach on not only the collegiate field hockey level – but the national scene as well.

The last five years for UMass field hockey have not been successful. There is no way to spin the lack of results in Shea's favor. The Minutewomen fell from conference powerhouse to just another one of the teams fighting for one of the three playoff spots behind Richmond in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

The decision that came down from the office of UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon around 3 p.m. yesterday was not made easily nor was it baseless.

But it was the wrong one.

Shea is one of the most respected names in field hockey and McCutcheon will be hard pressed to find a more suitable candidate to lead UMass field hockey into the future.

In a profession as small as field hockey coaching, not much more could appear on a resume than that of Shea. Not only was she an All-American for UMass in 1982 and 1983 but the A-10 named her its Coach of the Year in 1999 and 2000. Shea was the starting goalkeeper for the U.S. National Team from 1985-1996. Prior to her coaching stint at UMass, Shea was the assistant coach at Iowa.

In her ten years at UMass, Shea collected more than 100 wins and was inducted into the U.S. Field Hockey Association Hall of Fame in June of 2004. She won five A-10 Championships and appeared in the NCAA Tournament five times.

The program's recent struggles, more than anything, are a direct product of Shea's recruits not living up to the expectations of a player worthy of a full scholarship to an upper echelon field hockey program.

The best example of this is Gina Sanders. Plagued by injury from the time she arrived on campus, Sanders was never the player she could have been. In high school, Sanders received numerous awards and earned spots on several national all-star teams for her exceptional career.

Once she arrived at UMass her problems began and in four years in Amherst she scored just six goals while playing in 82 games. As a forward and someone who according to the UMass coaching staff "knows how to put the ball in the net," Sanders certainly did not live up to the hype she appeared upon the scene with.

The same could be said for goalkeeper Becky Letourneau. Before she was relegated to the bench, Letourneau surrendered 22 goals in just eight games – of the eight games she started in 2006, she finished just four. Entering her junior year, Letourneau looked to become a top goalkeeper in the A-10 and certainly had the tools necessary to do so. She just never made it happen.

Enter Sarah Williams, a freshman goalkeeper who, at times this season, looked like an All-American in the making. Who better to coach a young goalkeeper with the future of Williams than a former U.S. National Team net minder?

Aside from poor player performance, Shea's relationship with UMass is reason enough to retain her as coach. Shea loves this university and took a great deal of pride in representing it.

Recruiting on the international level, as Shea did while she was here, is certainly not a simple task. Players coming from foreign countries or even from across this country were comfortable with Shea because they understood the love she had for this school. They felt safe leaving home to play a game because they knew Shea would be there for them as more than just a coach but as a surrogate mother.

Whoever the successor McCutcheon hires happens to be, they will not be able to speak about UMass with the same level of endearment Shea did. In numerous player interviews, the players spoke of how much they loved Shea and how warmly she greeted them upon their arrival in Amherst. Coaching meant more to her than just winning. It was about the girls and the relationships she developed with them. And more importantly who they became while they were here.

College athletics have to be about more than winning – especially in smaller sports.

Now, as Shea and UMass go their separate ways, the question of what this program's identity is, must be asked. Shea was the woman to amend the downfall of this program, for no reason other than that the success of the program means everything to her.

If John McCutcheon can find someone that not only knows how to win, but can represent this program better than Patty Shea did then so be it. However, as Shea leaves UMass behind her, it is safe to say that at least one field hockey institution, collegiate or not, will hire one hell of a field hockey coach.

Shea's fondness for this university transcends her job as field hockey coach. She dedicated a large portion of her life not just to constructing a strong field hockey program, but enriching the lives of hundreds of young girls. Whether or not Shea's name still appears on the door of the UMass field hockey office is irrelevant. Patty Shea represents everything this university claims to be.

Simply put, Patty Shea is UMass field hockey. What is UMass field hockey without Patty Shea?

UMass needs strong performance

Although UMass should provide better competition than Springfield and Southern Connecticut, the Maroon and White is certainly not taking the Blue Devils lightly.

Newcomb knows that his team will have to swim at a high level if it wants to win.

"They've beaten us the last couple of years," Newcomb said. "But both of us have had good size graduating groups. So I think it will be a different meet because we stack up better against them this year than last year."

Don't expect the men's team to be taking its bye week lightly, or using the time to rest for the meet with BU. In fact, coach Russ Yarworth and his team are taking advantage of the extra week to train even harder than usual.

"In the season plan, these two weeks between meets are the hardest training weeks for us of the year," Yarworth said.

Even though UMass fell just short against Army last weekend, the Atlantic 10 honored Evan Swisher for his accomplishments at the dual meet. The conference named the senior captain its men's swimming and diving Performer of the Week.

Swisher took first place in both the 200-yard backstroke and the 200-yard individual medley. He also swam the first leg of the Minutemen's winning 200-yard medley relay.

Yarworth expects Swisher to have a very successful senior season.

"Evan's done a lot of hard work this year," Yarworth said. "He's swimming in a class of his own right now. He's always been able to swim well when he's tired and perform at a high level year round."

One area of concern for the Maroon and White is the physical condition of diver R.J. Rappe. The junior is out with an unspecified injury, but the team hopes Rappe will return in time for its dual against BU. He has produced consistent victories in both the one and three meter dive events.

Rappe became the first Atlantic 10 Diving Champion in UMass as a freshman during the 2004-05 season. He also holds the UMass three-meter dive record, which he beat by over 50 points.

Who owns the better dynasty?

Eli Rosenswaike

Sports fans everywhere revere the movies "Rudy" and "Hoosiers." We love these classics because it's fun to root for the underdog. Most people get sick and tired of seeing the same teams win every year. That's why just about everyone hates the New York Yankees.

Around this campus though, I don't think many people would have complained about the Boston Celtics dominance from 1959-1966. In that eight year span, the Celtics captured the NBA Championship each and every time. They were able to accomplish that feat for many reasons.

They had Red Auerbach. The Celtics' patriarch was the king of the league. Not only did he coach the team to eight straight titles, but he was in charge of acquiring the players as well. He completely ran the team in every capacity, and did it brilliantly.

Of course he couldn't have done it without his players. He had the best of his era in Bill Russell. Russell dominated the league with his size and strength, grabbing rebounds and swatting shots with an impressive fervor.

Along with Russell, the Celtics had perhaps the most influential point guard in league history with Bob Cousy. Known as the "Houdini of the Hardwood," Cousy was instrumental in the legendary streak Boston was able to muster.

No team has even approached the unprecedented run that Boston had in the '60s. It's highly improbable any team ever will, either. But with all due respect to the late Red Auerbach, his Celtics dynasty is not as impressive as the Chicago Bulls' in the '90s.

How could I possibly say that, you ask? Yes, I know that Chicago only won six championships in an eight year span – and never more than three straight. But what you don't know is the key issue in this argument. Let me give you a little history lesson.

The Celtics dominated the entire league in the '60s. But when you consider that the entire league consisted of a whopping eight teams, you have to take it with a grain of salt. Look at the Bulls, during their dynasty they had to contend with 28 other teams (26 for the first three titles, before Toronto and Vancouver, now Memphis, came in to the league), while the Celtics had to deal with just seven.

Consider the playoffs, as well. Boston had a much easier road to a finals appearance than Chicago had to deal with. With just eight teams in the league, there were only two rounds of playoffs. In today's modern game, 16 teams make the playoffs and a team has to win three series' just to reach the championship. It took just eight wins to capture the title for Boston, while their dynasty counterparts were forced to win double that amount.

Still not convinced? Can't get over the fact that Boston won eight, while Chicago only won six? Well, get over it. Let's face it, if Michael Jordan never retired (the first time) and try his hand at professional baseball – the Bulls would have won eight in a row as well.

The Houston Rockets, who won two straight titles during Jordan's hiatus, would have been no match for Chicago if the greatest player of all time didn't hang up his Nikes.

Yes, I said it – MJ is the greatest player of all time. There is no argument. Anyone who says otherwise is ignorant about the history of the game of basketball. I've heard some people around campus arguing in favor of Bill Russell or even Wilt Chamberlain. They couldn't be any more wrong.

Casual fans know Jordan as the most dynamic and prolific scorer in basketball history. What they don't know, however, is that Jordan was one of the best defensive players of all time. Air Jordan was named to the All-NBA Defensive First Team a record nine times. He received the Defensive Player of the Year award in 1987-88, as well.

Jordan has enough hardware to fill the Curry Hicks Cage. Five-time NBA Most Valuable player, six-time NBA Finals MVP, ten-time NBA All-First Team selection, league-record 10 scoring titles, two-times Slam Dunk Champion, and three-time All Star Game MVP.

He scored in double digits a record 842 consecutive times, he led the league in steals three times, he holds the record for most points scored in a playoff game with 63, posted the only triple-double in All-Star Game history, and the list doesn't end.

Jordan was inarguably the best offensive weapon in history, and arguably the greatest defensive guard of all time. In addition to this, he was undoubtedly the most clutch athlete anyone has ever seen. He has 34 game-winning shots to prove it, including the game winner in the 1982 NCAA National Championship game to fift North Carolina over Georgetown.

We may never again see a player with the ability, charisma, flair for the game, and sheer beauty that Jordan displayed on and off the hardwood. Not in a thousand years.

I digress from my original point, though. The Bulls' run atop the NBA world was better than Boston's. Let's not forget that Chicago played in an era of free agency, which made it so difficult to keep a team together. Although Jordan and his sidekick Scottie Pippen remained intact, their championship teams did go through some change.

Boston's teams with Russell and Cousy were a constant. Teams back then simply stayed the same. Jordan was able to lead and gel the influx of new players from championship season to championship season. They didn't get the continuity and stability that Boston was able to have.

I'm not here to discredit what Boston did under the legendary Red Auerbach. It was a remarkable accomplishment, and those Boston teams were among the best to ever play the game.

The majority of sports fans will continue rooting for the underdog, all the while rooting against the dynasty. After Red's death it's hard to root against the Celtics, but it's the Bulls' dynasty that remains supreme.

Michael Jordan (left) and Scottie Pippen led the Chicago Bulls to six NBA championships in the 1990s. Some feel that, had Jordan stayed, they could have won more and solidified the best dynasty in league history.

SPORTS WEEKEND

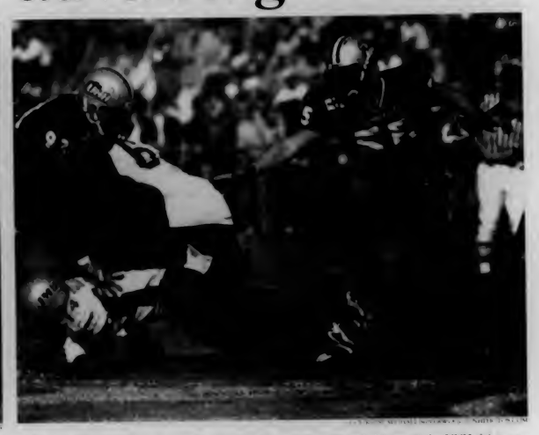
Rushing game: advantage UM

UMass running back Steve Baylark continues to garner accolades this season. On top of setting a career-high in rushing yards in a game, he has also surpassed the 1,000-yard mark for the fourth-consecutive season.



Stopping Baylark will be a focus for Brendan St. Peter (No. 55) and the rest of the UNH defense on Saturday. They haven't faired well against the run this season allowing 153.6 yards per game on the ground.

Steve Baylark collides with New Hampshire's struggling run defense

At the beginning of this season it looked as if UMass was going to approach games with their three-headed rushing monster. Senior Steve Baylark, graduate student Tim Washington and junior Matt Lawrence split carries for the majority of the first two or three games.

Since then it has been all Baylark. The senior is once again the featured back in the UMass offense, and he's showed why.

Last Saturday, he became just the third player in Division I-AA history to record 1,000 yards rushing in four seasons. He currently sits at 1,044 on the season with three games remaining.

Baylark has broken the century mark five times this season, including five of the last six games. He turned in a career-high 235 yards two weeks ago against Rhode Island.

There's no doubt that one of the main goals of the UNH defense this weekend will be taking No. 5 out of the game. But that's easier said than done, just ask the Towson Tigers.

The Tigers stacked the box constantly in their 35-0 loss to the Maroon and White on Oct. 14, but their efforts were futile. Baylark still cracked the 100-yard mark and allowed UMass coach Don Brown to open up the offense.

That is just as important as his personal production. When Baylark is on his game, the entire offense plays better. Quarterback Liam Coen knows that better than anybody. He threw for 303 yards and five touchdowns in that game against Towson.

UNH's road to victory will have to go through Baylark. Taking the running game away and effectively making a team one-dimensional is something every coach strives for.

But judging by the fact that Baylark is getting better as the year progresses, the Wildcats may find themselves looking at the back of No. 5 more often than not.

Jon Pelland

It's no secret New Hampshire has gotten it done all year by relying on its offense. Although it won them a close game last Saturday – a 10-6 victory over Hofstra in torrential downpours – the Wildcats' defense remains a liability.

This is especially true against the run.

UNH has allowed two 100-yard rushers. They were James Madison's Eugene Holloman and Delaware's Omar Cuff.

Holloman racked up 117 yards in the Dukes' win that knocked UNH from the top spot in the country. On top of his two rushing touchdowns, JMU scored two other times on the ground. This season the Wildcats have allowed three backs to score multiple touchdowns, none more than Cuff.

He outright torched UNH. Cuff scored four touchdowns for the Blue Hens in their loss to the Wildcats on Sept. 30. That number is reflected in the 15 rushing touchdowns they've allowed.

In all this season, the UNH defense hasn't put up enviable numbers against the run. It's allowed a total of 1,229 yards on the ground for an average of 153.6 per game. In addition to the two 100-yard performances, three other runners have gained at least 95 yards against the Wildcats.

The lowest total they held an opponent to was 42 yards. But that was against Dartmouth, a team they trounced 56-14.

UMass senior Steve Baylark is the best running back the Wildcats have faced thus far and probably will all year. Taking a look at these numbers, and the one's Baylark has tallied, the edge in this department has to go the Minutemen.

Last year he ran for over 100 yards and two touchdowns against UNH. It must be scary for the Wildcats to think that Baylark has only gotten better since then.

PC visits fresh off big victory

Fans at the Mullins Center Friday will be hoping for one big rebound, even though there will be no basketball that night.

The Massachusetts hockey team will look to bounce back from a 4-1 loss to Maine during a home-and-home series against another Hockey East rival, Providence.

UMass (7-1-1, 1-1 HEA) will host the visiting Friars (2-4-1, 1-1-1 HEA) Friday night at 7 p.m. in the Mullins Center before following its opponent home for a second game Saturday in Providence.

The Friars are coming off a 5-3 upset of No. 3 Boston College (4-2-0, 1-1-0 HEA) Tuesday night. UMass coach Don Cahoon felt that BC's loss was due to overlooking Providence after beating western powerhouse Wisconsin twice on the road.

"Sometimes, I think, you get a little full of yourself and you think you're better than you are," Cahoon said. "And then someone comes in and humbles you."

After stunning No. 8 New Hampshire last Thursday and then playing a close game against Maine for the majority of three periods, Cahoon wants to make sure the same doesn't happen to his UMass squad.

"If we put the work in during the week, it will translate into better play this weekend and every night out," Cahoon

See HOCKEY on page 7

Senior Matt Anderson and the Mass Attack will have their hands full with the Friars this weekend.

BASKETBALL RETURNS

UMass basketball is back at the Mullins Center this weekend. Both the men and women have exhibitions on Saturday. The Minutewomen take on Bishop's at 5 p.m. with the Minutemen following at 7 p.m. against Bridgeport.

Vengeance on UMass' mind

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Fresh off its win against Army last weekend, the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team takes to the water again on Saturday. The Minutewomen (1-0) travel to New Britain, Conn. to take on Central Connecticut State in a dual meet.

The men's team is off this weekend, taking advantage of the time to prepare for a meet with Boston University on Nov. 11.

For the second week in a row, the Minutewomen are seeking revenge on a team they lost to last season. CCSU defeated UMass in Amherst last season, 174-126.

But after defeating Army last weekend, the team looks to continue the pattern and extend its winning streak.

UMass coach Bob Newcomb hopes the momentum from last week's victory will carry over against the Blue Devils.

"I think our swimmers have more confidence from where we were last weekend," Newcomb said. "We swam well last week in a good environment and we're looking to just carry that over into this week."

Senior Liz Lovejoy performed well against Army. She took first place in the 100 and 200-yard freestyle events.

Sophomore Karen Upperco also had a good meet, winning both the one and three-meter dive.

Freshman Elizabeth Walsh, junior Allison Volpe and sophomores Taryn Prout and Christa Narus all had one win a piece last weekend.

Central Connecticut (8-1) is coming off two wins in a meet against Springfield College and Southern Connecticut. Juniors Rachel Brookman, Kristen Jurzynski and Lindsey Snyder each won two events for the Blue Devils.

The Blue Devils are members of the Northeast Conference and were picked to finish second behind four-time defending league champion Gardner-Webb.

The events that could give the Minutewomen trouble on Saturday are the two relays, the 400-yard freestyle and 200-yard medley. UMass split the relays with Army last weekend, but CCSU took first place in both.

See SWIM on page 8

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

Their 88-75 loss to the Philadelphia 76ers on Wednesday gave the Atlanta Hawks their eighth-straight loss in season openers. It is the longest such streak in NBA history.

A non-partisan coalition of faculty and student organizations at the University of Massachusetts registered more than 1,600 Massachusetts voters through the voter registration drive held between Oct. 2 and Oct. 18 for tomorrow's gubernatorial election.

Participants in the drive included the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP), the Student Government Association (SGA), MassPirg's New Voters Project and the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO).

Members of the SGA at UMass urged faculty and students to help increase student voting participation. The drive allowed unregistered students to register, and hundreds of students to complete absentee ballot forms and vote in elections in their home districts.

SGA Student Trustee, Mishy Leiblum commended the group's efforts to get students registered, and to successfully exceed the goal of 1,000 registrations.

"It is not that students don't care about voting, they don't know where or how to vote, and that's why this drive was so important to us," Leiblum said.

Moreover, with the help of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, over 50 faculty members were involved in the effort by making announcements during classes and spreading the word.

Stephen Gencarella Olbrys, Assistant Professor of communication at UMass said of MSP participation, "Right, left or center, Republican, Green or Democrat, a college student becoming a fully participating citizen feels like a success for her or his professors."

Stephen Gencarella Olbrys, Asst. professor.

The various organizations involved in the drive attracted students by stressing the five issues pertaining to public higher education: rising tuition, unfair fees, skyrocketing textbook prices, faculty shortage and unsafe buildings. They emphasized the need for student involvement to address these issues to the future Massachusetts governor.

"Public higher education can offer the Commonwealth enormous economic, scientific and cultural benefits, but it has been badly neglected," said Max Page, President of MSP and Associate Professor of architecture and history at UMass. "Regardless of partisan stripe, these new voters will support public education, and they will make public higher education a priority for their elected officials," he said.

On Tuesday, students will be voting on three questions about the sale of alcohol by grocery stores, the nomination of candidates for public office and family childcare providers.

MSP will invite the future governor of Massachusetts to UMass on Dec. 1 to discuss the problems, prospects and possibilities of public higher education in Massachusetts.

Bars crack down on fake IDs

Students encounter legal consequences

Turning 21 isn't as exciting as it used to be. Fake IDs are making it much easier for under-aged drinkers to buy alcohol or gain access into bars.

Most students at UMass won't turn 21 until their junior, or even as late as their senior year. Using a fake ID is a felony, and serious consequences can occur if the individual is caught. The state has made some changes over the years to make IDs harder and more expensive to reproduce by using holograms and lamination.

A UMass junior had his John Quincy Adams dorm room searched last year by the police. During this search, his fake ID making machine was discovered. According to this student, he had received the machine in the mail a week earlier, so no fake IDs had been produced and distributed to minors yet.

He said the IDs would have been from Virginia and would have cost anywhere from a $100 to $200. Consequently, this student had to go to court and pay lawyer fees. Charges were dropped, however, but he said he learned his lesson.

His advice for minors is, "Don't do anything illegal; it just makes life bad."

Most students who obtain fakes, either have counterfeit IDs made, or use copies of other people's licenses as their identification.

Patrick Archbald, Deputy Chief of the University of Massachusetts Police Department, said that both forms of ID are equally punishable, and the person will suffer the same consequences if caught.

"The license belongs to the state, whether numbers are changed or you falsely represent yourself, they are both falsifications, and the same consequences will occur," said Archbald.

Archbald wants students to realize they may be able to trick the bartender or the store clerk, but there is no way they will be able get past an officer. An officer on the street has five different methods in figuring out an under-aged individual's real identity.

If they come in contact with a fake ID, they will take it away. But if a person tries to identify themselves as the person on the ID, they will immediately be arrested and taken into custody. They will then have to get an attorney, go to court several times and have to pay court fees and other fines. The person will have

Study finds new link between binge drinking and wages

By Victoria Bekiempis
The Orange (Fla. South) Horning

(U-WIRE) TAMPA, Fla. – University of South Florida Associate Professor of Economics Jeffrey DeSimone along with Pinka Chatterji, a health economist at the Center for Multicultural Mental Health Research and an instructor in the department of psychiatry at Harvard's College of Medicine, have identified a correlation between high school binge drinking and increased earnings. Their paper, titled "High school alcohol use and young adult labor market outcomes," was published by the National Bureau of Economic Research in September, has created a buzz on college campuses.

DeSimone has taught economics at USF for four years, and said he and Chatterji decided to collaborate two years ago after realizing the similarities between their individual research into the relationship between binge drinking and educational achievement.

"Pinka and I had both done some work looking at the educational outcomes of drinking – that's one of my areas of research now – and Pinka had done some of that research in her dissertation," DeSimone said. "And so, sort of putting those two areas together would be this project – looking at teen drinking and teen education, looking at the effect of it on their labor-market outcomes."

Although previous studies have examined the correlation between drinking and wages, these studies were mainly concerned with adults. According to such studies, drinking was thought to be correlative with increased income, as it provided social capital in the form of networking opportunities. Another hypothesis maintained that drinking was associated with increased income as the activity signified expendable income in the first place. It was also thought that improved cardiovascular health often associated with drinking explained the relationship.

DeSimone and Chatterji's research differs from these other studies as it specifically examines the relationship between high school binge drinking and increased income levels.

"Most – if not all – studies that were previously conducted were looking at adult drinking and adult earning," Chatterji said. "Most were looking at the contemporaneous relationships between current drinking and current earnings, and we were looking at past drinking and its effect on future earnings."

Chatterji and DeSimone examined students who were approximately 16 years old in 1990 and who reported binge drinking at least once in the two weeks preceding an interview. The study then examined these same students' earnings 10 years later, DeSimone said.

"The coefficient on the past drinking while in high school variables is positive and pretty large," DeSimone said. "So it would imply that 26-year-old males who reported binge drinking at least once in the last two weeks as of the 10th-grade interview earn 6 percent more than others, all else equal."

DeSimone also said that he and Chatterji's study took other factors into account, such as achievement, prior income and adult drinking, which could possibly explain the correlation.

"So basically we thought we would answer these pathway variables, and eventually the effect would go away, but all it did was get stronger," DeSimone said.

The lack of explanatory variables led DeSimone and Chatterji to consider social factors, DeSimone said.

"We based upon our readings of some other studies and just talking to other people and just common sense," DeSimone said. "We just started guessing that this had to do with some socialness of these people. They're the ones who are social; they're the ones going to parties – drinking parties – in 10th grade,

Saddam, 2 co-defendants sentenced to hang

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein reacts to the verdict of his trial held yesterday under tight security in Baghdad's Green Zone.

By Steven R. Hurst
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Defiant, raging and arrogant to the end, Saddam Hussein trembled and shouted "God is great" as he was sentenced to hang, then walked steadily from the courtroom with a smirk on his face.

"Long live the people and death to their enemies. Long live the glorious nation, and death to its enemies!" Saddam cried out after the verdict, before bailiffs took his arms and walked the once all-powerful leader from the courtroom.

The hawk-faced chief judge, Raouf Abdul-Rahman, sentenced Saddam to the gallows Sunday for crimes against humanity, convicting the former dictator and six subordinates for a nearly quarter-century-old case of violent suppression in this land of long memories, deep grudges and sectarian slaughter.

Shiites and Kurds, who had been tormented and killed in the tens of thousands under Saddam's iron rule, erupted in celebration – but looked ahead fearfully for a potential backlash from the Sunni insurgency that some believe could be a final shove into all-out civil war.

A round-the-clock curfew imposed before the verdict helped avert widespread bloodshed, but police said 72 people were killed or found dead nationwide by daybreak, and worries grew about what will happen when the curfew is lifted.

The former Iraqi dictator and six subordinates were convicted and sentenced for the 1982 killings of 148 people in a single Shiite town after an attempt on his life there.

The nine-month trial had inflamed the nation, and three defense lawyers and a witness were murdered in the course of its 39 sessions.

Televised, the trial was watched throughout Iraq and the Middle East as much for theater as for substance. Saddam was ejected from the courtroom repeatedly for his political harangues, and his half-brother and co-defendant, Barzan Ibrahim, once showed up in long underwear and sat with his back to the judges.

With justice for Hussein's crimes done, the U.S.-backed Shiite prime minister called for reconciliation and delivered the most eloquent speech of his five months in office.

"The verdict placed on the heads of

Gay marriage discussion prompted by Mass. election

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gay marriage, one of the country's most volatile political issues, has taken a back seat to the race for governor in the only state where it's legal.

That changes in a hurry after Tuesday's election.

Just two days later, lawmakers are set to convene a constitutional convention, and advocates on both sides expect them to vote on a ballot question that would end gay marriage – unlike in 2002 when a similar question died for lack of action.

"We know we're headed into a dragon fight," said Arline Isaacson, of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus.

"There's nothing in it for anybody to delay it any further," said Larry Cirignano, executive director of CatholicVote.org, which opposes gay marriage.

In 2002, a question that would have amended the constitution to define marriage as between a man and a woman was effectively killed by former Senate President Thomas Birmingham, a gay marriage supporter, who adjourned the convention before a vote could be held.

Current Senate President Robert Travaglini said Friday that he will seek to debate and resolve every pending issue at the convention, and both sides believe there will be a vote on the gay marriage question.

"We are certain there's going to be a vote on this issue on November 9th," Isaacson said. "We need to prevail. It's very, very difficult because the hurdle is so high."

The question needs support from just 50 lawmakers – 25 percent – to move ahead to another constitutional convention in the next legislative session. If another 50 lawmakers approve it again in 2007, the question would go on the November 2008 ballot.

Lawmakers were expected in July to take up the question at the constitutional convention, but voted to adjourn until after the upcoming general election. The move left critics, including Republican gubernatorial candidate Kerry Healey, currently the state's lieutenant governor, claiming it was an effort to keep their vote out of the campaign.

"How incredibly cynical was that?" Healey told The Associated Press in a recent interview. "I think they have made it pretty clear that they don't want to deal with this issue, they don't want to held accountable to this issue."

Same-sex marriages began taking place in Massachusetts in May 2004 after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that the state's constitution guaranteed marriage rights to same-sex couples. Since then, more than 8,000 gay and lesbian couples have married. Gay marriage has not been a big issue in the governor's race, despite the differing views of the front-runners. Democrat Deval Patrick supports gay marriage, while Healey opposes gay marriage, but supports civil unions.

Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, decided not to seek a second term and is exploring a run for president.

Isaacson said that gay marriage advocates are "within striking distance" of the votes they need to kill the question at the convention, but conceded they don't yet have them. A win by Patrick and pro-gay marriage lawmakers could send a message that could change some votes, she said.

"There are some people who in their hearts and in their minds are with us," she said. "We just need to get the rest of their body to go with us."

Kris Mineau of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which opposes gay marriage, said gay marriage opponents have the needed 50 votes by a comfortable margin, and the election won't change that since newly elected lawmakers won't take office for two months.

A state-record 170,000 people signed the petition to get the question on the ballot, and sent a clear message to lawmakers that they want to vote on marriage, Mineau said.

"It's the only opportunity Massachusetts has to settle this once and for all," he said. "The people of Massachusetts have never had the chance to have their say on the definition of the most important institution in history."

Both sides plan intense lobbying in the final days before the convention and plan a major presence during the convention. The Catholic Church has exhorted parishioners to urge lawmakers to support the amendment, and gay marriage supporters have pushed back by trumpeting the support of hundreds of clergy.

If the question moves forward to 2008, Rob Henry of the Freedom to Marry Coalition of Massachusetts said he'd be optimistic same-sex marriage would survive, but also noted it has failed every time it's been put on the ballot elsewhere.

Gay marriage has benefited Massachusetts since it became legal in 2004, he said, and is a basic right that shouldn't be subject to a vote. He also said the people shouldn't have to endure the inevitably costly and nasty campaign that would precede the vote.

"I do not want to subject Massachusetts, I do not want to subject the GLBT communities to that kind of campaign," he said.

Mineau said the issue won't go away until it goes on the ballot.

"If it's not put to a vote, this will never be settled and the bitterness will remain," he said.

Mass. gubernatorial candidates Deval Patrick and Kerry Healey have differing views on gay marriage.

Taiwan's president denies scandal

By Annie Huang
Associated Press

TAIPEI, Taiwan — Taiwan's president refused to resign on Sunday and denied allegations that he and his wife had embezzled public money. But the opposition did not buy his defense and prepared to launch a new campaign to remove him from office.

President Chen Shui-bian's comments were his first since prosecutors indicted first lady Wu Shu-chen on embezzlement, forgery and perjury charges on Friday. She was accused of taking $450,000 from a special diplomacy fund in 2002-06.

Prosecutors said Chen could be implicated in the case, but he cannot be indicted as a sitting president.

The graft allegations have re-energized an opposition campaign to topple Chen, who has served for six rocky years and has 18 months left in his term. Thousands of protesters marched in the streets this weekend in Taiwan's two biggest cities. They honked air horns and carried signs reading, "End Corruption."

Chen said the accusations announced Friday were painful and felt like a "political death sentence."

"How can Chen Shui-bian be that kind of person, collecting false invoices to embezzle money?" he said Sunday in an hour-long televised address from the presidential office.

He refused calls to resign immediately but said: "If my wife is convicted, then because the prosecutors believe my wife and I act together, I cannot escape. I'm willing to resign before my term is up."

The president and his family have been dogged by corruption rumors for months, but the latest scandal blew up with Friday's indictment.

Taiwanese president, Chen Shui-bian and his wife, Wu Shu-chen, were accused of embezzlement, forgery and perjury Nov. 3, 2006.

Some 4,000 protesters gathered earlier Sunday to demand Chen's resignation, and the deafening sound of blaring air horns rose from the crowd marching through downtown Taipei toward the wide boulevard in front of the presidential office.

"The prosecutor's report was crystal clear," said Tsai Wen-chih, a computer engineer. "Without concrete evidence, would any prosecutor dare to accuse the president of corruption?"

Chen had better admit his errors."

said Peter Huang, a businessman. "The longer he tries to hang on, the more catastrophic his outcome will be."

In his address, Chen denied that he or his wife pocketed money from the special diplomatic fund and complained that the regulations for the fund were "confusing and difficult to follow." He then launched into a long, technical explanation about how the fund works, and he argued that the rules for using it needed to be more flexible.

Former KKK leader dies in prison

By Holbrook Mohr
Associated Press

JACKSON, Miss. — Former ku Klux Klan Imperial Wizard Samuel H. Bowers, who was convicted eight years ago of ordering the 1966 bombing death of a civil rights leader, died Sunday in a state penitentiary, officials said. He was 82.

He died of cardio pulmonary arrest, said Mississippi Department of Corrections spokeswoman Tara Booth.

Bowers was convicted in August of 1998 of ordering the assassination of Vernon Dahmer Sr., a civil rights activist who had fought for black rights during Mississippi's turbulent struggle for racial equality. He was sentenced to life in prison.

"He was supposed to stay there until he died. I guess he fulfilled that," Dahmer's widow, Ellie Dahmer, told The Associated Press on Sunday. "He lived a lot longer than Vernon Dahmer did."

Booth said that the Klansman died at approximately 11:30 a.m. in the Mississippi State Penitentiary Hospital in Parchman, a sprawling prison carved out of the cotton and soybean fields in the impoverished Mississippi Delta.

Dahmer, who championed equal voting rights for blacks, died at the age of 58 after being fire-bombed outside his Hattiesburg-area home on Jan. 10, 1966. The attack came after Dahmer announced that residents could pay their poll taxes at his grocery store, which was next to his home. The home and store also were torched.

When the Dahmer family awoke to honking horns in the pre-dawn hours that January morning, two carloads of Klansmen were waiting outside. They firebombed Dahmer when he exited the home, according to court testimony during a four-day trial in Forrest County Circuit Court in 1998.

Bar employees receive $25 bonus for finding fake IDs

a record for the rest of his or her life, which could ultimately cause problems when looking for a job.

John Korpita, owner of the Amherst Brewing Company, took a female customer to court for using a fake ID in his bar. When he first opened the bar in 1998, the girl entered the bar and was caught by an Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission (ABCC) investigator. The ABCC then charged the restaurant with serving alcohol to a minor. Typically, a bar will be forced to shut down or pay certain fines. Instead of sitting back and letting this happen, Korpita took the girl to court and sued her. He ended up winning, and the girl had to pay the owners $3,713.

"The person with the fake ID needs to take responsibility and the judge agreed," says Korpita.

He explained that if this were to happen today, the person would probably have to pay him close to $10,000 in fines because of how much his business has grown.

Workers at Amherst Brewing Company receive $25 for every fake ID they catch.

"Our philosophy is that we do the best we can; all our workers are trained, and we use the incentive of rewards if they discover a fake ID. It is hard to keep up, people have so many different kinds of IDs," Korpita said.

Korpita, as well as several workers at Liquors 44 of Hadley, Mass., said they notify the police if they find someone with a fake ID. They also said the person with the fake ID usually runs away.

Korpita said he has a business to run, and doesn't want to lose his liquor license by breaking the law. Over the years, he has seen bars in Amherst shut down due to the issue of underage drinkers.

"We don't have as much as a problem as other places; we maintain a reputation as harder to get into, and that's what we like," he said.

White House praises Iraq verdict

U.S. President George W. Bush speaks to the media about the verdict of the Saddam Hussein trial, at Waco TSTC airport in Texas, yesterday.

the former regime does not represent a verdict for any one person. It is a verdict on a whole dark era that was unmatched in Iraq's history," Nouri al-Maliki said.

The White House praised the Iraqi judicial system and denied the United States had been "scheming" to have the historic verdict announced two days before American midterm elections, widely seen as a referendum on the Bush administration's policy in Iraq.

President Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"It's a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government," the president said.

"Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come," he added.

But symbolic of the split between the United States and many of its traditional allies over the Iraq war, many European nations voiced opposition to the death sentences in the case, including France, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Sweden. A leading Italian opposition figure called on the continent to press for Saddam's sentence to be commuted to life imprisonment.

Lost in the drama of Sunday's death sentence was any mention of the failed search for the alleged weapons of mass destruction that Bush said led the United States to invade and occupy Iraq in March 2003.

Saddam was found hiding with an unfired pistol in a hole in the ground near his home village north of Baghdad in December 2003, eight months after he fled the capital ahead of advancing American troops.

Twenty-two months later, he went on trial for ordering the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shiites from the city of Dujail. Hussein said those who were killed had been found guilty in a legitimate Iraqi court for trying to assassinate him in 1982.

Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and intelligence chief during the Dujail killings, was sentenced to join the former leader on the gallows, as was Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, which issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents.

Iraq's former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was convicted of premeditated murder and sentenced to life in prison.

Three defendants were given up to 15 years in prison for torture and premeditated murder. Abdullah Kazim Ruwayyid and his son, Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, were party officials in Dujail, along with Ali Dayih Ali. They were believed responsible for the Dujail arrests.

A local Baath Party official Mohammed Azawi Ali, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

In the streets of Dujail, a Tigris River city of 84,000, people celebrated and burned pictures of their former tormentor as the verdict was read. In Baghdad, the Shiite bastion of Sadr City exploded in jubilation.

But in Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, not far from Dujail, 1,000 people defied the curfew and carried pictures of the city's favorite son through the streets. Some declared the court a product of the U.S. "occupation forces" and condemned the verdict. Policemen wept in the streets.

"By our souls, by our blood we sacrifice for you, Saddam," the Tikrit crowds chanted.

A trial envisioned to heal Iraq's deep ethnic and sectarian wounds appeared rather to have deepened the fissures.

"This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands, whose blood will be shed," Salih al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told Al-Arabiya satellite television.

The death sentences automatically go to a nine-judge appeals panel, which has unlimited time to review the case. If the verdicts and sentences are upheld, the executions must be carried out within 30 days.

A court official told The Associated Press that the appeals process was likely to take three to four weeks once the formal paperwork was submitted. If the verdicts are upheld, those sentenced to death would be hanged despite Saddam's second, ongoing trial for allegedly murdering thousands of Iraq's Kurdish minority.

"The problem really is that this tribunal has not shown itself to be fair and impartial – not only by international standards, but by Iraqi standards," said Sonya Sceats, an international law expert at the Chatham House foreign affairs think tank in London.

Hussein's Sunni supporters, the bulk of the insurgency that has killed the vast majority of American troops in Iraq, could still explode in violence once the open-ended curfew is lifted in coming days.

But the former leader's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, told The Associated Press his client had called on Iraqis to reject violence and refrain from taking revenge on U.S. invaders. "His message to the Iraqi people was 'Pardon and do not take revenge on the invading nations and their people,'" al-Dulaimi said.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a statement saying the verdicts "demonstrate the commitment of the Iraqi people to hold them accountable. ... closing the book on Saddam and his regime is an opportunity to unite and build a better future."

U.S. officials who advised the tribunal on standards of international justice said Hussein's repeated courtroom outbursts may have played a key part in the convictions. They cited his admission in a March 1 hearing that he had ordered the trial of the 148 Shiites, insisting that was legal because they had conspired to kill him.

"Where is the crime? Where is the crime?" Saddam asked the five-judge panel then.

Later in the same session, he argued that his co-defendants must be released and that because he was in charge, he alone must be tried. His outburst came a day after the prosecution presented a presidential decree with a signature they said was Hussein's approval for death sentences, their most direct evidence against him.

Evangelical leader admits to 'immorality'

By Colleen Slevin
Associated Press

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — Saying that he was a "deceiver and liar" who had given in to his dark side, the Rev. Ted Haggard confessed to sexual immorality Sunday in a letter read from the pulpit of the megachurch he founded.

The disgraced former president of the National Evangelical Association, which represents 30 million evangelical Christians, apologized and said "because of pride, I began deceiving those I love the most because I didn't want to hurt or disappoint them."

"The fact is I am guilty of sexual immorality. And I take responsibility for the entire problem. I am a deceiver and a liar. There's a part of my life that is so repulsive and dark that I have been warring against it for all of my adult life," he said.

Haggard, 50, resigned last week as NEA president, where he held sway in Washington and condemned homosexuality, after a man claimed to have had drug-fueled homosexual trysts with him. Haggard also placed himself on administrative leave from the 14,000-member New Life Church, which he founded in the 1980s. Its independent Overseer Board fired him Saturday.

The letter was read to the New Life Church by another clergyman, the Rev. Larry Stockstill, senior pastor of Bethany World Prayer Center in Baker, La., and a member of the board that fired him. Neither Haggard nor his wife, Gayle, attended.

In his letter, Haggard said "the accusations made against me are not all true but enough of them are that I was appropriately removed from his church leadership position."

He did not give details on which accusations were true. Haggard had acknowledged on Friday that he paid Mike Jones of Denver for a massage and for methamphetamine, but said he did not have sex with him and did not take the drug.

The Overseer Board made up of clergy from various churches used stronger language.

"Our investigation and Pastor Haggard's public statements have proven without a doubt that he has committed sexually immoral conduct," the board said in a statement.

At the New Life Church, youngsters were sent from the room before elders began discussing the church crisis.

"Worshippers are always challenged by crisis. And when tragedy and crisis strikes it is at that moment that you truly decide if you are a worshipper of the most high god. And today as the worship pastor of this church I am very proud of you," said the Rev. Ross Parsley, who has replaced Haggard.

Ryan Price and his fiancee, Karen Geyer, were impressed. "It seemed genuine ... from the heart. It's unfortunate but it happens," said Geyer.

"He's reaching out and asking for forgiveness," said Price.

Jones, who said he is gay, said he was upset when he discovered who Haggard was and that New Life opposed same-sex marriage – a key issue in Colorado, with a pair of issues on Tuesday's ballot.

"I am sad for him and his family. I know this is a tough day for him also," he said in a telephone interview Sunday. "I wish him well. I wish his family well. My intent was never to destroy his family. My intent was to expose a hypocrite."

The scandal has disappointed Christian Conservatives, whom President Bush and other Republicans are courting heavily in the run-up to Tuesday's election.

Many were already disheartened with the president and the Republican-controlled Congress over their failure to deliver big gains on social issues even before the congressional page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley.

Haggard, who had been NEA president since 2003, has participated in conference calls with White House staffers and lobbied Congress last year on Supreme Court nominees.

Associated Press reporter Robert Bellemy Downey contributed to this report.

High school teachers attribute drinking habits to social traits

so maybe they're entrepreneurial in the sense that they're less risk averse. You know, in the long run, you would think, the entrepreneurs are going to be the ones who have the real high wages."

Chatterji agreed that the result is most likely due to personality traits like extroversion.

"We speculate that it's probably not a causal association," Chatterji said. "It could be that people who binge drink in high school have certain characteristics that we can't measure very well in the secondary data set."

DeSimone cautioned, however, that teenage binge drinking does not equate to higher wages.

"Remember that correlation does not imply causation," DeSimone said. "We don't believe that this means that because they drink in 10th grade. Males are 10 years later more likely to earn higher wages.

"We think that certainly it's something, some other factor that we can't control, that we're just identifying. So it's not that they drink (and) they earn more wages. The drinkers have these other qualities, and so it just emerges, the fact that they're drinking."

Researchers say that teenage binge drinking does not equate to higher wages.

For years, politicians and groups have been trying to encourage younger generations to vote. Facebook.com, one of the most popular social networking Web sites for college and high school students, has now jumped on the bandwagon in trying to inform and represent young voters.

Facebook has created a new feature called "Election Pulse." There, data is presented which represents the percentage of members who have supported certain candidates. According to Ezra Callahan's Blog, Facebook engineer and product manager of Election 2006, the program was formed to "make your voices heard and engage with candidates before you cast your vote."

Facebook members are able to support a campaign or join a group in favor of a contender through the "Election Pulse" feature. The program enables campaigns to inform supporters about campaign events or fundraisers. Last week, supporters of Deval Patrick received a message about a rally in Worcester, which featured Bill Clinton, Patrick and Tim Murray. The information would not have been as readily available for high school and college students.

Rafi Goldberg, a recent graduate of Tufts University, works as the administrator of the Patrick and Tim Murray for Massachusetts group. When asked what he thinks about Facebook as a campaign tool, Goldberg says that, "With a few clicks of the mouse, we have the ability to remind thousands of our supporters to go out and vote on Tuesday, and that's a wonderful thing."

Goldberg added that Facebook helped students who wanted to volunteer for the Patrick campaign, but didn't know how. "I have received many messages over the past months from people who are curious about how to go about volunteering, and event postings have definitely brought in people that the campaign wasn't reaching before."

"Election Pulse" also calculates how a candidate is doing according to the number of users who are supporting each one. Patrick is leading ahead of his Republican opponent, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, by about 65 points, while all Democrat contenders are leading in the Congressional races. The current winners on Facebook seem to be the predicted outcomes in tomorrow's election, albeit not by such a wide margin.

The support for certain campaign issues provides a look at what really matters to this generation.

Facebookers can also support and create campaign issues, probably the most effective feature the Web site has in regards to the election. Even though Facebook is open to all, the core members are still young professionals, recent college graduates, college students and high school students. The support for certain campaign issues provides a look at what really matters to this generation.

On one hand, the top 25 most supported campaign issues make it seem like our generation has it together – most topics are real issues politicians should address once elected. For example, the issues "Legalize Same-Sex Marriage," "Americans for Alternative Energy," "Aids/HIV Research" and "Save Darfur!" are all ranked amongst the top 25 campaign issues.

On the contrary, economy, immigration and the Iraqi war, which are the main concerns of the majority of Americans, according to the Washington Post, are not amongst the most supported campaign issues.

Unfortunately, the campaign issue with the most support is "Reduce the Drinking Age to 18!" Yes, Facebook is a fun, social networking Web site, so people will support frivolous groups such as "Colbert for President," which is also among the top 25 most supported. But the fact that "Reduce the Drinking Age to 18!" is the most supported, by over 100,000 members, is a sad reflection on what matters to our age group.

Hopefully, the topic is not an apt reflection on what is the greatest concern for the majority of our generation. Joining a Facebook group about an issue doesn't necessarily have an effect, but it definitely has the potential. Just as many employers check an applicant's Facebook profile, politicians could use the Web site as a tool as well. An instrument like Facebook has the potential for being revolutionary for politicians.

The Web site provides a core demographic, where officials can track what matters to a targeted group – Internet savvy, mostly young individuals. So, why don't we use the Web site to represent us as best we can?

Our generation needs to pay more attention to politics, local, national and international. Facebook is an excellent source to express what concerns people have, find out what issues your senators or representatives support and also gives a medium for students to get involved with issues that are important to us. The election will be over tomorrow, but political issues will not cease to exist. If you haven't already, get on Facebook and get informed.

The fight to control you

It shouldn't come as a surprise to anyone that the news media is no stranger to bias. Just ask the affiliates of the Sinclair Broadcasting Group; corporate ownership of network news stations hinders impartial journalism.

According to Sinclair's Web site, the broadcast group "owns and operates, programs, or provides sales services to 58 television stations in 36 markets. Sinclair's television group reaches approximately 22 percent of US television households and includes ABC, NBC, CBS, FOX and CW affiliates."

The deregulation of Federal Communications Commission (FCC) standards permits corporations to own multiple stations, a luxury that was not afforded in the past. This allowance gives companies the opportunity to influence the news market on a far greater scale.

Every day on Sinclair's stations, Mark Hyman, Vice President for Corporate Relations at the Sinclair Broadcasting Group, gives a one minute segment called "The Point." This centralized news broadcast is the only fragment left of Sinclair's botched, "News Central," which packaged news to be aired on all its stations.

What this means is simple, the Pentagon will be adjusting the news we receive so that Donald Rumsfeld can get some sleep at night.

"The Point," is a radically Conservative commentary, courtesy of Hyman, that is broadcast by the corporation that owns the most television stations in America.

"Media Matters for America," a media watchdog group, created a blog aptly named "The Counterpoint," used to track the inaccuracies of Hyman's politically charged accusations. In addition to attacking "The Point," Media Matters is highly critical of the broadcast group as a whole.

In 2004, Sinclair forbid eight ABC stations from airing an episode of "Nightline" that honored 721 soldiers killed in Iraq. The Sinclair Group stated that, "The action appears to be motivated by a political agenda designed to undermine the efforts of the United States in Iraq."

An idea echoed by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who according to an article in the AP News Wire, "Has complained bitterly that the press focuses too much attention on bad news coming out of Iraq, and not enough on progress being made there."

An assertion that is being fixed via a memo the AP News Wire obtained from the Pentagon explaining that, Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, said new teams of people will "'develop messages' for the 24-hour news cycle and 'correct the record.'"

What this means is simple: the Pentagon will be adjusting the news we receive so that Rumsfeld can get some sleep at night. Are you sick and tired of hearing casualty statistics from Iraq, that former Secretary of State James Baker's Panel has ruled out an American victory and that the nation is in complete chaos? Good thing the Pentagon will be on top of "setting the record straight."

According to BBC news, "The unit would reportedly monitor media such as web logs and would also employ 'surrogates,' or top politicians or lobbyists who could be interviewed on TV and radio shows." Basically, the White House propaganda machine has just been taken up a notch.

If you weren't already finding it difficult to locate an objective news source before the Pentagon decided to infringe on the media, good luck finding one now. With the media bending over backwards for the White House, and Sinclair Broadcasting Group controlling the airwaves, does the American public really need anyone else pushing its politics under the farce of news?

I watch the news every day, and we are already getting shafted by the media's coverage of Iraq. Last month was one of the deadliest: 101 American soldiers died in the 30 days preceding the midterm elections. Vice President Dick Cheney attributes those statistics to terrorists upping the ante for the midterm elections. In an interview with Fox News, Cheney claims "insurgents were using the internet to time their attacks," but according to BBC news, "he did not provide any evidence to that effect."

Instead of focusing their attention on Iraq, the media has taken to reporting incessantly on Sen. John Kerry's botched joke mishap. Kerry is not running for office, Kerry's apology was accepted by the White House and the stupid things Kerry says are honestly not that important in the realm of things. America is at war, it's time to shift focus. If the media doesn't step up, the White House will.

In a "Meet the Press with Tim Russert" interview, Sen. Barak Obama quoted an argument between Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York and a colleague which ended on this note: "Well, you know what, Pat? You're just entitled to your own opinion and I'm entitled to mine."

"And, and Moynihan frostily, I-I'm sure, says, 'You are entitled to your opinion, but you're not entitled to your own facts.'" Never has that been more relevant.

Once upon a time

Dan Nicastro

With the midterm election just one day away, political advertisements are out in full force. These ads are meant to convince ordinary people to take time out of their lives to vote for one candidate or another: they also usually utilize a moral, or some catchy slogan – similar to fairy tales.

This got me thinking. If modern campaign ads are stories trying to scare people into behaving/acting a certain way, then fairy tales could be an effective form of propaganda. This seems like an untapped advertising market, so I have decided to stake my claim in the arena of political fairy tales, hoping to teach a moral.

Once upon a time, there lived a king. He was not the best king, nor the smartest, nor the shrewdest, nor the most diplomatic, nor the best candidate, but he was still the king. Had the people been allowed to democratically elect their king, he probably would not have been chosen, but they were stuck with him and he was stuck with them.

The king knew a lot of people didn't think he was very bright, or shrewd or even a good king, so he decided to try and change that. "Everyone likes war," he thought to himself. "I'll just start a war, and everyone will love me, heh heh heh." After hours of snickering to himself, the king called together his top advisors to figure out what to do.

After much consulting, the king and his men decided to tell the people that a country far, far away had a very evil leader who was stockpiling deadly weapons to attack the kingdom, and they needed to be stopped. It was the perfect idea. The king could see no problems, as his subjects were afraid of the big bad leader and his big bad weapons. Everything was going so well.

However, the plan quickly spun out of control. At first, it was easy for the king to round up the nay-sayers and chop off their heads, but things became more complicated when even his supporters began to question his actions. After much soul searching, the king decided that mass execution was probably not the way to win over the hearts and minds of his people. Therefore, he called together his top advisors and those who controlled the local media to discuss what to do, and they decided that fear would be the best way to control the peasants.

The king could see no problems, as his subjects were afraid of the big bad leader and his big bad weapons. Everything was going so well.

The king's minions began a ruthless campaign to forcibly control the peasants. It worked great at first. The king's advisors told the people that those who disagreed with the king were obviously the enemy. The media barons cried in the streets about imminent attacks on the kingdom and the need for preventative measures. These tactics worked. The people gladly gave up any rights they had earned over the last 200 years in exchange for protection.

This didn't last either. After a while, people started to realize those who disagreed with the king were not working with the enemy, and they wanted the rights they had given up to be restored.

This was not good news for the king. He had tried everything to keep his absolute rule over the people, and nothing had worked. He thought long and hard about his subjects.

"Why won't they stay afraid?" he rhetorically asked his mirror. Out of nowhere, his mirror responded. "Tell people it's a witch or something. Everyone hates witches." Although startled that his mirror was talking to him, the king agreed and called together his advisors and the media moguls to tell them the good news.

"By George, the king has figured it out," commented his advisors.

Armed with fear mongering and malice, the king's minions and media moguls set out on a smear campaign to lure the witch out. They told the peasants she cast a spell meant to annihilate their way of life, and that she was an enemy who needed to be destroyed.

This spell had made people believe the reasons for war were not valid, and the king's administration was using fear as a political tool. She wanted to do outrageous things like raise taxes, provide health care and let anyone marry, even the ogres from across the river.

The campaign worked, as the witch was drawn out into the open, looking to do battle with the king. Thanks to his magical mirror, the king was ready for her. "Witch," he called out, "there will be no more spells on my people."

By this point a crowd had gathered. The king was so focused, he didn't notice.

She responded angrily, saying "I haven't been casting any spells. I was afraid you'd bomb me."

The peasants began to whisper amongst themselves, contemplating this statement. Perhaps this meant the witch was not part of the enemy, and the king was only using her as a political scapegoat for the failures of his reign. Somebody stood up and asked the king if this was true.

Not being a particularly bright king, he snickered and answered "Yes. Me and my mirror made the whole thing up, and I fooled all of you." He heard people laughing at him, and realized he had given his plot away (and the fact that he received advice from his mirror). After several seconds, he spontaneously combusted due to the amount of hot air he was giving off.

The people rejoiced as the reign of terror was over. The advisors and media moguls were run out of town, and everyone lived happily ever after. If only fairy tales were real.

The moral of the story? Vote Democrat.

Living up to standards

Lauren Modisette

The media plays a large roll in our everyday life. Unfortunately, its affects tend to lean more on the negative side.

These days, magazines and commercials portray individuals who have fallen into the category of beautiful. What truly is beautiful anyway?

Is it the slightly overweight girl with ratty hair who sits next to you in that boring Gen Ed? Or that scrawny guy who sits across the room with oily hair, acne and crooked teeth? How about that gothic chic in all black that clashes with your preppy Hollister style? You're probably thinking of some people who fit these descriptions, and are chuckling as you think to yourself, "hell no."

My question to you is, why not? Why are these kinds of people not considered beautiful? There is beauty everywhere in our world and yet, we are a culture that refuses to see it. Unfortunately, a major contributor to the discomfort and low self-esteem our country experiences is directly associated with the media.

The media is a deadly weapon forced upon every single individual who has been through the torture of high school, watches television and reads magazines. As we become a country dubbed as fat, we begin to see the media pulling American citizens in two different directions.

We are the founders of fast food and microwavable dinners. When foreigners consider the American people as a whole, they envision a group of overly fat, lazy people whose daily goal is to wait in line at the local "McDonald's" for a Big Mac or two.

Watching TV, you are overcome by the plethora of advertisements. Among these are commercials for beer, liquor, fast food, diet pills, make-up, "Barbie" dolls and apparel. A majority of the media seems to be pressuring us to be thin with the ads for diet pills and lanky models with gorgeous faces. Yet, at the same time, we are overwhelmed with commercials for "McDonald's" and similar franchises along with pizza, candy and other fatty foods.

How many of you are taunted by the diet pill[1] commercials that look so real and made-work (haven't you heard of Photoshop and airbrushing)? How many of you actually look like those girls in the "Cover Girl" commercials and the advertisements for "Victoria's Secret" or are the typical "Abercrombie" guy? Not many.

Why must we live up to someone else's idea of beauty? Now we even have an easy, yet pricey, solution to make ourselves socially beautiful with extremities like plastic surgery.

Not to be corny, but take Ashley Simpson as an example. This girl was never ugly. She had unique features which distinguished her from her ditsy sister and made her real. Now she is a plastic mess. Since her debut, she has undergone several plastic surgeries that now make her look more fake than "Barbie."

Now we have hospital soaps on TV, like "Nip/Tuck," which just enforce the idea that plastic surgery is revolutionary and amazing. These days, it seems odd if someone is completely comfortable with their bodies and can find nothing they want to change.

It is illogical for us to take the media so seriously. Yet, the people seem to willingly embrace its messages and ideas of what kinds of people are attractive. Isn't everyone attractive in their own way?

On another note, we label people with anorexia and bulimia as mentally ill. How can we call these people mentally unstable when it is clearly not their fault they think this way? The media has such a subliminal power on people it is driving them into mental institutions and causing them to severely damage themselves.

Would any of you guys or girls be willing to be with someone you have no physical attraction to? Would you rather be with a slightly awkward, intelligent, down-to-earth character or a beautiful, stupid, malevolent individual?

I know most of you opt for the latter, and that's understandable and not your fault. Eventually, I feel like there won't be a single person who could live up to the standard.

Where are the guidelines for being beautiful? Where does it say how big your nose should be or the placement of your cheekbones or how far your chin should stick out? The media has encrypted all these ideas into us since we were kids playing with "Barbie" dolls and "G.I. Joe's."

Among the problems our world has, we all need to begin to embrace the beauty in everyone and everything. We should, for once, get past the fact that everyone isn't super model material, and is gorgeous in his or her own unique way.

Delicious Disco feeds hungry Biscuit crowd

'Bisco' fever struck Northampton on Friday night as hundreds of Biscuit heads flocked to The Calvin for a show of psychedelic proportions.

The Calvin Theatre held a crowd on Friday, Nov. 3, that the colonial-style building never anticipated to entertain. The Disco Biscuits and their fans overran Northampton and the theatre.

As the lines slowly filed in, it was apparent that this was a far different crowd than the building wouldn't generally house. As "Hisco heads" made their way into the venue, wide-eyed in anticipation, everyone was anxious to get in to see their performance.

By the time The Disco Biscuits came on stage, nearly half the fans were still trying to get into the venue. Once they recognized that they missed the band's grand entrance, people started pushing more, trying to get in and find their musical release.

The entire theatre was filled with smoke from the fog machines that made the purples, blues, reds and greens from the strobe lights pierce through the air. Every once in a while you caught a whiff of an unauthorized substance that disappeared into the fog.

During the first set, it was relatively easy to get down into the orchestra pit and out of the seated area where, theoretically, there would be more room to move around and dance. Although, the way it always works out is you have a minimal amount of personal space as you float through the ocean of dancers. Every once in a while, you would look up and wonder how you ended up on the other side of the dance floor.

Bisco played a stellar first set that included the songs "Helicopters," "Mulberry's Dream," "Sweating Bullets," "Spy" and "King of the World." The set break came as a surprise to many fans who couldn't understand how the band could stop after playing such an incendiary set.

The Disco Biscuits' style of music is new and revolutionary to the music industry. They call it "trance/fusion" which incorporates a deep, heavy baseline with a xylophone, guitars, drums, occasional percussion and some techno. On Friday evening, they had a guest percussionist playing with them, Sean Hennessy, who signed on for the first five shows of the tour.

The band's second set was just as incredible as the first, if not better. They started off playing "House Dog Party Favor" and jammed into "Cyclone" before moving back into the first song. They threw in a tease of "The Safety Dance" between "Boom Shanker," "Spray Paint" and "Shelby Rose." There was one "serious fan" whose only request that evening was for a "serious Safety Dance." The band's bassist, Marc Brownstein's response to this was, "Safety Dance is anything but serious."

UMass student John Frazier, the "serious fan," said "that show brought out the little kid in me. I felt like I was in high school again, I was so excited. I can't stop thinking about it."

The security was heightened during the second set, and they sifted through the people on the floor looking for the fans who climbed over seats to get in. Every once in a while you would see a person or two being yanked from the dancing crowd back into the seated area. When speaking with the head of security, he exclaimed, "this is the sketchiest crowd [the Calvin has seen]. If only their parent's knew all that they're doing."

For an encore they played an explosive "Munchkin Invasion" and left their fans with an astounding rendition of "Run Like Hell" by Pink Floyd.

The band's new drummer, Allen Aucoin, rocked out the entire time giving Bisco a new and refreshing flavor. During an interview before the show, Aucoin was more than willing to answer questions about his new rock-star status. When I inquired why Brownstein didn't answer a question or two, his response was, "because Allen has about 500 more interviews to do before he catches up to us."

The band's former drummer, Sam Altman, is currently attending medical school to become a doctor, but has popped up at random shows to pass out shots of whiskey to his old friends.

The band exclaims that Aucoin gives its music a new sound and energy. He is thrilled with his new rock-star status, and only misses one thing from his old average everyday life: his wife. After inquiring about the possibility of the down-side of touring, he mentioned that at times it is rather

Niyaz breaks cultural boundaries

By Morgiannn Rousseau
Collegian Staff

Bowker Auditorium welcomed a performance by Niyaz, an internationally renowned musical group that offers a unique fusion of ancient Persian and Urdu poetry with modern electronica remixing.

After their set Niyaz vocalist, Azam Ali, gave thanks to the audience, and offered the band's heart-felt hope that people of all different heritages not lose touch with their cultural roots.

On Friday night, Niyaz performed their unique blend of traditional Middle-Eastern music and modern electronica at Bowker auditorium in coordination with the Asian Arts and Culture Program. The show was a graceful reflection of the multiple cultural and artistic lenses brought to the forefront by the musicians of Niyaz.

Multi-instrumentalist Loga Ramin Torkian started off Niyaz's set with a guitar viol solo. What began with Torkian's intricate finger work steadily grew into a rhythmic magnetism as tabla player Satnam Ramgotra added his cadent percussion.

Electronic mixer Carmen Rizzo set the heavy overtones that hovered slow and steady over the instrumentation. Regardless of the enchanting instrumental introduction, it was hard to be distracted away from the presence of vocalist Azam Ali, who stood center stage and silent.

Although her voice had yet to touch the evening's air, her grace was arresting, and lingered behind the hem of her waist draped hair. Finally, Ali added the enchantment of her voice, beginning with the Farsi song, "Allahi Allah." In between singing, she contributed a metallic ringing of finger cymbals.

Within the first moments of the performance, their intentions seemed apparent. The show wasn't a visual experience aimed strictly for entertainment, but rather an intimate, internal one that craved the slow steady breaths of appreciation.

After their first song, Ali told the audience the next song they'd play, "The Hunt," was a folk song from Khorasson, Iran. She explained that the Farsi lyrics translated to the story of a hunter who, on a hunting trip in the mountains, is unable to kill any creatures because each one reminded him of his beloved.

Ali went on to share with the audience her perspective of the folktale as a reflection of how in the modern world we are all one, despite the differences of our heritages.

"It's such a tiny world we live in now, and we have to live so close together," said Ali.

The graceful vocalist went on to address the negative image of Iran that is portrayed in the media today. Ali, along with Torkian, both hail from Tehran, Iran.

"It's a beautiful country, and like anybody else we love our country," said Ali. "Maybe we can do something to show you a different perspective. Hopefully you can leave here with a little bit of that tonight."

Niyaz is originally composed of three musicians; Azam Ali, Loga Ramin Torkian and Carmen Rizzo, but on Friday they were joined by two guest musicians; tabla player Satnam Ramgotra and multi-instrumentalist Dimitris Mahlis.

Her eloquent address evoked emotion from the audience, who was composed of people with a variety of ages and ethnicities. Some couldn't resist the urge to express their agreement with whistles and cheering. For others, eyes misted over.

Ali also said a few words about the younger generations of Iranian Americans who have lost their tradition, and that she encourages them to hold onto their cultural heritage. She identified herself, along with Torkian as being able to relate to the feeling of displacement.

"Loga and I ... we're too Iranian to be American, and too American to be Iranian," said Ali. She made clear that their music is aimed towards this generation, Iranian-Americans in particular, to provide a channel into their cultural heritage.

Her words offered an insightful segue for the music to begin again, but not all their transitions were as defined. At other points, Niyaz shifted from one song to the next with the subtle hypnotic grace of string instrumentation from guest musician Dimitri Mahlis and Torkian.

Although Torkian's accomplished [illegible] instruments, at Friday's show he played the guitar viol (a 14th century European bowed guitar), and the Turkish saz. Mahlis, a multi-instrumentalist and composer of Greek descent, has worked the oud (a half pear shaped Middle-Eastern lute).

Their instrumentation lingered, entranced and captivating before Ali's vocals struck the chord that identified their next song.

Ali's voice, coupled with undulating hips of traditional dancing for hours, is classic, fascinating and inspiring. Ali's voice has been trained in various vocal traditions, like Western classical, Indian, Persian and Eastern European.

They went into their song "Dunya," before Mahlis took over with a jolting solo, which was soon joined by Ramgotra's fast-paced beats on the tabla. Ali, afterwards, cited Ramgotra's tabla playing as "the heartbeat of their music."

At Friday's show it was easy to forget about Rizzo's electronic programming and keyboarding, as it blends with the music quite subtly. Although the focus was clearly on the cultural instrumentation and Ali's vocals, without Rizzo's electronic mixing Niyaz's music would lose its distinction as "ancient music meets modern electronic trance."

After playing one more folksong from Khorasson, Ali announced they would end with an Urdu song, "Dilruba," but not before offering a paraphrased translation of the lyrics.

Ali said the basic question in "Dilruba" asked, "What quarrel do you have with fate, when so much of all that happens is the will of God?" She went on to encourage the audience to get up from their seats and dance – which they did, to my own surprise and to the surprise of others.

About a dozen fans gathered against the side of the venue, waiting for the song to hit the melodic climax that would set their hips and wrists to action for Middle-Eastern style dancing.

The most heartwarming aspect of this experience was the cross cultural range of the fans. Of those who danced, there was no one defining theme to their race. As the song ended, the audience rose to their feet for a standing ovation. It was clearer then, more than ever, that Niyaz's performance was a celebration of our differences, because it was those differences that unified us all as one.

Award-winning author reads at UMass

By Matthew Caldwallader
Collegian Correspondent

It is always interesting when we mark a simple, accurate view of reality as brilliant. Certain emotions and thought processes that we take for granted can be almost impossible to capture in writing. But once in a while, someone comes along and gets at emotions that you might have thought words were ill-equipped to handle. Lydia Davis is one of those gifted few. In as few words as possible, she is able to access a person's innermost thoughts and feelings, making her one of the better authors around.

COURTESY JOCK MCDONOUGH

Davis read from her book, 'Samuel Johnson is Indignant' with wit and captivation.

On Nov. 2, Davis visited UMass Amherst to read material from both her past work and a soon-to-be-released collection of short stories. The crowd was mostly other writers and readers – people who could appreciate the subtle nuance of Davis' work.

This was certainly a college crowd, a full range from budding creative geniuses to aging professors and even some dogs who chose to accompany their owners to the reading. (Davis acknowledged the canine presence by saying it was OK, "so long as they turn off their cell phones.")

That a short story writer could have such a following was impressive, but good writing is hard to come by, it always has been and, chances are, it always will. So, when you come across a very good writer, like Davis, it is a real thrill.

After a mildly confusing, but thoroughly entertaining, introduction by the English department's Chris Bachelder – something about pleasure, anxiety and water skiing (don't ask) – Davis took the podium to grace the crowd with her words.

The presentation itself wasn't anything spectacular, but the writing was good enough to keep my interest, quite a feat considering I am a poster child for the attention deficit disorder "Sesame Street" generation. The brevity of the stories probably had as much to do with this as the content.

Davis has a lot to show for her work over the years. She has received (among other awards) a Guggenheim Fellowship, the Lannan Literary Award for Fiction, the Whiting Writer's Award and was even named "Chevalier of the Order of Arts and Letters" by the French government for her English translations of French authors.

Most recently, she was awarded a MacArthur Fellowship "Genius" Grant, giving her ego enough fuel to become completely aloof. Yet, somehow she remains modest and self deprecating. As she got to the podium, her first comment was how she "can't live up to that introduction." No doubt, it was quite an introduction, but something (like the fact that she won a "Genius" Grant, for instance) told me she would pull it off.

She started off with some stories from her most recent collection, "Samuel Johnson is Indignant," and then moved on to stories from her new collection, "Varieties of Disturbance" (due out next spring). Although the writing technically belongs in the short story genre, the stories generally don't have the things you might expect, like characters and plot. Instead, she focuses on situations, leaving the reader to come up with their own conclusions.

In one piece, "Letter to a Funeral Parlor," she writes a letter objecting to a funeral director's use of the word "cremains" (some sort of pseudo-politically correct catchy name for cremation ashes). As she puts it, the word "sounds like something invented as a substitute for milk" and feels that as a word "cremains falls into the same category as brunch." "Often it will be a coming together of something moving and something funny and often a piece of language," she said.

Davis, who also has the experience of writing one novel, "The End of the Story," says she has enjoyed the short story form but misses the opportunity it can provide.

Esteemed author, Lydia Davis, spoke with grace when she visited UMass Amherst on Thursday to read from her recent book.

"With novels I can often begin and end in one day without losing spontaneity and freshness," said Davis.

This is particularly joyous like one [illegible] the dentist herself) over who passed out her dog in her date. While the topic may seem somewhat silly, it is also true. Who hasn't been in a situation where something smells rotten and no one wants to say it. Her writing is true to life whether it might be a big subject or not, but nevertheless very question of little importance. Life is strange and weird, so how would art be able to imitate life if it had to follow strict rules?

Alas, my writing does little to show the depths of her short prose. The only real way to understand it is to actually read it, and in this spirit, I urge you to go to your local bookseller and pick up a copy of "Samuel Johnson is Indignant." The stories are short enough that you can pick it up now-and-then in your spare time and good enough that they are actually worth the money. (I know, this is very important to a college crowd.)

Meet Borat: He think America 'very nice'

Meet Borat Sagdiyev, a media journalist from the former Soviet Republic nation of Kazakhstan. His country sent him to America to learn about its culture in hopes of improving his own nation – or in lemans terms, to find out how to become more American.

Settling in New York City to make a documentary about the United States, Borat falls in love with Pamela Anderson while watching a rerun of "Baywatch," and instantly decides to set out for Los Angeles to find her and make her his bride.

Borat continues his documentary as he makes his way across the United States, and along the way encounters different Americans. He comes across a Southern Dining Society in Alabama; frat boys in a Winnebago and a stadium of audience members at a bull-riding competition in Virginia.

So, why is this film being hailed as possibly the funniest movie ever? While interviewing average, every-day Americans, who have no idea that they're being put-on, Borat's ground-breaking of America's Ass Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan succeed in not only a film that splitting sides, but a film with a redeeming social value.

pointing out the foundation of naivety and ignorance still found in American culture.

Sacha Baron Cohen excels at showing that the United States can be just as bigoted and ignorant as anti-Semite, homophobic and naive Borat. In the movie, Americans reveal their opinions and beliefs while they think they're being filmed for a Kazakhstani documentary.

At a Virginia rodeo, the general manager comments to Borat that if he didn't know Borat he'd think he looked like a Muslim and would wonder if he had a bomb strapped to his chest.

On a New York City subway, Borat greets a friendly passenger, but when he attempts to kiss the man in traditional European greeting, the man jumps away, threatening to knock him in the balls. Looking for "protection from Jews," Borat walks into a gun shop, asking what is the best gun to kill a Jew with, and without hesitation the man responds, "I'd recommend a 9mm or Glock Automatic. (Often is actually used in real life)."

Cohen's gift isn't just that he assaults people with questions about their opinions on race or religion, but rather it's his ability to coax the answers out of them.

When asking politician Alan Keyes why a group of men he met at a Washington DC gay pride parade seemed friendlier than other persons he had met, Keyes replies that the men were probably homosexual.

Upon first entering the arena at the rodeo, Borat speaks on behalf of his country and says they support "our war on terror," and they look forward to seeing "War Lord Premier Bush drink the blood of every man, woman and child in Iraq." This drew applause and cheers from the crowd.

Ok – so not everyone is buying Borat's farce. The Kazakhstani government has condemned the film, visiting its portrayal of the world's ninth largest country as misleading and false.

The film first opens up to Borat's hometown of Almaty, where he advises his neighbor "not [to] touch rape … humans only."

Cohen, who also produced the comedy film, plays Borat Sagdiyev, Kazakhstan's sixth most famous man and leading TV [illegible] and his sister is the number four prostitute in the country. Recently the president of Kazakhstan even went so far as to come to America to complain to President Bush. This, of course, did nothing more than give free publicity to the film.

A dim-witted, clumsy, mustache wearing (it's real) citizen of Kazakhstan, Cohen's gift is in making the audience unsure of whether he's joking or not.

like when he references that Jews caused 9/11.

Borat isn't full of hatred or odium, even if he does call Jews devils, and finds it shocking that a woman has the right to choose who she sleeps with, but is unaware, and uses that ignorance to show that many Americans are filled with it as well.

Watching the audience laugh as Borat talks to the manager of the rodeo that gays should be hung, there was awkwardness in their laughter, surprised at such a statement. Joel Stein of Time Magazine said: "his attempts to be American pinpoint exactly how the world sees us: garish, violent, nouveau riche, a land of Donald Trumps and 50 Cents."

Though the Anti-Defamation League has acknowledged that the film is not anti-Semitic, they did stress concern that some audience members may not get Cohen's underlying messages, and may even influence or restore prejudice in some.

I could see the League's concern when I went to see the film and was surprised to see older people, and even some parents with children, at the screening.

Cohen's gift isn't just that he assaults people with questions about their opinions on race or religion, but rather it's his ability to coax the answers out of them.

despite an R rating. The theatre was predominantly packed with college-age students, showing what audience the film was catering to.

Perhaps this suggests that our age group would understand a film like this more than high school or middle school-aged people. Perhaps we are not as stuck-up, or set in our ways, as our elders. I certainly could never see either one of my parents seeing this film and enjoying it.

Though the film largely relies on an unscripted dialogue, some parts of the film come off fake. When Borat finally catches up to Pamela Anderson, the scene feels played out, scripted. The prostitute Borat invites over to the Southern Dining Club is in fact an actress, who I've only previously seen in a short scene from "The Rock," playing a mouthy tourist.

Entertainment Weekly's October 20th cover asks: "Has this man made the funniest movie ever . . . or simply the most outrageous, offensive one?" Well, the answer is yes . . . and no.

Though this film can guarantee laughter for many, the film isn't for everyone, or the faint-at-heart. Some scenes are crude and demeaning, and one nude wrestling scene between Borat and his manager Azamat Bagatov makes you unsure as to whether to throw up or laugh hysterically. (And if there ever were a Hall of Worst Outfits Ever, Borat's "banana hammock" bathing suit should be sent there.)

This film deserves more than one viewing, and uses its 89 minutes well, though there was definite disappointment in its shortness. I guess we'll have to wait for the DVD version to come out with all the extras, which are probably guaranteed to be filled with more laughter.

Bisco fans fawn over 'best jams' difficult to live with a dozen men and a single bus for an entire tour, and that sometimes a shower isn't available for a significant amount of time.

Aucoin tells us that fans can expect another studio album around the summer but resisted giving the name of the album.

"There have been changes [since Aucoin has joined the band] and they're definitely better," said Brownstein. "There are certain songs that Allen's taken to and made his own and there's more direction and energy that the band hasn't seen in a couple years."

Despite the testosterone levels and the lack of a hygienic release, Aucoin is having a great time being the new heart in The Disco Biscuits, and looks back on the past year with no regrets or complaints. One of the many influences that led him to consider the music industry is Medeski Martin & Wood. He began considering a career in music when he started taking drum lessons, and his instructor told him he could make money playing them.

Bisco is known for its trance/fusion jams that slowly build and build until finally there is an explosion of energy overwhelming every head in the venue. Friday night was no different.

The Disco Biscuits, who performed on Friday at The Calvin theater, are known for their trance-like fusion jams that are built with energy.

Scattered fans were mentioning how they played some of the best jams ever amidst their composed piece.

When Brownstein was asked to respond to those who consider the Bisco crowds as sketchy and over-indulgent he stated, "That's ridiculous. It's no sketchier than going to the grocery store."

The band doesn't believe the breakup of Phish has really had any effect on its fan base and followers; but standing in the crowd you would be passed by countless dancers wearing tie-dye Phish and Grateful Dead shirts.

All in all, it was a good night to be a Bisco fan. The band played an explosive set that kept all of the fans dancing to the brink of exhaustion. If you didn't get a chance to see them last week, it is highly recommended you catch them the next time around. Unfortunately, they have moved on from the general area. Listen to an interview with The Disco Biscuits online, at www.dailycollegian.com.

Afterwards, Jason gave his thoughts on sharing the award and the big win with his brother.

"Just sharing moments like these – he made the game-winning stop and for me winning the award – it's such a great honor, I couldn't ask for more," he said.

In doing so, the Minutemen made their road to the playoffs a bit easier. The opposite can be said of the Wildcats. UNH will now most likely need to win the rest of its games to make it in with three losses. But wins have been tough to come by in Durham lately – the Wildcats have now lost three of their last four contests.

There's no question UMass was dominant in the first half on Saturday. Going into the break it had a comfortable 21-3 lead to which the Minutemen added another score just six minutes into the third.

The only score of the first quarter came on an eight-yard strike from quarterback Liam Coen to 6-foot-5 receiver Rasheed Rancher in the back of the end zone.

UMass lined up with J.J. Moore and Brandon London the right side and Rancher alone on the left. Coen tossed the ball up and let Rancher jump up and grab it over the defender.

Then with 10 minutes remaining in the second quarter, Coen made a spectacular effort to put the Minutemen up by two scores.

When the ball was snapped the quarterback found himself under intense pressure. Unfazed, Coen dropped back in the pocket. He then stepped up and made two defenders miss by splitting them. On the run, he threw the ball up to Moore who was alone in the back of the end zone.

"That play that Liam made, he made three people miss, stepped back through the pocket and threw a strike," Brown said of Coen's effort. "Each guy is different, and I'll tell you this, I wouldn't trade my guy for any guy other in the country."

Senior running back Steve Baylark had two scores on the day, and Ball recovered from a dreadful first half to record eight catches and two touchdowns of his own. But in the end it was the UMass defense that was the difference.

"For us as a team we felt this game was about respect," senior safety James Ihedigbo said. "We felt we needed to gain respect on defense and gain respect as a team. I think we accomplished that. We made a key play when we had to."

Linebacker Jason Hatchell recorded a career-high 18 tackles against the Wildcats Saturday. The effort earned him the Bill Knight MVP award.

Fans have strong showing in Durham

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. – The signs were simple, but the messages were clear. Jotted down in jet black marker across pieces of poster board were the many slogans that summed up how Massachusetts football fans felt about the University of New Hampshire.

"Welcome to Moo Hampshire," read one sign. "Liam Coen for Heisman," read another. And the classic, "Go UMass" signs were high in numbers.

A massive amount of UMass fans made the trip to Durham, N.H. on Saturday to witness what has become a heated rivalry between the Minutemen and the Wildcats. And just as the UNH fans filled up their side of the field, Minutemen fans had their engines revving throughout Saturday's 28-20 UMass win. The total attendance was 10,598.

About 1,020 of those fans lined up on the sold out visitor's side of the field, and out-screamed the UNH fans during some crucial plays. UMass junior and Marston Phalom group member Scott Rosner said his fans out-cheered the Wildcat fans on several occasions.

"Their student section was horrible," Rosner said. "They didn't start cheering until UNH scored those two touchdowns. We cheered for every first down, and everything that happened in the game."

The Minutemen fan base had a line-up of taunts and phrases to counter the Wildcat students. "We can't hear you," rang loud after UNH fans began rooting for their team at the start of the contest. And after UNH receiver David Hall, who broke Jerry Rice's I-AA college touchdown record on Oct. 7, dropped a Ricky Santos liner the fans spouted off, "Rice is better."

A chunk of UNH fans from the student section began to exit their seats after running back Steve Baylark's touchdown gave his team a 28-3 lead with 8:49 left in the third quarter. Coincidently, the game, which initially appeared as a blowout, turned into a nail-biter by the middle of the fourth quarter.

Rosner was impressed by the number of faithfuls that took the trek from Amherst and beyond to watch the No. 3 Minutemen take on the No. 9 Wildcats.

"I definitely think there was a decent amount of fans there, and I think a good portion of them would travel to any game now," he said. "I think the true fans traveled because it was an important game. I think some people went because it was close, but I think most went because it was important."

The climax of UMass fan reaction came during the pinnacle fourth-and-goal play at the end of the game. After Santos' pass was swatted away by defensive tackle John Hatchell, the ones wearing maroon and white erupted in glee, jumping up and down and waving their index fingers in the air.

Since the fate of UMass' home playoff aspirations rest on the upcoming home games against Maine and Hofstra, Rosner said he hopes that the quantity that traveled to Durham will reflect the amount that head to McGuirk on Saturday.

"With the amount of people that actually traveled to this, not just students, I think there's going to be a lot more people at the next few games," Rosner said. "If people know what our ranking is, and know how important these games are, I'm sure they will show."

Nail-biting victory surpasses the hype

delivered a perfect pass that would have been a touchdown in the third quarter.

It looked like another boring UMass victory. We've been accustomed to those: The game is over by halftime, and Brown removes the starters by the end of the third quarter. It's easier on the heart, but it makes the eyelids heavy.

This one looked like the 2006 UMass blueprint. But UNH turned it around in the middle of the third quarter.

Santos began to look like Santos, marching the Cats down the field for their first touchdown of the day in a seven-play, 83-yard drive that took just 1:51. It was Ball's first touchdown catch, and the top receiver in I-AA (who looks like a seventh grader who's a little too big for his body) began to find his rhythm.

After that score, it was a game. When two rivals line up on opposite sides of the ball, blowouts just don't happen. The Wildcats went down 20-3, but their high-powered offense (the best of any college football team in the nation, said Brown) could put up unholy numbers at any time.

When UNH began to creep back into the game, the crowd crept back in, too. Santos began to roll, and receivers got open down field. Completions piled up for 8-, 9- and 10-yard gains at a time. This looked like a vaunted offense, not the one that the Minutemen handled in the first half.

Ball snagged his second touchdown of the day with 6:48 left in the fourth. The Wildcat defense that allowed just seven points in the second half, stopped quarterback Liam Coen, running back Steve Baylark and the UMass offense on the ensuing drive.

Down eight points with 3:40 left in the game, Santos went to work. From the shotgun, the dynamic hurler drove his team down the field with a combination of passes into the flats and secondary, paired with a couple of long scramble runs.

From the UMass 21-yard line, Ball displayed his immense ability after the catch, when he took the throw from Santos and squirmed through several UM corners and linebackers for a 10-yard gain down to the Minutemen's 11-yard line.

Timeout UNH: more drama. This was UMass' long-awaited close contest. For too long, the game plan in the fourth quarter was to make sure no one gets hurt. Now it was to win.

With 23 seconds left on 4th-and-goal, UNH called for a screen play. Defensive end John Hatchell read it perfectly, and knocked down the pass to end the game.

Everyone was standing at that point. The Minutemen stormed off of the field in a frenzy. The Wildcats, heads down, returned to the sidelines having lost three out of their last four games.

One play. Win or lose. UMass vs. UNH. Looks like the hype didn't ruin anything this time.

age, you're not going to get out on the break very often."

Bridgeport shot 47 percent from the field in the first half, but was held to a dismal shooting display in the second, going 2-for-16 from the field and 0-for-4 from behind the arc.

UMass senior forward Stephane Lasme got the game off to a quick start when he threw down a dunk just 14 seconds into the game. Bridgeport took a 4-2 lead three minutes in, but a Freeman jumper, a block by Lasme and a dunk by Tiki Mayben gave the Minutemen a lead that was never lost.

"In the first half, I thought we played hard," Ford said. "But I was very upset at halftime because we played hard, but we did not play with the urgency. Bridgeport played with. In the second half I thought we combined a little bit of a sense of urgency to our game with some hard work."

The Minutemen had four players in double-digits when all was said and done. Forbes had a game-high 21 points in his first game with UMass, Freeman finished with 19 points, senior James Life scored 15 – 12 of which were three-pointers – and Lasme had 10 points. Lasme also had a game-high six blocks, while UMass had 14 as a team.

Mayben also showed promising signs in the game, scoring four points and tallying a game-high nine assists in his first game with UMass.

Regardless of the outcome, the Minutemen know there is a tough regular season schedule that lies ahead, and the preparation begins now.

"We just have a lot of work to do," Ford said. "[The players] know where we're at as a basketball team. They know what they need to get done. I will say this, they're trying hard to do it.

"A lot of old habits are hard to break, and we're trying to break some. But right now, we just need to put this game behind us and really focus on our next practice to try and get better because we've got a little ways to go with this basketball team."

the Friars' goalie and into the back of the net for his third of the season.

Kevin Jarman helped on Anderson's power-play goal to double the Minutemen's advantage late in the period. With Nick Mazzolini relegated to the box for hooking, Anderson netted his first goal of the season.

The play began with Jarman controlling the puck at the right post. Looking for any way to get a pass off, he spun around and slid the puck across the crease. Anderson was there to receive and put the puck into the net. Sims remained still at the other side of the crease.

Providence owned the second period of play. Goals by Mazzolini and Chase Watson knotted the game at two goals apiece entering the final period of play.

Mazzolini netted his third of the season at 8:38. He took a pass from Pierce Norton at the left face-off circle and wound up for a slap shot. The puck rocketed in over Quick on the glove side to put the Friars on the board.

Then with just under two minutes to play in the period, Watson scored one of his own to draw the Friars and Minutemen even.

Providence had a chance of its own just before Fenton's game-winner, but couldn't put the puck by Quick. He stopped two shots in a row from the Friars. In all, Quick turned away 35 shots on Saturday.

It was Quirk who got the Minutemen on the board first Friday night. The power-play goal was his third tally of the season. Positioned at the right face-off circle, Quirk received a pass from Chris Capraro.

He got off the slap shot and sent it by Sims at 11:59.

Early into the second period, Capraro and Fenton each added goal to give the Minutemen a convincing 3-0 lead.

Capraro's score – at 1:19 – was one that any coach hates to see scored on his team. Chris Davis gave the puck to Carparo who went to work on the Friars defense. He fought across the crease from left to right going in. He held the puck until he saw Sims stuck at the other side, and easily put puck in the net.

Fenton teamed up with Ortiz for the first time of the weekend on Friday night. Anderson and Ortiz brought the puck into the Providence zone. Then Anderson dished it to Ortiz who spotted Fenton at the top of the crease. The junior tipped the puck past Sims at 3:23.

"I just went to the net," Fenton said. "Will [Ortiz] got the puck and Will is a great shooter and honestly I thought he was going to shoot it. I just had my stick on the ice and kind of redirected it."

Jamie Carroll recorded a one-time goal for Providence's only score of the night. Colin McDonald sent a pass from behind the crease that Carroll quickly slapped by Quick before he had time to react.

Capraro tallied an empty-netter to cap the scoring and seal the win for UMass. It was his third point of the night in what was his first action this season.

Sophomore Cory Quirk continued his strong start this season with three points this weekend on two goals and an assist.

Big return for Capraro

Senior forward Chris Capraro sat out the first four games of the season but came back big Friday night. He tallied three points on two goals and an assist in the Minutemen's 4-1 win over Providence College.

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Chris Capraro picked the perfect game to make his season debut for the Massachusetts hockey team.

The Mass Attack got a huge lift from the senior forward, who notched three points in his first game this season. He was held out of the first four games this season due to an undisclosed violation of team rules.

Capraro missed all of the 2004-05 season, but returned last season for his junior year and became one of the Minutemen's best offensive weapons. He scored 19 points during the 2005-06 season on eight goals (seven on the power play) and 11 assists. Already this year, he has two goals and an assist in two games played.

Early in the second period of Friday night's game against Providence, Capraro padded a 1-0 UMass lead with his first goal of the season.

He showed an immense amount of patience, beating Friars goaltender Tyler Sims by skating across the crease from Sims' right to his left, waiting for the goalie to commit.

After getting the feed from Chris Davis, Capraro came in front of the net, and Sims moved up to check the puck and stop any shot Capraro continued to hold it and carried the puck to Sims' left side, where he sent an easy shot behind the goalie and under the crossbar.

"Not much was really going through my mind," said Capraro after Friday's game. "The defense was in the way and if I made the shot, I figured it would get blocked."

It seemed like an eternity from the time Capraro made an advance at the net to when he finally released the shot. It appeared as he crossed the crease he may have lost control of the puck to a Providence defender, but playing the waiting game with Sims worked out for Capraro, who said that it is actually a habit he's been trying to break.

"I lost the handle for a second but pretty much I knew where it was," Capraro said. "Sometimes I hold onto [the puck] a little too long and it works against me. This time it happened to work for me."

The goal was not Capraro's first point of the season, as the 5-foot-7 left winger assisted on the Minutemen's first goal of the night. He earned the helper in the first period on Cory Quirk's second goal of the season.

In the third, Capraro iced the game for the Mass Attack with his second goal. With under two minutes left and Sims pulled from the net, Quirk intercepted the puck and returned the favor to Capraro, who gladly took the empty-netter, and his third point of the game for a 4-1 UMass lead.

"In practice, we've really been working trying to get pucks in the net and becoming better offensively as a team," Capraro said.

Capraro took junior Zech Klann's spot on the roster, playing on the second line with Quirk and sophomore Chris Davis for most of the game. The move bumped freshman Will Ortiz from the second line to the first.

The moves worked in UMass' favor, as the team grabbed seven goals over the weekend in two games against the Friars.

"We were waiting for [Capraro] for a while," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "I think we were all anxiously hoping that he would get off to a good start."

Although he hadn't seen action yet this season, Capraro has apparently spent plenty of time in the training room getting ready for his first minutes on the ice.

"He's in the best shape he's been in since he has been here at UMass," Cahoon said. "You reap what you sow, and that's what Chris got out of tonight."

UM loses despite comeback effort

By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team (2-1) suffered its first defeat of the season this weekend, falling to Central Connecticut State 152-147 on Saturday.

The team performed very well in the loss. The five-point separation is a huge improvement over the 48-point trouncing the Blue Devils handed the Minutewomen last January.

"We lost to that team by [48] last year," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "We lost by seven on Saturday. [Five] points in a swim meet is hundredths of a second which separated us from winning and losing the meet."

The Minutewomen travel to Boston this weekend to take on Boston University Saturday at the Fanueil Pool in Boston.

UMass continued to display its superiority on the diving board with sophomore Karen Upperco and senior Mary Jenkins leading the way. Although Central Connecticut's divers are not particularly strong, the Minutewomen's showing pleased UMass coach Mandy Hixon immensely.

"We knew [Central Connecticut] did not have very good divers," Hixon said. "I'm very happy with the performance though."

Upperco won both the one- and three-meter diving events. She lit up the scoreboard to the tune of 226.35 points in the one-meter event. Upperco has won every event she has competed in this season. Although it is very early in the season, her dominance makes a strong case for her to repeat as Atlantic 10 Diver of the Year.

"Karen's been training really hard the last couple of weeks," Hixon said. "She only beat Mary by a point on one-meter though. It's always good to have a little competition within your own team."

Jenkins had her best showing of the season. Her score of 225.35 scored four points for the Minutewomen although it wasn't good enough to surpass Upperco.

Senior Melissa Pond impressed as well her third-place finish in the one-meter scored three points for UMass.

Sophomore Jackie Porter led the Minutewomen assault for swimmers. Her victories in both the 100-and 200-yard breaststroke scored 18 points for UMass.

"Jackie Porter has continued to swim well," Newcomb said. "She won the 100 and 200 breaststroke. She's been swimming and training well. I really like where she is right now."

The loss was almost irrelevant to Newcomb. Midway through Saturday's meet, the Minutewomen were in a 30-point hole. The comeback required an attitude adjustment on the part of the Maroon and White.

"About halfway through we were down by 30-something points," Newcomb said. "And they decided that they wanted to win the meet and we kept chopping away at the lead. To lose by [five] after being behind by 30 says a lot about the character of this team."

Newcomb may be happy with the emotion that the team swam with, but this early in the season, there are still problems with the technique and mechanics of many swimmers – namely their turns.

"Our biggest weakness is our turns," Newcomb said. "A lot of people go into turns ahead and end up getting beat off the wall. We're getting beat on awful walls. We'll have to focus on that."

Fortunately, UMass has more than enough time to mend these woes before the A-10s in February. All of the meets before then are basically just a warm up. However, that doesn't mean they're not important to the coaches.

"I hate losing, regardless," Newcomb said. "Although we learned about ourselves [Saturday] it's always tough."

The 400-yard freestyle relay performance for the Minutewomen is still something Newcomb has to be happy with. The victory by junior Amanda Volpe, freshman Elizabeth Walsh, sophomore Christa Narus and senior Liz Lovejoy was just 59-hundredths of a second off the pool record.

The UMass women's swimming and diving team narrowly lost to Central Connecticut this weekend, 152-147. The Minutewomen battled back from a 30-point deficit, but could never fully close the gap.

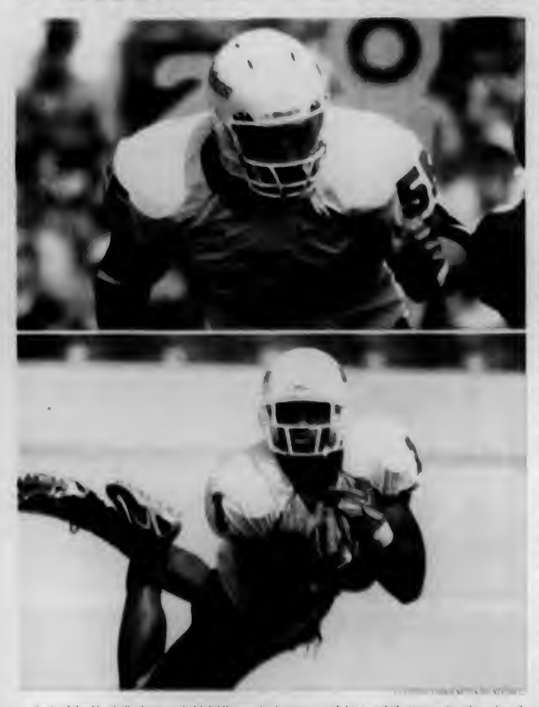
Hatchell brothers lead Minutemen



Senior John Hatchell (above) ended UNH's comeback attempt with his pass deflection on fourth-and-goal. Wide receiver J.J. Moore made the most of his one catch, a 15-yard touchdown from Liam Coen.

DURHAM, N.H. — There's nothing like a football game between bitter rivals that is decided by one key play.

After going down big early in Saturday's matchup with the Massachusetts football team, New Hampshire stormed back to make the game interesting right down to its last snap. But UMass (8-1, 6-0 Atlantic 10) dug in and held on for the crucial 28-20 victory at Cowell Stadium.

UMass	28
UNH	20

On fourth-and-goal at the UMass 3-yard line, UNH (6-3, 3-3 A-10) quarterback Ricky Santos had one final chance to bring the Wildcats back. The clock had just 23 ticks left. But it wasn't meant to be.

As they had all day, the home team lined up in shotgun formation. This time they had trips left, and senior David Ball lined up alone on the right side. Running back Robert Simpson went in motion and the ball was snapped.

All the momentum was in the hands of the Wildcats. They'd scored 17-unanswered points since the middle of the third period. And the current drive had started at the UNH 32 and had taken 12 plays to this point.

As the play began, Simpson swung out to the left flats. Under pressure, Santos tried lobbing the ball to his running back, but defensive end John Hatchell got in the way.

Hatchell jumped and batted the ball to the turf, sealing the win for the Minutemen. He immediately sprinted to the sideline where he and UMass celebrated the big victory.

"I actually was expecting it," Hatchell said. "We'd run that play a few times during the week during practice. I had a pretty good read on it."

The play was the perfect end to a game that saw each team dominate a half. UMass coach Don Brown said afterwards the game was about more than just individual accolades.

"This wasn't about stats, it wasn't about how many you throw for, it wasn't about how many yards you run for — it was about finding a way to win," he said. "That's really what it was all about from the beginning and that's really what it came down to in the end. We didn't worry about how we were going to do it. Our whole goal was to come in on the road and find a way to win."

Hatchell's brother, Jason, earned the Bill Knight MVP award as the game's most outstanding player — an honor is seldom given to defensive players. Once again the linebacker led the Minutemen with 18 tackles on the day — a career high.

For once game lives up to hype

Rob Greenfield

DURHAM, N.H. — Hype is evil.

It is a tool used by the mass media — particularly television — that can flat out ruin a good game, or a good player.

There was plenty of hype on these pages last week in anticipation of UMass' journey to face No. 9 New Hampshire.

Big game a lot of history. The Minutemen still soar over last year's 34-28 loss to the Wildcats at McGuirk.

This year, the roles reversed. No 3 UMass went into Durham six spots ahead of UNH on the national charts — another storyline, more hype.

Rarely do these blown-up games meet the expectations.

This one did.

UMass won, 28-20, and it came down to the last play. Imagine that Wildcat fans went home upset, but they couldn't have asked for a better football game.

"Very fittingly, that came down to the last play, as it should," UMass Coach Don Brown said. "Whenever UNH and UMass get together, it's always hard-fought. I have nothing but tremendous respect for coach McConnell and his staff and what they do on both sides of the ball.

"It's just a great, great football game," Brown added. "That's as good as it gets in New England college football today."

He's right. College football in the Northeast sells fewer tickets than high school games down south. Besides Boston College (which resides 10 minutes from pro sports-heavy Boston and struggles for attention in the city), UNH vs. UMass might be the game of the year in New England.

Twenty-three seconds remained in regulation when UNH quarterback Ricky Santos took the final snap from scrimmage. The Wildcats came back from a 28-3 deficit and cut it down to 28-20 with 17 unanswered points.

When the first half concluded, UMass had a 21-3 lead. This column was going to be about New Hampshire's incompetence. The Wildcats were the Bad News Bears of football for the first 30 minutes on Saturday.

The vaunted Wildcat receiving corps had feet for hands in the early going. David Ball, the nation's leading receiver, dropped two Santos strikes in the second quarter alone. Keith LeVan, another receiver in the Wildcats' shotgun package, bobbled the ball by the left pylon after Santos

Power play working in UM's strong start

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts hockey team's struggles on the power play were no secret a season ago. In the early goings of the 2006-07 season, that seems to have all changed. UMass swept Providence this weekend with the help of two power play tallies — one in each game.

UMass	4
PC	1
UMass	3
PC	2

First it was Cory Quirk's power-play goal in a 4-1 win at the Mullins Center Friday night. Then senior captain Matt Anderson netted his first goal of the season on the advantage in the Minutemen's 3-2 victory in Providence the following night.

UMass (4-1-1, 3-1 Hockey East) converted the power play at a 16% clip all of last season. It has now scored a man-advantage goal in each of its games so far this year.

"One of our objectives is to be productive on special teams," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I think we're doing a much better job this year than we have in the recent past."

Play was equal for much of the third period on Saturday with the score tied 2-2. Neither team had many chances, and it was apparent the win was going to the team that capitalized. Junior P.J. Fenton and freshman Will Ortiz came through for UMass, netting the game-winner with just less than three minutes to go in regulation.

Ortiz gained control of the puck off a Providence 12-6-1, 1-3-1 HE-A) turnover just inside the blue line. The freshman shook one defender and got a shot off that bounced in on Tyler Sims. It was saved, but Sims couldn't get a handle on the bouncing puck, and Fenton was there to poke it home.

The Minutemen got on the board first midway through the opening period Saturday night. With traffic in front of the Providence net, sophomore Quirk found himself alone in front of Sims.

Minutewomen come up short in exhibition

BY DOMINIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Just when the cold, bitter weather returns to the Pioneer Valley every year, so too, does basketball season.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team finally jump-started its 2005-06 season with an exhibition game against Bishop's University of Quebec, Canada on Saturday. Our friendly neighbors to the North head back to the border having stolen a nail-biter contest from the Minutewomen by a score of 60-58 at the Mullins Center.

Bishop's	60
UMass	58

Bishop's University out shot UMass in three-pointers with a final tally of 9-1.

Guards Melanie Ouellet-Godcharles and Anouk Boulanger drained every one of the Gaiters' threes. Ouellet-Godcharles finished the night four of 16, while Boulanger was five for 10.

"We knew they were very, very good shooters," UMass coach Marnie Ducko said. "The problem was they penetrated by us and got open looks. They would get by us, and we were helping out the wrong people."

The Minutewomen got off to a slow start fresh out of the gate, missing seven shots and turning the ball over twice in the first five minutes.

"We came out flat, then we picked it up," junior guard Pam Rosario said after the game. "We went back and forth between playing flat and [having] energy, and we need to be consistent with energy all the time. We can't just come out and have it sometimes."

The Maroon and White seemed to reach down deep and managed to return to the locker room at halftime with the score tied at 26 apiece.

UMass senior Tamara Latham led all UMass players with a total of 16 points against the team from her home country — both she and her younger sister, junior Alisha Latham, hail from Brampton, Ontario, a town just outside Toronto.

The younger sibling sank three out of seven field goals attempted (including one of three three-pointers) for a sum of seven points, while Tamara racked up 16 points by bucketing eight of 15 shots.

But Ducko mentioned that stats can sometimes be deceiving.

"I think Tamara is someone who should be able to carry this team on her back, and she knows that it was a sub-par game," Ducko commented. "Sixteen points, 13 rebounds for her, that's – I expect more. She had some defensive breakdowns. She gambled and went for steals instead of containing and that put us under pressure."

With only seven seconds left in the game, junior forward Kate Mills put in a lay-up off an assist from Latham, tying the game at 58 points apiece.

Bishop then inbounded the ball and called a timeout as soon as it entered UMass territory.

With a mere two ticks remaining on the clock, a controversial foul was called on sophomore guard Sakera Young — sending Boulanger to the charity stripe. After a UMass timeout intended to ice the 5-foot-11 economics major, Boulanger sank both free throws.

Rosario served up a last-ditch attempt to tie the game, but her basketball-like heave fell well short.

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

Glen Murray's goal 17 seconds into overtime on Saturday night was the third-fastest overtime goal by a Boston Bruin since the NHL instituted the extra period in the 1983-84 season.

UMass works on chemistry in exhibition

Transfer Gary Forbes recorded a game-high 21 points in UMass' exhibition win over Bridgeport at the Mullins Center on Saturday.

There wasn't much on the line, but the Massachusetts men's basketball team got a better feel for its on-the-court chemistry in Saturday night's 88-61 win over Bridgeport in the team's first and final exhibition game of the year.

UMass	88
UB	61

"We just tried to get our intensity back," senior center Rashaun Freeman said. "We took little strides, but we're not where we need to be. You have to be happy because a win's a win, but it doesn't get any easier from here."

The Minutemen officially open their season against Dartmouth on Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

UMass took over what was only a seven-point lead at halftime by outscoring the Purple Knights 19-4 in the first seven minutes of the second half. Junior Gary Forbes' three-point play with less than eight minutes remaining in the game gave the Maroon and White its largest lead at 73-45.

"We were good with the second-half performance, but we're not satisfied by any means," Freeman said. "To meet our expectations, we have to improve a lot. And it starts Monday at one o'clock. [We need to] get better as a team and work on our weaknesses."

The Minutemen showed signs of their unselfish transition offense in the second half, which is an area that UMass coach Travis Ford has seen his team progress in as of late.

"That's an improvement over the last couple of weeks," Ford said. "The unselfish play and what we like to call the extra pass, we made it on several occasions tonight.

"But again, we did not get out on the break tonight and did not play at the pace we wanted to because we were getting the ball out of the net every time. If you don't rebound, and you don't hold your opponent to a low percent-

Harvard journalists accused of plagiarism

BY CARA GRANNEMANN AND EDEN UNSIYER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Since the beginning of the Fall semester, Harvard University's campus newspaper, The Harvard has been under fire for recent cases of plagiarism.

Cartoonist Kathleen Breeden was recently removed from the Crimson staff for allegedly copying ideas for her political cartoons. According to a recent Crimson press release, the cartoons were copied from Stephen Breen of the San Diego Union-Tribune and Walt Handelsman of Newsday. The press release also acknowledged another Crimson writer, Victoria Ilyinsky, who had plagiarized part of her column from the online magazine, Slate, not long before.

According to Karen List, chairperson of the UMass Journalism Department, plagiarism is "copying someone else's work without giving them proper credit. And even if you cite a source, you cannot use that source's exact words without putting them in direct quotes."

Many wonder why Harvard has become such a beacon for plagiarism cases. The competitive nature of the school could be to blame, or perhaps there is too much pressure to excel academically.

"I think plagiarism has less to do with being competitive and more to do with being lazy," said List.

Both Breeden and Ilyinsky's future contributions to the Crimson have been suspended for the semester, they will both be allowed to reapply at the start of the Spring semester.

"We have allowed them to reapply because we determined that much, if not all, of the copying that occurred was unintentional," said Crimson President William C. Marra. "Though we want to send a message that this type of copying is unacceptable, we also want to give them the opportunity to learn from their mistakes and move on."

Policies seem to differ between universities and also among professors themselves. "I call them in to talk with me at some length," List said, "depending on the extent of the plagiarism, I sometimes fail them on the assignment."

According to Marra, the Crimson was initially notified of the plagiarism cases by emails from readers. UMass, however, has made deals with Turnitin and My Drop Box to help identify plagiarized papers, according to an article by Collegian Staff member Susan King printed earlier this year.

Former Black Panther speaks at UMass

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the third lecture in the University of Massachusetts' history department's Feinberg lecture series, Kathleen Cleaver, former National Communications Secretary for the Black Panther Party, spoke at Mahar Auditorium last night.

Kenneth Feinberg, a 1967 UMass graduate, sponsored this series of lectures called "Politics and Protest: The 1960s and now." Cleaver spoke to history students and faculty members about the Black Panther Party — how it formed and what purpose it served.

Cleaver also tried to shatter some of the myths associated with the popular history of the Panthers.

John Bracey — an adjunct professor added to the history department staff in 2000 and a former member of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality — introduced Cleaver in the context of the 1960s and the Civil Rights Movement.

"[Cleaver] was the one who led the struggle against other organizations who she thought weren't doing the job," Bracey said. "She was one of those people that came out and said that she would come out against a system that we thought was unjust."

Cleaver is in the midst of writing a personal memoir entitled, "Memories of Love and War."

She took the stage at Mahar last night and introduced the audience to a short DVD about Eldridge Cleaver and his significance to the Black Panthers. Cleaver stated that she preferred lecturing with visual components because some of the younger members in the audience wouldn't know about Eldridge Cleaver.

"I'm a great believer in visual record because I think you get a better feel for it from the films of the time," she said.

Cleaver talked mostly about the history of the Black Panther Party, which celebrated the 40th anniversary of its creation last month. She began with the ideology behind the creation of the Panthers, and how they shaped the Black Power movement through their new ideas.

"During the [Black Power Movement]," Cleaver said. "We

The initial estimated cost of new capital projects on the University of Massachusetts campus alone totaled $130,800,000, but increases in individual project costs have inflated this amount.

BY HANNAH LEUNG
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Prospective students touring the University of Massachusetts campus will find themselves admiring the beautiful landscape of overturned dirt and caution tapes.

The flagship campus of UMass currently has more than 17 ongoing construction sites, which can explain the unsightly appearance of the university.

Sophomore Mihwa Jurkiewicz said, "It seems like every road I'm taking is a detour road. It used to take ten minutes to walk from my last class back to my dorm, [in Northeast] now it takes double the time."

Her opinion is shared by many frustrated students.

Aside from aesthetic concerns, the cost of these numerous construction projects is also making some squirm.

The initial estimated cost of new capital projects on the UMass campus alone totaled $130,800,000. However, astronomical increases in project costs have inflated these numbers. A newly revised cost for several buildings announced in June of 2006. The Bartlett Façade Replacement is one of many capital projects facing rising tolls. Initially estimated to cost $4,800,000, it is now estimated to cost $15,600,000.

Jim Hunt, Communications Manager for Facilities & Campus Planning, explained the notable increases in price.

"A budget is set many years before the actual design is started. The design process then takes measurements and crude assessments of structural needs. As a result, many times you realize that what you intended to do is going to be much more expensive. As for the façade repairs on Bartlett, the initial plan was to do very little. However, as we began the process, we realized that much [attention] was needed."

He also noted, "By the time construction actually begins, construction costs will have shot way up."

Sophomore Tyren Barker states, "I just hope that the money going into all this con-

Mass. ballot question raises controversy

BY ERIC ATIAS AND CHRIS HYNES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When many students at the University of Massachusetts and local business owners make their way to the polls today, Question 1, which, if passed, would allow grocery and convenient stores in Massachusetts the option to sell wine, is the issue at center stage.

The ballot question has sparked an upsurge from supporters and non-supporters –grocery stores and package stores – of the argument. In the months leading up to today, advertisements and signs have graced the front lawns and driveways of local liquor and grocery stores.

Laurie Dochod, manager of Liquor's 44 on Route 9 in Hadley, said she will not only be voting today, but will also be holding a sign at a polling place in an effort to persuade voters to vote "No" on Question 1. She said she is confident her customers will be faithful to her business.

"I've been here for over four years, and know a lot of the customers," said Dochod. "Most of the people that come through here are going to be voting 'No' on Question 1."

Regardless of what this change would do to her business, Dochod said the selling of alcohol in convenient stores would put more pressure on teens who work behind the counter.

"There's a lot of 15- and 16-year-olds at convenience stores that will be affected by this," she said.

The "Vote No on Question 1" campaign Web site, www.voteonquestion1.com, displays a totaled car at the bottom of its home page. The caption above the picture states, "Vote No on Convenience Store Alcohol. The Price is too high."

Despite its stance on other alcohol-related issues, Mothers Against Drunk Driving "takes no position of licensing issue for the sale of alcohol to adults." According to the Massachusetts MADD chapter, it is not "an anti-alcohol organization."

In the United States, 34 other states currently allow grocery stores to purchase wine. The law in Massachusetts has been stagnant for 72 years.

UMass students are split on how the vote could affect them. Sophomore Joe Saracco said customers would benefit from a "Yes" vote. He said it would open free-market competition.

"It'll bring down prices," said Saracco. "The stores will have to compete with supermarkets and drive prices down, which is better for the customer."

The campaign for "Yes on 1: Wine at Grocery Stores," has been pushing its arguments through advertisements on television and around the state. According to its Web site, www.WineYesOnStores.com, the current law gives liquor stores "a virtual monopoly on wine sales."

It also combats its opposition's arguments regarding under-aged convenient store workers, stating they "...use scare tactics and false claims against this measure. The truth is, they just want to protect the current package store monopoly system."

Sophomore Michael Porciello does not think liquor stores have a monopoly, and thinks the new law could deter some of the smaller businesses in the area.

"I think it takes business away from liquor store owners," said Porciello, who is voting No on Question 1. "Supermarkets are big enough as is, so those selling wine will take business away from the small liquor store owners."

If passed, Question 1 would allow grocery and convenient stores in Massachusetts the option to sell wine.

Saddam supporters may be reinstated

Saddam Hussein was sentenced to death Nov. 5, 2006.

By Hassem Mroue
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to hang, the country's Shiite-dominated government declared a major concession to his Sunni Muslim backers that could see thousands of purged Baath Party members reinstated to their jobs.

The Supreme National Commission for de-Baathification has prepared a draft law with the amendments and will soon send it to parliament for ratification, the commission's executive director, Ali al-Lami told The Associated Press Monday.

"We decided to make the announcement after the Saddam verdict so that the de-Baathification commission would not be accused of bias," al-Lami said.

The announcement came as a round-the-clock curfew imposed for the Saddam verdict. It was gradually easing Monday in Baghdad, with pedestrians allowed back on the streets as a surge in violence expected after the court's decision did not materialize.

Vehicle traffic in Baghdad would be permitted beginning at 6:00 a.m. Tuesday, according to police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun and an aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

A U.S. helicopter also crashed north of the Iraqi capital on Monday, killing two American soldiers on board, and two Marines and a soldier were killed in fighting in the country's restive Anbar province.

The military said no gunfire was reported in the area at the time of the helicopter crash. The incident occurred in Salahuddin province, which includes Saddam's hometown of Tikrit and also was under curfew.

With the helicopter crash and the Anbar deaths, the number of U.S. troops killed this month in Iraq rose to 18 and follow a particularly violent month for the American military in Iraq, which saw 105 deaths in October.

The amendments are in harmony with a 24-point national reconciliation plan that was announced in June by the Shiite prime minister in which he called for reviewing the de-Baathification program, al-Lami said. Al-Maliki's reconciliation plan aims to end an insurgency that has killed tens of thousands of Iraqis since the March 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Before the amendments were drawn up, the organization listed names of 10,302 senior Baath Party members who were to be fired, but the new proposed law includes only 1,500 names, al-Lami said.

Those who will lose their jobs will get retirement pensions, he said, adding that 7,688 have been fired since the organization was established in January 2004.

Members of Saddam's elite dissolved security agencies as well as members of the paramilitary Saddam's Fedayeen that were run by the former president's late son, Odai, were not under the scrutiny of the commission but were handled by the prime minister's office, al-Lami said.

Harvard paper stresses catching plagiarism in editing also depend on the intentions of the student.

In the case of List's students, she looks at, "how much has been copied, and in talking to the students, I try to determine if they knew what they were doing or if they really didn't understand the rules of the road. Believe me, once they leave my office, they understand."

At this time there is no legal action being taken against Breeden for her cartoons.

As reported by The Harvard Daily Crimson itself, Daryl Cagle, owner of the Professional Cartoonists Index where Breen's cartoon was displayed said, "When editors all want the same thing from a cartoonist, and the cartoonists are all drawing on the same topics at the same time, it is no wonder that we come up with the simple, easy, first-gag-that-comes-to-mind...This is what I see in the poor, besieged Harvard cartoonist."

Though Breeden and Ilyinsky might be able to reclaim their integrity as journalists, another Harvard student was not so lucky.

Kaavya Viswanathan, a junior at Harvard, received much criticism for her plagiarism in her novel "How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild, and Got a Life," last year. According to a previously published article in the Crimson, Viswanathan had copied many passages, sometimes word-for-word, from Megan F. McCafferty's two novels "Sloppy Firsts" and "Second Helpings."

"All plagiarism is terrible. It's lying, cheating, and any number of other nasty qualities all rolled into one," said List, "It's not something that any person of character would do."

According to a recent Editor's Note in the Harvard Crimson, "all contributing columnists and cartoonists [are] to take part in sourcing and citation seminars similar to the ones that Crimson staff writers currently must attend."

In addition, the Crimson says it has also emphasized the importance of identifying plagiarism of newspaper articles in it's editing stages.

Palestine fails to protect women

By Karin Laub
Associated Press

RAMALLAH, West Bank — A new report presents an alarming picture of the abuse of women in the Palestinian territories, with police, courts and government agencies failing to treat violence such as rape and beatings as a crime.

Human Rights Watch cited practices such as rape victims being forced to marry assailants and light sentences for men who kill female relatives suspected of adultery. In a report released Tuesday, the rights group said families, tribal leaders and authorities, backed by tradition and discriminatory laws, often sacrifice victims' interests for "family honor."

And the problem is getting worse with growing poverty and lawlessness in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the New York-based group said.

The report comes about a year after a Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics survey of more than 4,000 households found 23 percent of women said they experienced domestic violence, but only 1 percent had filed a complaint. Two-thirds said they were subjected to psychological abuse at home.

Human Rights Watch urged the Palestinian president, parliament and government ministries to make protection of women a top priority. It said more can be done despite the conflict with Israel and the cash crisis in the Palestinian Authority brought on by the rise to power of the Islamic militant group Hamas.

"The main failing of the system is the failure to treat violence against women as a crime and to address it accordingly," researcher Lucy Mair said. "We want to say you can take some positive steps and it's imperative to provide protection to more women."

Mair said Human Rights Watch studied the Palestinian territories — rather than investigating abuses in other traditional societies — because some Palestinian officials had signaled they were ready for change.

"This made us optimistic we have something to work with," she said.

Commenting on the report, Adnan Amr, a legal adviser to President Mahmoud Abbas, agreed Palestinian authorities are "weak" in enforcing the law, but blamed "the security and political situation we have been through over the past two years."

"All Palestinians, not only women, are paying a heavy price for the chaos," Amr said, referring to struggles between rival Palestinian groups.

Human Rights Watch's report, based on dozens of interviews with victims, social workers, lawyers and police chiefs in the West Bank and Gaza, said abusers in the Palestinian territories are granted virtual immunity.

Rapists who marry their victims are not prosecuted, it said, and such deals are often arranged by the families, tribal leaders and police.

Even those assigned to protect the victims often push for such an outcome. The director of the West Bank's only shelter for teenage girls is quoted as saying she arranged five such marriages in her six-year tenure.

Palestinian law is lenient with men who kill female relatives because of adultery. Yet it bars rape and incest victims from having abortions. Rape within marriage is not considered a crime, the report said.

Police and hospital doctors are not trained to handle abuse cases and often further humiliate victims, the report said.

In one hospital in the West Bank city of Nablus, a doctor announced to a crowded waiting room that his unmarried 16-year-old patient was pregnant. The girl's mother later cited that incident as the main reason for her decision to kill her daughter, according to a case documented in the report.

A premium is placed on female virginity, with rapists facing a lesser punishment if the victim is not a virgin, the report said. Virginity tests are imposed on sexual abuse victims against their will.

Women's fates are increasingly determined by tribal leaders or Palestinian Authority-appointed governors, rather than the overloaded courts. The informal justice system is often arbitrary and biased against victims, Human Rights Watch said.

Victims are often afraid to come forward because of social stigma, the perceived futility of complaining and fear of inviting retribution by relatives, the report said.

Manal Kleibo, a lawyer at the Women's Center for Legal Aid and Counseling in the West Bank town of Ramallah, told The Associated Press that she has detected a change in some attitudes in recent years, saying authorities are increasingly willing to work with her group.

For example, she said, growing numbers of police officers are attending workshops on how to handle sexual abuse cases. Some families no longer force their daughters to marry rapists, she said, citing the case of a 14-year-old girl who instead was taken to a secret shelter in the West Bank with her family's support.

Hanan Ashrawi, an independent legislator, expressed doubt Human Rights Watch's call for a repeal of laws that discriminate against women will go anywhere since the Palestinian parliament is dominated by the Islamic fundamentalists of Hamas.

19-year-old male beaten with baseball bat

Friday November 3

7:36 p.m.

Over $1000 worth of liquor was confiscated when an Amherst Police officer assisted the Massachusetts Alcohol Beverage Control Commission (ABCC) in the Big Guys Liquors parking lot. There were 19 total violations that led to the confiscation including minors in possession of alcohol and procuring alcohol to minors. According to a police report, all of the liquor was tabbed and will be destroyed per ABCC policy.

8:48 p.m.

A 15-year-old Amherst resident caused damage to two parked vehicles while driving in a parking lot. The resident, who was accompanied by a 20-year-old male, was summoned to court for leaving the scene of property damage and unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle. The 20-year-old male was summoned for leaving the scene of property damage and allowing improper operation of a motor vehicle. According to a police report, there may have been two other females in the car at the time of the accident.

11:18 p.m.

An Amherst Police officer observed a 20-year-old Chicopee resident drinking a Bud Light beer at the North Pleasant Street bus stop in front of the Crestview Apartments. He was summoned for being a minor in possession of an open container of alcohol.

11:24 p.m.

Edwin D. Goitia of 37 Elcon Dr. in Chicopee, MA and Ivan A. Stevenson of 133 Waldo St. in Holyoke, MA were arrested for assault and battery and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. Jeremy Deane of 192 First St. in Pittsfield, MA was arrested for assault and battery, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon and possessing a class D drug. Several witnesses saw a 19-year-old male being beaten with a silver baseball bat. A witness identified one of the arrested parties when police stopped the car he was in.

Saturday November 4

12:02 a.m.

Three people were summoned for being minors in possession of alcohol and false or misuse of a liquor or ID card at Barsie's, a bar on North Pleasant St. in Downtown Amherst. The Massachusetts Alcohol Beverage Control Commission will take action against Barsie's according to a police report.

3:18 a.m.

Five individuals stole $200 from an unidentified male's wallet outside of Cumberland Farms according to a police report. A third party female said that her friend, who she would not identify, was punched in the face by the group of men who fled in a green car.

7:36 p.m.

Outside of University Liquors, a 24-year-old male and a 23-year-old male were summoned for purchasing alcohol for the underage operator of a vehicle. The operator, a 20-year-old male, was summoned for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

8:14 p.m.

Outside of University Liquors, a 22-year-old male Hadley resident was summoned for purchasing alcohol for two minors. Police observed him hand a 30-pack of Busch Light beer to two underage males who were sitting in a vehicle in the parking lot. The two minors, who are both 20-year-old Hadley residents, were summoned for being minors in possession of alcohol.

8:37 p.m.

Outside of University Liquors, a police officer observed a female purchase alcohol for the underage operator of a vehicle. According to a police report, both parties were very cooperative and thanked officers for providing them with information about Commonwealth alcohol related laws; no arrests were made.

Construction affects commuters

struction isn't taking away from other important factors the University should be addressing."

80 percent of the money to fund these projects comes from the University of Massachusetts Building Authority, while a meager seven percent is raised by the state of Massachusetts. The rest comes from individual donations and operating capitol.

The University of Massachusetts Building Authority borrows funds to construct these facilities by issuing tax-exempt bonds. UMass then pays the principle and interest on the bonds for a life-long duration. The money spent on construction projects impacts the funding of other student activities, due to the limited budget of the University.

Arguably, the end results should outweigh the landscape and financial tolls that the construction is taking on UMass.

Continuing big projects on the UMass campus include the Central Heating Plant, Integrated Science Building, Arts Studio Building, Recreation Center, and more. Meanwhile, streamline replacements and various repairs are affecting daily commutes to and from campus.

Some finished projects have already been a huge success, including the $13.1 million renovation of Berkshire Dining Hall and the new North End apartments.

Princeton Review's placement of UMass as number 20 on the list titled, "Campus Is Tiny, Unsightly, or Both," is usually debatable given the scents backdrop the Pioneer Valley brings to UMass. The current state of the University, however, might be living up to more than its rank.

people," she said. "They had distinct qualities, but they were all connected to the same committee, the same newspaper, the same community."

Cleaver described the personal sacrifice that the party members endured because of their dedication to fight against racist institutions.

"We stood up and challenged the racist power structure," she said. "And we paid the price. Some of us went to jail, and some of us got killed. If you made up your mind to be a Panther, you made up your mind that you might get shot. But the movement was more important than being safe.

"We believed that we were on to the truth," she added. "And the truth is that human rights were equally important to property rights."

Only at the end of the lecture did Cleaver address some of the contemporary issues in American race relations. She spoke passionately about the cons of the Patriot Act and the evils of the Homeland Security Bill. Cleaver stated that several former Black Panther members were labeled terrorists because of the Patriot Act's umbrella definition of terrorism.

PVTA power trip

Debbie Friedman

It's 10:15 on a cold, grey Tuesday morning when suddenly the unbearable sound of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony pierces into my slumberous state in order to remind me it's time for class. I spend a few solitary moments grappling with the fact that I have to leave my bed to go learn about socialist countries in the Caribbean, let out a sigh and slip out of bed in one smooth movement.

Within a handful of minutes I'm heading out the door, suited up in my EMS fleece jacket, favorite pair of jeans and beat up pair of sneakers. My social armor, consisting of an iPod and dark black sunglasses is also intact, ensuring I don't have to directly interact with anyone if I don't want to. As I slowly start to leave the fog of sleep behind, I look ahead with dread at the PVTA bus parked at the docking station of the Puffton Village Apartments.

Hesitantly, I approach the door and solemnly march up the steps, facing a barrage of tired, cranky, silent onlookers. In my ears blasts an inappropriate rap song, which shuffle so kindly picked out for me. My fumbling hands reach for the dial to change 50 Cent's "Candy Shop."

Today, I left 10 minutes early to make sure I got a seat. Having a seat is the only way to make the hellacious ride to campus somewhat tolerable. Now, I sit and wait, listening to a more appropriate Jack Johnson song to make the morning seem a little less grim.

One by one, the bus becomes more packed, as people trail in a single file down the bus aisle, desperately searching for a seat. The ones who missed their chance silently curse themselves for not getting out of bed a few minutes earlier. They now have to pay the price.

The engine fires up, sparking the few stragglers outside to sprint to the doors before they close. Watching them waddle from the weight of their book bags is the only source of amusement during this monotonous routine. Finally, after what seems like ages, the bus drivers around the corner to the next crowded stop and the aforementioned Tuesday, Thursday morning ritual begins.

Alright, if you're standing up, you need to take your book bags off and get close with your neighbors. Make some new friends, the bus driver says with a chuckle.

I hear the scrawny bus driver yell OK, we've got 100 people on this bus, capacity is 120. Sit on each others' laps if you have to.

I eyeball moans and rolls their eyes as they follow the orders and grudgingly pack closer. I can feel the frame of the bus sink closer to the ground. More passengers get on, and no one gets off. The bus then heads around the corner to North Pleasant, and I watch as everyone gives his or her best effort to maintain some sort of personal space. That effort is lost, however, as the driver slams on the brakes, sending elbows into stomachs and book bags into faces.

As we approach the next stop, I see more people lined up than ever before. I hope the driver has enough sense to pass on by and let the Sunderland bus pick them up, since it is probably only a few minutes behind and much less crowded. But unfortunately, I'm wrong.

I hear the scrawny bus driver yell OK, we've got 100 people on this bus, capacity is 120. Sit on each others' laps if you have to.

A few people hit their breaking points just then and yell a few snide remarks to the driver, yet it only fuels his fire. Now, the driver gets out of his seat, heads to the back of the bus and actually herds passengers in like cattle. It's not the first time I had seen a driver engage in a power trip, but today it was too much.

I'm not leaving till you people let everyone on. I'm not kidding. I've got nowhere to be, the driver said, this time with a tremendous smirk on his face.

I look around and see people packed into the stairwells. Total strangers are intertwined with each other in awkward, uncomfortable and unsafe positions. Looking up ahead, I see the reflection of the bus driver quietly laughing at the ridiculous sight he has created. Luckily, the people the bus driver tried to push on refuse the offer to join the cattle cart and we move on.

Aside that should have taken five minutes ended up taking 15, making everyone on the bus late. As I sprint to class, I fantasize about running to the front of the bus and giving the bus driver a dirty look. But lucky for him, I don't have time.

I do have time later, however, to e-mail PVTA and find out the actual capacity of the bus is 83, meaning there were at least 20 people over. So actually, we should have been forced to pack together to make room for the illegal amount of people. Nor should we have been reprimanded for refusing to do so.

This is exactly what I thought. Now, if only there was a way to let everyone know the truth.

Let's put the 'united' back in United States

Jason Robert Mizula

I am a Conservative Independent, and I voted Conservative in 2004. A more Liberal friend of mine asked me if I liked war because I had voted for the president. I was taken aback by her remark and told her something I had heard a number of times in the past: nobody likes war. War is a part of life you sometimes have to deal with. Saying someone likes war is like saying they like cancer, it's completely absurd.

My friend falls a little to the Left politically, while I fall a little to the Right. We're really not that different, her and I, and we have more in common than not. If we were to have children, perhaps they would fall directly in the middle.

They would be wearing Birkenstocks to their NRA meeting or listening to country music in their hybrid car, which would display "Ted Kennedy's car has killed more people than my gun," and, "Give peace a chance" bumper stickers side by side.

They would be against abortion and against the death penalty. They would want to end world hunger, but start by feeding our homeless veterans. They would want harsher drunk driving laws as well as harsher laws against child molestation. They would give all Americans an equal opportunity to succeed, not reward a few based on their heritage.

They would drop the first word and hyphen from many titles. For instance "African-American" would simply become "American." They would stop prolonging the natural process of America's melting pot by teaching children to walk hand in hand as brothers and sisters (proud Americans, not Italian-Americans, Asian-Americans, Jews, Catholics, Muslims or whatever he/she may be).

They would practice religious freedom, not persecution. Schools would spend more time teaching students what they have in common, not what divides them.

The new Rainbow Coalition would care just as much about a crime against a little boy of Polish decent as they would a crime against one of Kenyan or Arab decent. The only pride parade would be an American Pride Parade, including Americans of all ethnicities, creeds and sexual orientations.

Where your great grandparents came from would become a topic of conversation at colleges, not a requirement on scholarship applications. Americans would have only one box to check on applications, "Male" or "Female," not "Caucasian," "African-American," "Pacific-Islander," "Asian," "Hispanic" or "Native-American."

Instead of telling us the other candidate's faults, why don't politicians tell us their own strengths?

They would only have one choice of political party: Independent. We are all independent, and no two educated minds should ever agree on everything. Voting would be based on a person's merits and qualifications, not their party affiliation or family name. A last name of Kennedy, Clinton or Bush would not guarantee victory year in and year out.

I recently attended a College Republicans meeting and was caught off guard by one gentleman's comment. He said I must be there because I hated Liberals as much as he did. I told him I was there to see what the club was all about, and that he had the wrong attitude.

I would venture to guess that some College Democrats aren't anymore open minded than their counterparts. Sure, there are a lot of things the College Republicans and Democrats disagree on, but instead of wasting time arguing and acting childish, how about they work together to make the campus a better place?

We need to be much more open minded and accepting of our fellow Americans.

Instead of telling us the other candidate's faults, why don't politicians tell us their own strengths?

When I hear a professor talking about how bad the Secretary of Defense is and how he should be fired, and when asked, the professor can't name any qualified replacements, am I really benefiting from class that day? A half hour rant straight off the pages of The New York Times isn't what I enrolled in college for. However, other than these Liberal tirades, the aforementioned professor happens to be my favorite professor teaching my favorite class.

Take the extra time to get to know the candidates, what they stand for and what they can do to help our country before voting today. At the end of the day, does it really matter what the paramedic who is saving your life looks like, what his/her heritage is, if he/she is gay or straight or if he/she is Republican or Democrat?

We need to wake up and realize the best person for the job is the person who should get the job. In the business world, the medical profession, the NFL and in politics, we cannot and should not settle for second best.

You are doing your country, your family, yourself and the men and women fighting for our freedom a grave injustice if you vote for someone because of the "D" or the "R" next to their name today.

Jason Robert Mizula is a UMass student.

An age group language gap

Brad Leibowitz

Everything in our parent's generation was keen and dandy. The days were short and sweet, the nights were swell and the burgers down at the local diner were cooked to perfection. Those were the days when movies were in black and white, issues came down to good vs. evil and everything was decided over your neighbor's chocolate cookies. They were the days when Ayn Rand classics were becoming classics, Edward R. Murrow sought out political evil and Elvis Presley's hips were making everyone dance.

However, over time things have slowly changed. From the 1950s to the millennium, the language gap between our parents' generation and our own has undergone a dramatic shift. This situational tongue shift has not only molded the culture of today's cohort, but, combined with technology, it has caused a rift between the age groups.

Take, for example, the euphemisms/sayings of our elder generation(s) as compared with our current lingo. Back in the day, when you did a fantastic job, you went home to hear from your family/friends, "you did an excellent job…just great," today, although the situation may remain the same, the language has dramatically changed.

If the same events took place, your parents would pretty much say the same thing as 50 years ago. However, upon telling your friends, you would hear, "you did a sick job…that's disgusting man." Instead of overusing our parents' vocabulary, which still represents a simpler time, our generation describes good situations with words of endearing disgust.

It has even reached the point where we now use curse words to describe good situations. Just yesterday, when I told my friend I went skydiving over the summer, his exact response was, "that's fed man, totally sick bro." Somehow, our generation has turned a curse into a good deed and a loving phrase into an endearing term of revulsion.

It's no wonder our parents don't understand a word coming out of our mouths. Conversely, as our elders' generation spoke with a slow tone of graciousness reflective of the times, our peers speak with a manner of quick-witted sarcasm and even faster pronunciations.

Nothing has helped our speech patterns pick up pace more than the advent of the Internet, more specifically, AIM (America Instant Messenger). With today's tots growing up in cyberspace, they can type "BTW, FYI, 19f" more accurately than they can pronounce the name of the man who first invented the printing press (Johannes Gutenberg if you're wondering).

Now, ideally, the quicker-paced lingo we use, such as, "By the way, for your information, I'm a 19-year-old female," should be confined to those small sayings. Nevertheless, they are not.

Three years ago, when my parents started using AIM, I began to notice a seemingly small, yet major, difference in our dictions. Due to the excessive use of technology by children, everything has quickened in pace. Whether it's a thermometer (which is now a small electronic device pressed against your forehead that records your temperature in five seconds), or a 15-minute photo-mat (pointless, isn't it?), today's language reflects the AIM culture which it's fostered in.

In lieu of typing "What's going on," I typed, "sup," and "See you later" became "g2g." Upon doing this, my father wanted to know if I was smoking dope.

Talking to my parents online, I quickly discovered instead of using "you are great," I used "u r gr8." In lieu of typing "What's going on," I typed, "sup," and "See you later" became "g2g." Upon doing this, my father wanted to know if I was smoking dope. The moral of the story here being, the farther we remove ourselves from our parents' generation by the use of our diction, the less we learn from them.

It might be a crazy notion (which only I represent), but we as college-aged kids don't know everything in the universe…yet. For the most part, we are sent to college to learn a few more things, make friends and realize our potential in life. However, the further college brings us into our own worlds of possibility, the further away it brings us from the ones who got us here in the first place.

For all the times your parents told you to stop cursing, not to mumble your words or to keep your mouth shut, there was a lesson to be learned. That lesson: Although you think you know everything, no matter what you say or do, there is still something to be learned.

So, the next time your father calls your ripped "Diesel Jeans" slacks or trousers, or the next time your grandparents tell you to speak slower and pronunciate with clearer diction, remember: although your college education has taught you advanced physics, how to properly throw back six shots of tequila in a 10-minute period and how to type "lol" with the best of 'em, for all the things you have learned, there is still a trick or two just out of your reach.

But for now, enjoy the time being because the education is "gr8," and your friends make you "lol" on a daily basis. But now, as for me, I "g2g, ttyl."

MAKE VOTING FAIR

Secretary of State Bill Glavin has just introduced the Diebold touch screen voting machine into Massachusetts.

As Secretary of State, one of Glavin's jobs is to assure fair and accessible voting to the public. So, why did he introduce a voting machine known for easy tampering? A machine that was used to manipulate votes in '04, and has been banned in several states for the '06 election?

We know what happened in Ohio. We don't need that in Massachusetts.

Another duty of the Secretary is to make information about candidates and issues available to the public. Yet, during his primary race, Glavin refused to debate John Bonifaz. During the present campaign for State Secretary, he refuses to debate Dr. Jill Stein.

Glavin is not available. Neither is he interested.

Stein supports clean elections legislation. Bill Glavin does not, and he let the Clean Elections Law die in a backroom on Beacon Hill the last time it was in the legislature.

Stein is the Green-Rainbow candidate in a two-person race. She is an advocate for the environment, the rights of working people and, very importantly, of putting the power of democracy into the hands of the people, rather than in the hands of corporations and lobbyists.

As public information officer, she will call for the elimination of the legislature's exemption from the open meeting and public records laws. And as chief elections officer, who is neither Democrat nor Republican, she will be an independent voice on Beacon Hill to watchdog and safeguard the integrity of our voting process.

Please vote for Jill Stein today.

PRIDE FOR OUR STATE

When is a third party candidate not a third party candidate? When the Republicans have left the field and Jill Stein, Green-Rainbow candidate for Secretary of State, is the only challenger on the ballot against the Democratic incumbent.

Stein ran for governor in 2002, and her performance in the debate led Boston Globe columnist Joan Venocchi to write, "In the midst of the madness, the candidate who spoke the most clearly was Green Party candidate Jill Stein."

Now Stein is running for Secretary of State, an office that oversees elections, lobbying and public information.

Stein is a physician who became involved in politics when she saw the need to keep health protection from being blocked by powerful corporate lobbying on Beacon Hill. As Secretary of State, her goals are to:

1. Apply the open meeting law to the Legislature, ending the culture of secrecy,
2. Restore public financing for qualified candidates,
3. Fight influence-peddling by keeping a watchful eye on lobbying,
4. Allow voters more choices through an "instant runoff" system that allows voters to rank candidates, ensuring that no one's vote will be "wasted" and
5. Keep electronic voting machines out of the state unless they are reliable, cost effective, verifiable and tamper proof.

In the past, many of us have paid little attention to the Secretary of State's office, but the electoral disasters of Florida in 2000 and Ohio in 2004 have clearly shown the damage that can be done by secretaries working against democratic principles.

As she has shown in the past, Stein is concerned that the voices and votes of all the people are heard and counted, and a vote for her today will bring us a Secretary of State we can all be proud of.

NEW MUSIC TUESDAY

Polyvinyl's new band is a success with debut

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Polyvinyl Records' new venture, Someone Still Loves You Boris Yeltsin, released their debut album on October 24th. The Missouri quartet's "Broom" is a very eloquent and quiet glimpse at contemporary pop, quite similar to The Shins.

The album starts off very simply – a catchy 1960's beat with youthful vocals. It is very reminiscent of an Elephant 6 Records original. "Pangea" starts the album with a cheerfully repetitive sound without losing much flair throughout. They aren't pushing things too far, however – while there is synthesizer on the record, it's limited, and the real focus is on the piano, hand clapping, and an uncomplicated guitar chord progression.

The vocals are very interesting. Singer John Robert sounds like any underground band from the Andy Warhol era. It is dark, but much quieter than the Velvet Underground's Lou Reed. The vocals are well layered throughout the album.

A pretty accurate comparison could be made with The Shins if they had Elliott Smith singing. Robert's words are almost hushed and whispered at times, which let's face it – doesn't quite do it for everyone. His range is either very limited, or he just isn't pushing himself. The thing that sells it is the production – the vocals mix with the music extremely well, and having a layered voice gives the album that extra kick.

Someone Still Loves You Boris Yeltsin's "Oregon Girl" shines brightly in the mix of the album. The track sticks out as very simple, yet memorable. The lyrics, like on most of the tracks, are not complex or engaging, leaving a lack of substance all the way through. But this isn't much of a problem as a whole. The problem with the song, much like the other tracks, is that it is over too quick. The majority of the tracks don't even surpass the two-and-a-half minute mark.

"Anne Elephant" is one track which touches on the five minute mark, but for the most part the experience of the album dwindles at the lack of length. With a debut album, you would think it would have a little more substance – but the quality doesn't quit on any track.

It's with this solid consistency that SSLYBY pulls it off quite well. "Broom" should be an instant success for any fans of the Shins or Pavement, or Of Montreal – a growing demographic in today's music scene. The music is simple, and this is really all you need if it is charming. The album is not one to reach out and grab an audience – it is subtle, and will make you come and seek it out.

DiFranco continues to perform feminist oriented material on her latest album

By David Humphreys
Collegian Correspondent

Upright bass scales and soft pianochords open Ani DiFranco's newest LP, "Reprieve." Emotive, politically bold, and conscious as always, "Reprieve" hides nothing and makes no false pretenses. With the music industry flooded by generic power-pop bands and new rockers, very few artists really shine through the muddled mess.

DiFranco's punctuating staccato vocals and accompanying guitar shows she is perfecting her art as a counterculture icon and politically active songwriter with most of her songs on "Reprieve."

By blending her signature finger picking guitar style, poetry and scarce background instrumentation, DiFranco turned "Reprieve" into a work of both minimalism and deep, hard sound. The title track of the album, with scarce guitar arpeggios, is more like a poetry reading than a CD track while "Half-Assed" gives DiFranco's usually acoustic presence an electric vibe.

Ultimately, though, the same aspects that help "Reprieve" excel also contribute to its downfall. Given there is only so many combinations of basic chords and rhythms, DiFranco's newest work sounds less like 13 individual tracks and more like a large continuation of one track.

Compared to other current acoustically dominated not-quite-mainstream artists such as Damien Rice or even Gary Jules, "Reprieve" offers less deviation from a common theme. There are often just changed lyrics and subtle variations in chord progression. Although this can be refreshing, many trends in today's newer music, it does tend to become rather bland after a few replays.

Fueled by her influence in underground and feminist cultures, gained by holding intimate concerts, as well as her political advocacy, has provided DiFranco with a growing fan base, and a soapbox for her political messages.

"Reprieve"'s ultimate downfall is that it does not vary enough from her never-changing messages and viewpoints. Most artists will evolve over the years but, with 17 original albums, DiFranco's songs rarely ever change.

'Breakfast' serves up two sets full of new and old material in Northampton concert

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

With time running out on a Friday evening of hard-hitting rock and roll, the Breakfast gave the crowd a parting taste of euphonic bliss. As the trio said their so-longs and thank you's, the house lights at the Ironhorse came up, the after show music began to play, and the crowd refused to accept any of it. At once, the packed ski-lodge of a venue began to chant "One more song."

The wants and desires of an insatiable audience were too much for Northampton regulation stating that shows must end at 1 a.m. The band returned to the stage immediately, confirming the belief they knew all along, there would be no walking away without an encore tonight.

The Breakfast had come to rip, and they did. Palmieri, Spears and Tramontano burned their way through two up tempo sets, playing a mix of old and new.

The final tune, aptly titled "Wild Pack of cracks" featured Palmieri shredding the bulk of the song with his Gibson behind his head. With the floor literally shaking beneath them, the congregation rejoiced, for the language of rock'n'roll had spoken and the message was clear. The power of music to move the mind and body is more powerful than law, limit, and reason.

Moist, satiated, and without reason for complaint, the listeners, senses blunted from an aural assault, slowly moved toward the door, most stopping to shake hands and exchange thanks with the band members. A level of intimacy and connection between fan and artist only found with particular bands at particular points in their careers ensued. A rarity indeed, The Breakfast has reached a level marked by both acclaim and anonymity.

When long time friend and hand member Jordan Giangreco departed over the summer, the seasoned trio settled into a precarious transitory period. After releasing five albums, playing over 1000 live shows and receiving a Jammy for Best New Artist, the Breakfast has not achieved relative success. Despite accolades and milestones, they are known only to a tight circle of devoted followers and music aficionados. Traveling across the country by van, incessantly touring and promoting, the question of sustainability cannot be overlooked. How long can The Breakfast continue to perform at their current level without the rewards of notoriety and financial success? And furthermore, if the band does attain the 'next level' how will the scene and the music suffer?

One thing is for certain, down-home music houses like the Iron Horse would not be able to entertain a band with a large scale following. [illegible] 100 plus in attendance on [illegible] night, this was not a per[illegible] overlooked.

If you missed The Breakfast on Friday, you missed the core intersection of musical power, experience, and intimacy. Next time they come to town, let's hope they haven't changed a bit.

Albom reads at Starbucks

By Hailey Edwards
The Seattle Times

When Mitch Albom, best-selling author of the new novel "For One More Day," came to Seattle two weeks ago, his was not a typical visit of an author on a book tour.

Albom began his day reading to about 600 employees at Starbucks' corporate headquarters, then answered questions from more than 250 fans at the Starbucks at Madison Park and finally read again at a candle-lit literary salon at the swanky Palace Ballroom in Belltown. Instead of folding chairs and shelves of books at the local bookshop the customary accoutrements of book readings these events boasted free lattes, a velvet-skirted stage, and a catered crostini bar, not to mention the presence of Starbucks Chairman Howard Schultz, whose chain of thousands of coffee stores is selling Albom's book.

Albom's day of book readings, during which he never stepped foot in a bookstore, is emblematic of the way for better or worse that the bookselling world is changing.

Kim Ricketts, founder and owner of Kim Ricketts Book Events, hosted both Albom's event at Starbucks' headquarters and the following $50-a-ticket literary salon in Belltown.

"It's a win-win situation," says Ricketts, who organizes authors to do readings at the workplaces of Boeing, Starbucks, Microsoft and public venues in both Seattle and San Francisco. "When I organize an event at, say, Microsoft, those employees get to hear about something they're interested in. The author gets an audience with a group of people interested in what he's doing, and the publisher gets a room full of people who are buying books."

But bookstores, the traditional venue for author readings, aren't necessarily getting a slice of that win-win situation, and it's hurting their bottom line. When a touring author reads at a bookstore, he or she attracts anywhere from a couple-hundred to a thousand people often generating that bookstore's most substantial sales for a month. So when publishers opt for book tours of literary salons, a bookstore's bread and butter is at stake. In the case of an author like Albom, whose "Tuesdays With Morrie" has sold millions of copies, that's a lot of bread and butter.

"I know for a fact that there are bookstores out there that rely entirely on their five big author events a year. If those big authors stop coming, they'll shut their doors," says Robert Sindelar, manager and buyer at Third Place Books.

While Sindelar acknowledges that because of the robust literary Power loss does not stop jazz performance

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

This time last year, a magical night of music went down in Vermont. In October, 2005, Brattleboro's historic Latchis Theatre played host to a quartet led by none other than Roy Haynes, who once drummed for the likes of Charlie Parker, John Coltrane and Thelonious Monk. Haynes turned 80 earlier this year. Halfway through their set, the storm outside knocked the power out, and the musicians onstage were forced to finish in near-darkness, and without amplification.

Rising to the occasion, Haynes and his men finished their gig by flashlight running through standards from the vast jazz canon like Monk's "Green Chimneys." The music was potent to begin with, but grew stronger once the lights went out. Against all odds, Haynes and his band were going to deliver their message.

On Saturday night, almost thirteen months to the day, that magic hit the Valley this time around. Just minutes before show time, a failed power line darkened most of Northampton, including Pearl Street's intimate clubroom, Bobby Previte's Coalition of the Willing, featuring Charlie Hunter on guitar, Robert Walter on keyboards, the eccentric Skerik on saxophones and Previte on drums, would be unable to perform.

As a full band, that is. In near-darkness, and without amplification, Skerik and Previte took to the stage, sans Hunter and Walter, for fifty minutes of improvised music. A small crowd stuck by the duo as they tore through a set of winding, wailing tenor saxophone and rocking, funky drumming. Snippets of "Amazing Grace," "Happy Birthday To You" and the Coalition's own "Airstrip One" floated by but, save for a moment here and there, the musical conversation between the veteran drummer and Seattle-based saxophonist was composed on the spot, explored briefly, and ultimately discarded in favor of the next phrase, theme or lill

Following the duo's set, which also featured screaming, Borat references and a rant about the 1 major scale (all from Skerik), the band began packing up, and the crowd filtered out of Pearl Street. For those who stayed, hoping to catch a tune or two if the power came back on, there was one surprise left. For an audience of less than ten, Skerik sat on the edge of the stage and ended the show home with his take of "Pure Imagination," from "Willy Wonka & The Chocolate Factory." Imagine that.

culture in Seattle the bookstores here will be able to sustain "a bigger hit," he worries about bookstores in other towns.

With the number of events hosted by Kim Ricketts Book Events up from an average of 15 to 20 readings a month in 2004 to 30 a month in 2006 (there were 51 in October alone), the future of the average bookstore looks bleak to some. But the issue is more complex than merely pitting literary salons against traditional in-store book readings.

"The whole way media is being marketed is changing dramatically and bookstores are scraping uncomfortably in the crevasse. It doesn't matter how you get your information anymore," Ricketts says, citing iTunes, YouTube, and Amazon.com as examples of new sources of media. "People want books, but they don't have to work to get them anymore."

Ricketts, a former reading coordinator for the University Book Store, concedes that some bricks-and-mortar bookstores will shut their doors in the coming years, but she says that's a result of neither her business nor the rising popularity of literary salons. "Most of the people who buy books from me aren't the type that go to bookstores regularly. They're not going to go to the 7 o'clock reading after work at Elliott Bay regardless," she says.

Brittany Winters, 24, who attended her first Starbucks literary salon at the Albom event, isn't sure she would have made it to see Albom at a bookstore. "It's convenient because I'd be here anyway," she says. "And it's nice and feels more accessible than a bookstore."

But Sindelar insists that a large part of his business is attracting people like Winters, who might not otherwise make their way to a bookstore after work. "If we can get them to our parking lot just once that's the hard part then we can give them the experience of being in a bookstore, which they're not going to get anywhere else," he says. A high-profile author like Albom is the best way to lure those "unlikely bookstore people" into his store.

Publishing houses are also caught between encouraging literary salons, which sell large numbers of a single title, and continuing to support bookstores, which sell all the most current books on a publishing house's roster. Indeed, publishers rely heavily on book sellers to "hand sell" books by more obscure authors that's how an little-known book like "Cold Mountain" turned into a million-copy seller.

"It's bad business," Sindelar says of publishers' endorsement of literary salons. "They're excited because it's new and cutting edge, but these events don't sell their backlist."

Carol Schneider, executive director of publicity and public relations at Random House, says each book tour is designed to connect the book with its specific audience. "Sometimes the best place for an author to visit is not a bookstore, but that doesn't mean we're abandoning our bookstores," she says. "There're room for both." Although Schneider admits that often authors only have time for one event in each city during a book tour.

Ricketts, a self-described "book matchmaker," has built her business on connecting each book with its (increasingly elusive) reading audience. "A lot of people actually need to be reminded they like to read," she says. "And when I'm able to do that by going to places where people aren't actively seeking out books, it's good for everyone. If people start buying more books, where are they going to go? A bookstore, right?"

Maybe. But in the case of Albom's book, people can just go to Starbucks and pick it up along with their double lattes.

This past summer, Albom agreed to become Starbucks' first promoted author, heralding the expansion of Starbucks Entertainment. In addition to selling CDs and DVDs, Starbucks will begin selling novels in-store. While Albom prefers reading in a "comfortable place where they serve food," he jokes, it's not the access to customers, the ambiance or the free latte that made him sign on with Starbucks.

"You get a certain amount of success and you have an obligation to direct that toward charity. This is an easy way to do that," he explains. For every copy of his book Starbucks sells, it donates $1 to Jumpstart, a anti-illiteracy partnership.

"It's a win-win situation," says Schultz Starbucks chairman "We add texture to our brand, we can guarantee a certain number of books sold, and authors have a great place to connect with their readers."

Albom's promotional tour has stopped at several Starbucks nationwide.

But Starbucks as an up-and-coming literary salon is just the beginning.

"We're looking into publishing books, too," reveals Schultz. "There's so much talent out there, and they can't find a publisher. It'd be a great service for emerging authors. Even as we speak, we have someone at William Morris (Literary Agency) who is reading scripts and treatments. It's more than an idea. It's something we're serious about."

But Sindelar insists that, when it comes to buying and selling books, "There's a philosophical issue to consider. Is there a substitute for walking in to a bookstore? Is there a substitute for experiencing the physical book, browsing a few titles, rubbing shoulders with other book lovers, picking up books by authors you wouldn't have heard of?"

"I don't know," he says. "But I hope not."

Crowe returns to film with 'A Good Year'

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

TORONTO — He couldn't be a more affable host. He meets you at his hotel suite door with a "Good to see ya again, mate," inquires if it's OK to continue smoking and then offers to pour you some coffee.

Yet when he heads to the carafe, you can't help but take a quick peek to see if there is a telephone within hurling distance.

So is the mercurial legend of Russell Crowe.

On this day, however, only an hour or so after Crowe has charmed and disarmed a roomful of international journalists at a press conference for Crowe's new film "A Good Year" at September's Toronto International Film Festival, he is on a bit of a goodwill mission. And in deference to the no-worries, one-of-the-lads attitude he tried to preserve before he became a moody, put-upon movie star, Crowe doesn't deny it.

"Did I think it would be a good idea to make a movie like this one, where I wasn't playing some tough, focused warrior of some kind to take the edge off things? Yeah, I did, sure," says Crowe, who had to eat some after that fateful, phone-wielding altercation with a hotel concierge last year.

"Would I have done it if it hadn't been a good, funny script and if Ridley (Scott, his director in "Gladiator") wasn't directing? I dunno, maybe, maybe not.

"Fortunately, it was a good role and a good script, and it was set in Provence, and Ridley was directing. And I thought if there was ever an opportunity for people to see another side of what it is I do, this was it. The food was good, the company was good, the women were lovely. I was among friends."

"A Good Year," opening Friday, tells the story of Max Skinner, a high-powered London investment banker who as a boy, played by Freddie Highmore) spent summers with his wine- and women-cultivating uncle (Albert Finney) on his country estate in the south of France. When the uncle dies, he leaves the estate to Max, who darts over to France expecting to turn a quick sale and profit. But as happens when uptight, ambitious, career-obsessed people go to France, things change.

"A Good Year" is based on a novel by Peter Mayle, but Crowe admits to having only a passing acquaintance with the best seller. Scott who just happens to spend part of the year in Provence had suggested that Mayle, his next-door neighbor, write the book. The novel is dedicated to Scott.

"Russell had made films in Australia that showed his softer side, so to speak," says Scott.

"So I suggested this might be something we could do on the run, so to speak, without all the backgrounding and endless preparation that goes into something like 'Gladiator.' I had finished 'Kingdom of Heaven,' and that had been a major undertaking, and I was looking to something that was a little more spontaneous."

As for Crowe, he was coming off the box office failure of what he still believes "is one of the best pieces of work I'd done to date," playing Depression-era boxer Jim Braddock in director Ron Howard's "Cinderella Man," and awaiting a start date for "Tenderness," a "Kiwi little drama" he's since finished with Australian director John Polson.

He had pulled out of a co-starring role with Nicole Kidman in an epic war drama to be directed by Baz Luhrmann, allegedly because the cast was asked to defer salaries so Luhrmann could get a larger budget from the studio.

"I do charity work, but not for movie studios," said Crowe.

Between disbanding his rock group "10 Odd Feet of Grunts," and forming a new one, the Ordinary Fear of God, Crowe was spending his time making a solo album, tentatively titled "My Hand, My Heart," with producer Matt Dusk, leader of the Canadian band the Crash Big Sea.

"It wasn't all that tough to convince the unions to go live in an 18th-century chateau in the south of France for two months," says Crowe. "That was certainly one of the factors involved. But the primary one was that Malik (Yoba) had been wanting to work together since 'Gladiator.'

"So Ridley and I kept talking, and I could see he really wanted to work with me called our little wine movie. So I thought, said, 'OK, let's do this.' Even though we really didn't have a finished script. He's one of those filmmakers you can completely trust. If he says we'll get one right, I'm inclined to believe him."

Scott says there were only about 70 pages to the script when they started.

"But I knew when we were in France, ideas would suggest themselves as they always do. Sometimes you get bolts of good red. But Russell—such a natural-five actor, he knows his characters inside and out before he gets before the camera, which means his improving is usually on the mark. He's fun to work with. He's the most graceful actor I've ever worked with. He [expletive deleted] stuff in 'A Good Year' that's not in the script but in the film."

Islam returns strong with new CD

Yusuf Islam formerly known as Cat Stevens is releasing his first mainstream album 'An Other Cup' in 27 years. The album's title is a reference to Islam's breakout album 'Tea for Tillerman.'

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

In Simon Leng's "While My Guitar Gently Weeps: The Music of George Harrison," he astutely pegs the mid- 80s as the Armani age of rock. It's when chart-toppers of the '60s and '70s, long held in critical and commercial disrepute by the onslaught of punk, were rehabilitated, taking the stage of charity concerts in Armani suits to be given their just rewards as icons.

It's easy to imagine the artist formerly known as Cat Stevens being among them, having made some of the most original and popular records of that era, performing "Peace Train" with Harrison, Elton John, Eric Clapton and maybe Phil Collins at, say, the Prince's Charity Trust.

He did not, because Cat Stevens (who was born Steven Demetre Georgiou) had renounced pop music and stardom. He had converted to Islam, taking the name Yusuf Islam, and adopted the belief that music is an affront to Allah. He even petitioned his record company to stop distributing his albums.

At that time, this was considered weird on a level of George Harrison's Krishna-based Hinduism, but not malevolent. It took the Iranian revolution and the subsequent American hostage-taking for the concept of radical Islam to permeate most rock fans' pot-neutralized brains. The former Stevens' irresistible, mostly gentle pop hits were still in regular rotation on radio.

Only when Yusuf Islam endorsed the fatwa by the Ayatollah Khomeini calling for the death of author Salman Rushdie did this musician return to the public consciousness. Though he would claim that he had been misunderstood he chalked it up to "journalistic malice" he paid the price of a pariah.

No Armani for him, though in the wake of 9/11, he was back in the spotlight, saying the attacks were a perversion of his faith, and singing an a cappella version of "Peace Train" as a prelude to the broadcast of the Concert for New York City.

He had apparently joined with Muslims who believe that singing is OK, but that playing a guitar would still greatly displease Allah. This did not impress the U.S. government, which later prevented the plane on which he was traveling to Washington from landing there, and deported him to England.

Now the guitar is back, on a new album credited to Yusuf Islam "formerly known as Cat Stevens."

Titled "An Other Cup," it is a direct reference to his breakthrough 1970 album, "Tea for the Tillerman," and some of the songs could pass for outtakes. "Heaven/Where True Love Goes" is an account of his spiritual journey, in "Maybe There's a World" he sings of a world "where nobody's taking sides."

Most amusingly or egregiously, he covers the Animals hit, "Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood."

The problem with this is not just that Stevens has failed to denounce the strain of Islam responsible for the killing of innocents be it by beheading or allowing their children to become suicide bombers.

The former Cat Stevens' voice sounds rich and strong on "An Other Cup."

Village Opera releases rock opera

By Walter Tunis
McClatchy Newspapers

It's only fitting. After all, rock music has borrowed liberally from the pageantry of opera for decades. Isn't it about time opera got a little payback?

The impetus for New York's East Village Opera Company isn't quite that vengeful. Its members simply love the familiar melodies of Verdi, Puccini and Bizet enough to electrify them a bit.

The resulting music on the company's self-titled debut album isn't always full-tilt rock 'n' roll, but there is enough of a pop attitude to make it sound at least by opera standards wildly contemporary. And if that means embracing at least some of the stylistic extremes, even clichés, of high-minded rock acts, so be it.

"I don't think it's any accident that what has worked best with some of the grander opera music we do is a touch of '70s arena rock, which was clearly an overblown, dramatic and pompous as opera ever was," said East Village co-founder, keyboardist and arranger Peter Kiesewalter. "So I tell the musicians in this band not to shy away from any rock clichés you tend to avoid as a player because of reasons of taste. This music warrants that kind of drama."

A classically trained clarinetist who has worked in recent years composing music for films and television, Kiesewalter began collaborating with East Village vocalist Tyley Ross in 2001. At first, the two were asked to arrange a modern take on Italian opera for a movie. In short order, they were performing similar variations at such non-opera New York establishments as Joe's Pub. The repertoire grew, as did the band, which now boasts a full rock-pop quintet, a string quartet and two vocalists.

"There was a genuine attraction on our part to the melodies of opera," Kiesewalter said. "I have a classical background. I've played music from this era. But I've never been an opera fan. Yet the more I listened to opera, the more the melodies cried out. These arias, in essence, are pop tunes that have stood the test of time.

"I just thought it would be neat to imagine what the composers of this music might have done with the music were they alive today. I also wanted to see if the music still worked in a different instrumental context."

In terms of repertoire, the company plays it safe on its debut album with a series of largely familiar works ("Opera's greatest hits," as Kiesewalter calls them) with excerpts from "La Boheme," "Carmen" and "Madama Butterfly."

But the modern accents are immediate. Strings might usher in the album-opening overture to Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro." But then drums and guitars kick in. All of a sudden, Mozart has a beat. Then you hear a looping keyboard line in the background that isn't Mozart at all, but a passage from The Who's "Won't Get Fooled Again."

"When we launch into a tune that almost everybody recognizes from some source whether they have heard it performed in an opera house or heard it in a Bugs Bunny cartoon or maybe a commercial the music is provided an immediate context. By knowing the original, they can tell right away what it is we're doing. I mean, this music is part of our collective DNA. It's going to be around 100 years from now the same way Beatles tunes and Cole Porter tunes will be."

But what does t[hat] music contingency think [of] Carmen thrown to the [wo]lves? How readily [will] accept an aria [that] amplified guitar?

"When we started [we] there would be [some] reactions," Kiesewalter [said]. "I knew there were [some] thought audiences that [knew] music would be [put] the liberties that we [do] music that is so [ri]reaction has been [ov]

Jillette gets his own radio show

By David Hinckley
New York Daily News

NEW YORK — Penn Jillette says his greatest satisfaction on the radio, or anywhere, comes from "holding a polite and respectful discussion with someone whose ideas I totally reject."

That's trickier than the magic acts he has performed onstage for 30 years with his silent partner Teller, he says. "But I've learned how to do it. It's the single thing I'm proudest of."

Jillette comes to these challenges with strong ideas of his own, often challenging what he considers popular misconceptions. He's questioned Mother Teresa. He's suggested global warming isn't quite the problem Al Gore would have us believe.

These notions pop up in the Penn & Teller show, in his movies, on his Showtime series "Bullsh-t" and now on his daily hour-long radio show.

"I'm an atheist," he says. "I believe there is no God. So I want do talk with a devout Catholic and say, 'We disagree completely. But I love you.'"

In general, as his fans know, Jillette is a libertarian who wants the fewest possible restrictions on any part of life.

Last week, for instance, he was flying from Las Vegas to New York, where he was promoting a new "BS" DVD and doing a week of radio shows from the Free-FM studio.

After slogging through checkpoints with, among other things, two child's seats, he was asked if there are any common misconceptions about airport security.

"The biggest one," he replies instantly, "is that it's necessary.

"It's amazing how quickly people will give up their liberties for the hope of security meaning, as Ben Franklin pointed out, they will have neither. We want a risk-free society, but freedom comes with risks. Being risk-free takes away all the joy."

Happily, he says, he can find joy elsewhere, like on the radio.

"I love radio," he says. "I've wanted to do it for 15 years, but radio shows were always four-hour packages and I didn't have the time or the skill to do that. So when Free-FM offered an hour, I was ready."

He spends 2 ½ to 3 hours a day on the show, he says. "It's about a 3:1 ratio for total time spent to finished product. That's about the same as a porn movie. It's much less than, say, Apocalypse Now,' which was about 100:1."

In the end, he just likes radio's rhythm.

"On TV, everyone looks desperate. Even a genius like David Letterman always looks like he's about to get fired.

"On radio, I have to constantly remind myself to slow down. You can breathe. You can explain. You have time to listen."

Which can have odd results.

"There's nothing more beautiful than someone proving you wrong," he says. "That means you've learned something."

Penn Jillette of Penn & Teller now has his own radio show. Listeners will hear Jillette's comical side as well as his political side.

Allen returns as Santa Clause in new movie

By Roger Moore
The Orlando Sentinel

Tim Allen has been Disney's go-to" guy for almost two decades, delivering a long-running hit television show and a couple of movie series or three.

So how does Disney reward the cash cow? It leaves Allen with a lump of coal for "The Santa Clause 3: The Escape Clause," the third and almost certainly last of the "Clause" films. This premature gulp of holiday jeer has big-screen production values but nary a laugh.

A dozen years into the franchise and Santa (real name, Scott) has a trophy wife, a baby on the way and annoying new in-laws to contend with. And he's still the same workaholic who wrecked his first marriage.

Oh, and Jack Frost is nipping at his, uh, nose. Jack (Martin Short, faaaaaabulous makeup, not so fab jokes) wants Santa's job. He dreams of turning the North Pole into a theme park, and himself into a lounge act.

And then it's Back to the Future as we revisit the events that put Scott into the fat suit way back in 1994. He sees, briefly, how the world would be without him as Santa. Hard to believe the guys who wrote "There's Something About Mary" have sunk to this.

The movie's shtick as Jack's hair, as lifeless as its animatronic, flatulent reindeer. Even the outtakes are lame. Stay for the one where Allen chastises a co-star who can't keep a straight face. "Does my acting amuse you?"

No, pal. Not in the fat suit, anyway.

The elves are still played by children in need of acting school. Ann-Margret and Alan Arkin are the guilt-trip parents of the bride who don't know the son-in-law's job. They and the annoying family of Jack's ex-wife (Judge Reinhold as a wimpy therapist) come to the Pole for the holidays.

The other "legendary figures" (Peter Boyle as Father Time, Kevin Pollak as Cupid, etc.) try to help Santa keep Jack in line.

Liza Minnelli, circa 1974.

A-Rod trade makes sense on many levels

in New York as George Bush is at a podium trading A-Rod is, undoubtedly, in the best interest of the Yankees.

Yes, trading one of baseball's best players will improve the Yankees. How, you ask? It will make them more efficient. Let me repeat that. It will make them more efficient.

Aside from being a shortstop, Rodriguez is a prototypical three-hole hitter. Tell me, how many three-hole hitters do the Yankees have? I count four. How many should they have? one.

Dealing Rodriguez will give the Yankees so much more flexibility. They'll be able to acquire a few of the parts they so desperately need. Float A-Rod's name on baseball's perpetually whirling rumor mill and see how much attention you get.

Theo Epstein would make a call but I'm pretty sure there's a block on that number. Artie Moreno would surely give Mr. Cashman a buzz and can certainly afford to dish out the funds necessary to bring Rodriguez to Anaheim. Hell, maybe even Jim Hendry could furnish a package sweet enough for the Yankees to justify parting ways with one of baseball's best.

His new manager, Lou Pinella, made it perfectly clear that if A-Rod were to call Wrigley Field home, he'd be happy.

Dealing Rodriguez would not only free up some cash for the Yankees, but it would give them an opportunity to deal for some young pitchers.

Hey Yankees fans, you do remember what pitching is, right? It's been absent from the Bronx for a few years now. You had a lot of it in the last decade. Incidentally you also won a few trophies in the 90's.

Go figure.

So, who should replace A-Rod after he's dealt to, let's say, Anaheim or Chicago?

Scott Rolen? No. Eric Chavez? No.

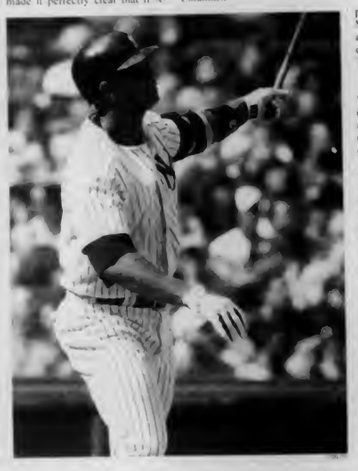
The man that should occupy third base for the Yankees next season is Aramis Ramirez. Ramirez recently filed for free agency and the 38 home runs he hit last year with the Cubs should suffice.

Yes, I know he's not a perennial all-star or a first-ballot hall of famer and his power numbers would most likely fall off due to the superiority of American League hurlers and Yankee Stadium's dimensions- but he is a third baseman.

The Yankees have been an all-star team for a few years now.

Perhaps they should try being a baseball team.

Joe Meloni is a Collegian Columnist



Alex Rodriguez finished 2006 with a .290 batting average and 35 home runs. He ranked fourth in the AL in RBI (121), and fifth in runs scored (113).

UM and JMU sit atop A-10

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

There are two undefeated teams remaining in the Atlantic 10 at the moment. The Massachusetts Minutemen (8-1, 6-0 A-10) lead the A-10 North, and the James Madison Dukes (8-1, 6-0 A-10) sit atop the A-10 South.

If things remain the same, both teams will finish the season with their records unblemished, however, they are not scheduled to face each other. Both teams have two games remaining against tough conference opponents.

A-10 Football

The Minutemen square off against Maine this Saturday, and Hofstra in two weeks – both of the games are at home. The Dukes are on the road for both contests – they head to Villanova this weekend and take on an upstart Towson team in Maryland to close out the regular season.

This weekend will be crucial for both teams. If the Minutemen win their final two games, they are assured at least two home games in the NCAA Tournament.

James Madison's matchup with Villanova may appear like a mismatch, but Villanova is currently riding a two-game winning streak. After a tough start to its conference schedule, its upset of a nationally-ranked Richmond team will certainly boost its confidence as it welcomes the Dukes to Villanova Stadium.

The A-10 does not have a championship game, so UMass and James Madison would not play to decide a Conference Championship. They could see each other in the NCAA Tournament, however.

Shootout in the South

Towson (6-3, 3-3 A-10) and William & Mary (3-6, 1-5 A-10) combined for 776 passing yards and 1,085 yards of total offense on Saturday as William & Mary defeated Towson 29-28.

William & Mary junior quarterback Mike Potts threw for 409 yards and two touchdown passes in the victory. The A-10 named him its Offensive Player of the Week for his performance. Also, the conference named William & Mary defensive end Adrian Tracy Co-Rookie of the Week – Tracy registered three sacks and forced a fumble.

William & Mary Kicker Blair Pritchard garnered A-10 Special Teams Player of the Week honors. The senior made all three of his field-goal attempts on the day, including the game-winner – a 34-yarder with five seconds left. Pritchard added an 18-yard kick and another 34-yarder for the Tribe.

Although Towson fell short in Saturday's contest, sophomore quarterback Sean Schaefer had yet another astounding performance. He completed 33-of-51 passes for 367 yards and four touchdowns.

The Tribe gained possession of the ball with 1:26 left on the clock at their 30-yard line. A 10-play 53-yard drive put them at the Towson 17-yard line with five seconds remaining for the winning field goal.

Maine gets back on track

Before Maine (6-3, 5-1 A-10) fell to Rhode Island (4-5, 2-4 A-10) 10 days ago, the Black Bears were tied with UMass for first place in the A-10 North.

Maine righted its ship this weekend, defeating Northeastern (3-6, 2-4 A-10) 30-3 in Orono.

The Maine defense stifled Northeastern's offensive attack – limiting the Huskies to 36 yards rushing and 172 yards of total offense.

Senior captain Matt King spearheaded the Maine defense. The Stoughton native recorded a career-high three and a half sacks and forced two fumbles in the winning effort.

Early in the game's final period, Matt King burst through the Northeastern offensive line and leveled Northeastern quarterback John Sperrazza in the end zone for his first-career safety. King is now the A-10's leader in sacks with 9.5 – he also leads the conference with 16 tackles for a loss.

Offensively, senior quarterback Ron Whitcomb threw for a season-high 281 yards and two scores. Both scoring strikes were to senior receiver Arel Gordon. Gordon also had a four-yard touchdown run to open the game's scoring.

There was not much in the way of a bright spot for Northeastern in the contest.

Richmond continues to plummet

Three weeks ago, the Richmond Spiders boasted a 5-2 record and a 2-1 conference record. They occupied the No. 13 spot in the Sports Network I-AA poll and were in second place, behind James Madison, in the A-10 South.

Things have changed a little recently. The Spiders dropped their last three games and are now tied for third place in the A-10 South with Delaware. Richmond descended to No. 25 in the polls as well.

Its most recent defeat came at the hands of Villanova 16-3, 3-3 A-10) on Saturday. The Richmond defense allowed the Wildcats to run the ball for huge chunks of yardage all day.

The Wildcats ran for 289 total yards and three scores on the ground. Senior running back Marvin Burroughs torched the Spider defense for 124 yards on 14 carries – he also had two touchdown runs of one and 37 yards in the first half. Junior Matt Dicken totaled 124 yards on 21 carries. His lone score came on a one-yard run at the 5:56 mark of the second quarter.

The Spiders host Towson this weekend in their final home game of the season – it is Senior Day for the Spiders.

Rhode Island seeks revenge

Last October, Rhode Island traveled to Durham, N.H. to take on the Wildcats. A win against a top-Itt team on the road would have been huge for Rhode Island.

UNH won 53-9.

The explosive UNH offense needed to do very little. Ricky Santos and company rarely had to move the ball very far to score – the Wildcats started nine drives in URI territory. They totaled just 283 yards of total offense while scoring five touchdowns. Santos threw four scores to four different receivers – UNH also returned a punt, a kick-off and a fumble for scores.

The Rhode Island offense was two-for-16 on third downs and they fumbled 11 times – losing six of them.

URI enters this Saturday's contest on a two-game winning streak. It began conference play 0-4 but has won its last two – including a 3-0 win over Maine 10 days ago.

The Rams are certainly still the underdog in this contest, however, the matchup appears a lot closer now that UNH has dropped three games in the conference.

William & Mary junior Mike Potts (above) and UNH junior Ricky Santos (below) are two quarterbacks that have received Player of the Week honors.

Four Hockey East teams ranked in Top 20 of national poll

Maine senior forward Michel Leveille leads the Hockey East in points with 12. His six goals on the year rank second in the league.

tion lost by the 14 non-returning players.

The team lost eight of its top 10 scorers from last season, so the onus of the scoring will fall under senior forwards Jason Tejchma and Jeremy Hall.

The River Hawks have two highly promising freshmen entering the program as defenders. Nick Schaus and Barry Goers should make an immediate impact on the blue line.

In goal, freshman Carter Hutton has performed well thus far for the team. He was thrust into the starting job after former River Hawk goalie Peter Vetri decided to leave the program after two years.

Nonetheless, hockey is played on the ice, not on paper, so there's no denying the success the team has had thus far. In fact, the River Hawks' 2-0-2 record in conference play is their best start to a season since 1991-92. Lowell tied BU at home on Friday night, 1-1.

Freshmen today, stars tomorrow

Boston University coach Jack Parker has the best freshmen class in Hockey East, according to the Web site, Inside College Hockey. The Terriers welcome five freshmen, including highly touted defensemen Brian Strait.

The recruiting class of cross-town rival Boston College is ranked third in the conference, behind UMass Lowell. The Eagles only added four freshmen to a roster laden with experience. Forwards Ben Smith and Matt Price should have the biggest impact of the four.

Other freshmen who should make an impact in Hockey East are forward Ted Purcell of Maine and goalie Brian Foster of UNH, Ryan Simpson of Providence, and Dan Meyers of Massachusetts.

National rankings

Four Hockey East teams are ranked in the top 20 of the USCHO.com/CSTV Poll. Maine and Boston College maintained their spots in the rankings at No. 1 and No. 3, respectively.

BU moved down one spot to No. 8, while New Hampshire stayed at No. 13.

Massachusetts fell only nine points shy of cracking the top 20 of the poll. UMass Lowell garnered 28 points, but remains five spots away from making the list.

However, the Minutemen claimed No. 18 in the Power Rankings produced by Inside College Hockey.

Weekly Awards

The Hockey East Association named senior forward Chris Capraro of Massachusetts its Player of the Week. The Medford native made his presence known in his first game of the season, scoring two goals and adding an assist in a 4-1 victory over Providence on Friday night.

The Rookie of the Week award went to freshman goaltender Carter Hutton of UMass Lowell. Hutton made 34 saves in a tie against BU on Friday and posted a shutout against Merrimack the next day.

The HEA also named senior goaltender John Curry its Defensive Player of the Week. Curry stopped 56 of 59 shots in two games, helping his team earn ties against UMass Lowell and Maine over the weekend. He established a 1.38 goals-against average and a .949 save percentage over the stretch. Although Providence only has two wins in nine games, a lack of shots on goal is not to blame for its struggles on the ice. However, the Friars should focus on taking better quality shots, as they rank ninth in team offense, with 2.22 goals per game. BC has defeated Vermont in all of its last 10 meetings. UMass Lowell finally ended its scoreless streak on the power play. After failing to convert their last 19 opportunities, the River Hawks scored against Merrimack with a two-man advantage. In fact, Lowell's special teams efficiency rating of 33.3 is tied with Brown for worst in the nation...Merrimack travels to Rensselaer (3-1-3) on Sunday in a non-conference match-up with the ECAC member school. The No. 18 Engineers should provide a good challenge for second year coach, and former UMass assistant, Mark Dennehy and his team...The youth movement is well under at Northeastern (2-5-1, 0-4-1 HEA) under second year coach Greg Cronin. Freshmen and sophomore skaters have 46 out of the 63 total points produced this season. On Saturday, the team outshot New Hampshire 30-24, despite dropping the contest, 3-1.

Reflecting on a wild weekend

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

UMass' 28-20 win over New Hampshire this weekend truly was a game of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde for both teams. Each controlled one half of play, but in the end John Hatchell's pass deflection on a UNH fourth-and-goal decided the game.

The Minutemen (8-1, 5-0 Atlantic 10) came out fast in the first half. By the time the whistle blew for halftime they were already up by 18 points over the Wildcats.

UMass Football

Despite UNH quarterback Ricky Santos compiling more passing yards (151), Minutemen quarterback Liam Coen had the more important stat of two touchdown tosses – one to Rasheed Rancher and another on an exceptional play by Coen to elude three defenders and pitch it up to J.J. Moore in the end zone.

"I thought we had some great field position which always helps. Having the wind was definitely a plus," Coen said. "Our guys stepped up and made some big plays. It's nice to have a good balance, we always strive for balance."

UNH wide receiver David Ball was practically a none-factor in the first half. He didn't record his first catch of the game until there was 1:08 remaining in the first quarter. The record-breaking wideout also made an uncharacteristic two drops on the afternoon.

In all, UNH dropped four passes on the day. One looked like an easy touchdown grab by Keith LeVan, but he let it slip through his grasp up the left sideline.

But that all changed in the second half. Ball's turnaround was the most spectacular. He ended the day with eight catches for 107 yards and two second-half scores (four catches, 60 yards in the second half).

Santos also had a tremendous second half. He finished 35-of-55 for 383 yards and two scores to Ball. The junior was also the Wildcats leading rusher on the day with 55 yards.

"Obviously, Ricky Santos worked us over in the second half," Brown said. "And I knew there was going to be some point in time where we had to face adversity."

In contrast, UMass scored just once in the second half. That happened on a 38-yard run up the middle by Steve Baylark that put the Minutemen up 28-3. Other than that, the Maroon and White didn't have much going.

"It stinks not having any drives in the second half," Coen said. "We went three-and-out and really didn't execute two drives, had a bad penalty on the hold and that knocks us out of some drives."

Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen threw for 193 yards and went 11-for-15 in UMass' 28-20 win over No. 9 New Hampshire on Saturday.

Junior linebacker Jason Hatchell led UMass in tackles for the 15th time in 20 games on Saturday with a career-high 18 tackles.

Questionable play calling

With the score tied at zero, and his offense having trouble getting much going, UNH coach Sean McDonnell decided to try a fake punt with just over six minutes remaining in the first quarter.

The Wildcats were at the UMass 38-yard line and needed just three yards for the conversion. Punter Matt Henry took the snap and rolled to the right looking for a receiver. The only problem was that at least four Wildcats slipped coming off the line of scrimmage and none were open.

Wilner Alexis and David Burris got to Henry before he could get rid of the ball and sacked him for a loss of 13 yards. Coen's touchdown to Rancher concluded the ensuing UMass possession.

"We're a big safe team. We're either going to utilize our [punt block] squad or we're going to play safe," Brown said. "When you're playing safe you're always defending against the fake. You have all five eligible [receivers] covered, you have to contain on both sides and you can deal with the run. We're in a 4-3 set so if they run a fake, we can be sound against it."

Option nightmares

By now the UMass defense must dream about the option on a nightly basis. UNH is the third team this season to attack the Minutemen with the difficult scheme.

"I actually went back and looked at the tape from last year and they surprised us [then], but this year we were fully prepared," linebacker Jason Hatchell said. "We already played two option teams, we had it in our heads already. I don't think it fazed us at all."

UMass held the Wildcats to a total of 58 rushing yards. Behind Santos' 55, the next highest total for UNH was Chad Kackert who carried the ball seven times for just six yards.

Hatchell a rare addition to the round table

Jason Hatchell is just the second defensive player to receive the Bill Knight MVP award as the player of the game. UNH defensive end Mike Foley took home the award in 1994.

Hatchell was also named the UMass/Dinn Bros. Athlete of the Week.

Yankees would be wise to trade A-Rod

Joe Meloni

Alex Rodriguez is arguably the best player in baseball. He is certainly the best player in the American League and he's a class act to boot. But if the New York Yankees are smart, Alex Rodriguez will not be their third baseman next season.

In the winter of 2003, A-Rod-to-Boston fever swept New England. One day the deal was done, the next day the numbers couldn't work.

And when the trade died for the 246th and final time, most Boston sports fans could've been described as anything but pleased. The Texas Rangers presented the best player in baseball to the Red Sox and they couldn't make the deal work.

How could they let that happen? In disgust, I immediately switched my focus to the Patriots and their march to the Super Bowl.

Anyhow, Rodriguez eventually found his way to the Bronx and the Sox held onto their star-crossed cornerstones – for the time being. The subsequent 2004 season ended pretty well for the Sox. So I guess I am pretty happy the trade never materialized.

But I digress. When the New York Yankees acquired Rodriguez, rather than approaching the trade properly, they acquired something they already had – a superstar shortstop. It was simply a horribly misguided decision by George Steinbrenner and his baseball people. Any team would have jumped at the chance to acquire Alfonso Soriano – perhaps a talented arm or two could have been their asking price. Pitching, after all, is the most important part of a baseball team.

When one begins the assembly of a baseball team, you can't acquire the same part and expect it to function properly in a different capacity. Every player on a baseball team must have a role. If you had a car battery and needed a tire, would you buy another battery instead of the tire just because the battery is top of the line?

No, you wouldn't. You'd buy the tire and go on your merry way. So why would you acquire a shortstop when you have a glaring hole at third base and a serious paucity of reliable starting pitchers?

At the time, it may have appeared like a brilliant move on the part of the Yankees front office. Acquring the best player in the game and moving him to an entirely different position, and remember, Rodriguez was willing to do this. He wanted to be the Yankees third baseman – or at least he said he did.

But Brian Cashman should have known what all of this really meant. It was never about making the Yankees better. This move was made out of desperation because the Yankees hadn't won a World Series in three years at that point. And remember, the Red Sox failed to make the same trade just days earlier. What a good way to stick it to your most hated rival.

Sure, Rodriguez put up his typical gaudy numbers, and the Yankees have maintained their spot atop the American League East – he even won his 2nd MVP award after the 2005 season. But ask Mr. Steinbrenner and Yankee fans what they remember most about the last two baseball seasons. Something tells me their memory will end with a Ruben Sierra groundout to Pokey Reese.

The Yankees are currently operating with two shortstops and no third baseman. My advocacy of a Rodriguez deal is in no way an indictment of Rodriguez, it is merely a suggestion to improve the Yankees.

The move never should have been made in the first place. But now that the experiment has failed and Rodriguez is as comfortable

Yankees third baseman Alex Rodriguez is coming off his worst fielding season since his rookie year in 1997. He made 24 errors in both seasons.

Maine remains dominant in national poll

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Six of the 10 Hockey East teams are located in Massachusetts. Not coincidentally, three Massachusetts schools are on top of the league's standings. Massachusetts (4-1-1, 3-1 Hockey East), UMass Lowell (3-2-3, 2-0-2 HEA) and Boston University (2-1-3, 2-1-2 HEA) are all tied for first place with six points.

Hockey East

Still on top

Maine (7-0-1, 2-0-1 HEA) continues its strangle hold on the top spot of the USCHO.com CSTV Poll. The undefeated Black Bears earned three out of a possible four points this past weekend.

On Friday night, Merrimack (1-6-1, 1-3 HEA) was no match for the No. 1 team in the nation, as the overpowering Black Bears scored four goals en route to a 4-1 victory. Maine and BU skated to a 2-2 tie in Boston the next day.

Hobey Baker Award favorite, senior forward Michel Leveille, and sophomore goaltender Ben Bishop star for the Black Bears on the offensive and defensive sides of the puck, respectively.

Leveille leads the league in points. He has six goals and six assists in eight games played. The senior scored two of his six goals in a 4-1 victory against Massachusetts on Oct. 28.

Bishop continues the tradition of strong Maine goaltenders. Former greats Jimmy Howard and Mike Dunham, among others, all played for the Black Bears before continuing their careers in the NHL.

Bishop leads the HEA in both goals-against average (1.41) and save percentage (.942).

The Black Bears hope to avoid their first loss of the season when they host UMass Lowell and New Hampshire (4-2, 2-1 HEA) this weekend.

Up and down Eagles

The Boston College Eagles (5-2, 2-1 HEA) continued their season long theme of following hard earned wins with bad losses. The team then traveled to Providence (2-6-1, 1-3-1 HEA) last Thursday, only to give up five goals to an unproven Friars team. On Saturday, BC defended its home ice with a 1-0 victory over Vermont (2-4-1, 0-1-1 HEA).

These two games come after the Eagles stormed into Wisconsin (4-4-2) and earned two wins against the defending champion Badgers nearly two weeks ago. BC was led by the outstanding play of junior goaltender Cory Schneider. He saved 55 shots in the two games, although earning little retribution for the team's loss last season to Wisconsin in the championship game of the NCAA tournament.

Even though college hockey is notorious for early-season upsets, the Eagles 7-1 loss to Notre Dame at home on Oct. 20 is still shocking. Schneider surrendered an uncharacteristic six goals before being pulled late in the third period.

However, he was in good form the next night, stopping 25 shots in a 5-1 win against Bowling Green.

The inconsistency of Schneider this season will ultimately determine how much success the Eagles have in both the regular season and postseason. His decision to return to campus after flirting with the NHL, along with the return of senior center Brian Boyle, is largely the reason BC was ranked No. 1 to begin the season and picked to win the Hockey East title by the league's coaches.

BC will look to establish some consistency tonight in a match across the Charles River against Harvard (0-3).

Lowell's early success a surprise

With losses due to graduation, attrition, and dissatisfaction, UMass Lowell has 15 freshmen on its roster. Although coach Blaise McDonald has one of the better recruiting classes in Hockey East, it will be difficult for the newcomers and returnees to replace the produc-

See HOCKEY EAST on page 8

Boston College junior goaltender Cory Schneider has a 5-2 record this season. His 2.03 goals-against average ranks fourth in the league.

Senior forward Chris Capraro was named the Hockey East Player of the Week yesterday. He had two goals and an assist in Friday's win.

Correction:

On Sept. 21 and Nov. 1, the Collegian sports section published incorrect factual information about field hockey goalkeeper Becky Letourneau. In those two issues, the article stated that Letourneau allowed five goals on six shots against Dartmouth. That is incorrect. She actually allowed five goals on 11 shots and made six saves. We apologize for the error.

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

The last college basketball team to return all its starters after a national championship was Arizona in 1997-98. The Florida Gators return their starting five this season, and were ranked No. 1 in the AP preseason poll on Monday.

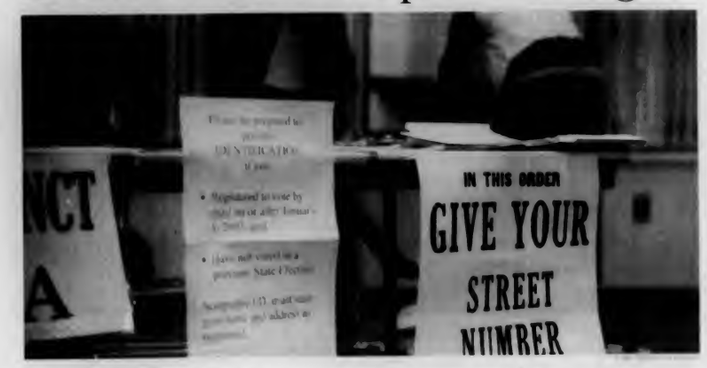
Democrats conquer MA governor elections



Higher education, child care and diversity in the state government were all reasons student voters of UMass rushed to voting booths to show their support for Deval Patrick.

Deval Patrick wins support of UMass student voters

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Student voters at the University of Massachusetts overwhelmingly supported Deval Patrick for governor of Massachusetts and cited higher education, child care and diversity at the level of state government as the issues that sent them to the voting booths on Election Tuesday.

"UMass is very costly for students," said Alithia Acosta, a sophomore and Political Science major. "Deval Patrick wants to lower fees. It would be a very good opportunity to open the door for more students to come to UMass."

Patrick, if elected governor, would become the first African American to hold the position in Massachusetts and only the second African American governor in the country. A win for Kerry Healey also has historical implications as she would become the first woman to be elected governor in the state.

"Patrick would bring a taste of diversity to the Massachusetts government. Not only racial [diversity], but also economic," said Sarah, a sophomore. "Patrick rose up from a poor childhood."

Earlier in the week a WHDH-TV Suffolk University poll showed Patrick with a double digit lead over Healey, 53 percent to 31 percent among 400 likely voters. Independent candidate Christy Mihos and Green-Rainbow Party candidate Grace Ross showed support only among six percent and two percent of likely voters in the poll respectively.

Acosta cited child care, referring to question three on the ballot, which would allow home-based

Internet cripples print industry

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

Newspapers have been the cement of an informed society, delivering people with the knowledge of the world around them. Whether coupled with the morning coffee, scattered across kitchen tables or at the foregrounds of dinner or office conversation, newspapers have shared a special kinship with the American people.

Then, one day there arose the biggest possible threat to the newspaper industry neither the newspaper nor the American people saw coming: the invention of the Internet.

Feeding the interests of an increasingly rapid-paced society, Internet news sources provide up-to-date, fast news, accessed with the power of one's fingertips. What is startling and perhaps potentially debilitating to newspapers, however, is that the number of Americans accessing online news Web sites has risen to 57 million people this year, an increase from last year's 24 percent.

This increase signifies the decrease of print newspaper circulation, which fell to an over all average of 2.8 percent daily and 3.4 percent on Sundays. This decrease, the steepest seen in about 15 years, have hit the metropolitan newspapers hardest, such as the Boston Globe who had a loss of 6.7 percent daily circulation and 10 percent on Sunday's. More homes in metropolitan areas such as Boston, or Los Angeles, whose Los Angeles Times lost eight percent of its daily circulation, have greater access to Internet capabilities, and therefore, face greater circulation losses.

"At this point, everyone knows that newspapers are doomed," wrote New Yorker financial columnist James Surowiecki in March 2006. "The real danger is that the popular conviction that papers are doomed may cause owners and shareholders to prefer the cash-cow approach, accepting eventual oblivion

UMass prepares for flu season

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

Mid-November marks the start of flu season. UHS will be holding a flu clinic tomorrow at the Campus Center to prepare students for flu season.

University Health Services and the School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts will host a flu clinic on Thursday, November 9th. The clinic, which will be open from 10 a.m. until 5 p.m., will be located on the lower concourse at the Campus Center.

The cost of the vaccination is $20, payable by cash or check, and it is open to all students, faculty and staff. During the clinic there will also be tables set up with information about various healthcare concerns.

The vaccine is especially recommended for high-risk individuals – children six-months-old through 5-years-old, pregnant women, people aged 50 or older, as well as people with chronic medical conditions like asthma and diabetes – but will be available for everyone.

Student volunteers from the School of Nursing will administer the vaccine under the supervision of UHS staff; additional volunteers – including student EMTs and ROTC students – will be on hand to help manage the flow of people at the clinic.

The timing of the clinic is also helpful, because it generally takes two weeks for the body to build up a resistance to the virus after the vaccine is administered, just in time for the Thanksgiving break when students will travel all over the country.

More than 36,000 people die every year in the United States because of the flu – most of those are in the high-risk categories.

"A virus like influenza can spread so quickly, and if you're under a lot stress, not sleeping well and not eating well, then it's a good idea to get a primary preventative measure like the flu vaccine," said David Gagnon, a senior nursing student who is helping to coordinate the clinic. While influenza is not life-threatening for most college students, the conditions of communal living and the realities of college life can serve as aggravating factors in the spread and impact of the virus.

Unlike the common cold, which progresses slowly, a flu infection can hit very suddenly with acute symptoms, sometimes within only a few hours of infection. According to UHS Public Health Nurse Ann Becker, the cold and flu share many common symptoms but vary with their intensity.

"The flu has everything that the cold has to the tenth degree," Becker said. "A flu will hit very suddenly and make you feel acutely ill. All you want to do is lie down and rest." For those not at high-risk, the flu can still be a large obstacle.

"It would definitely affect the productivity of your life

Vigil celebrates war veterans

UMass ROTC hosted the Veteran's Day Vigil, which alumni, faculty members and students attended to commemorate war veterans.

By Eden Univer & Cara Grannemann
Collegian Staff

Students, alumni, faculty members and members of ROTC from the University of Massachusetts joined together yesterday to commemorate United States war veterans at the Veteran's Day Vigil, conducted by the UMass Airforce ROTC.

The ceremony began at 4 p.m. yesterday afternoon with the taking down and folding of the American flag, followed by a speech from an Iraq War Veteran. The vigil will end today at 4:30 p.m. with a closing ceremony.

Airforce Captain Matthew Mutti, a UMass ROTC alumnus, addressed issues UMass ROTC members are currently facing. Mutti's speech focused on the UMass cadets in hopes of giving them perspective on what their current and future plans are.

Mutti advised cadets "to engage in every opportunity to lead and follow regardless of whether or not it's in academics or ROTC."

After the speech, a wreath and five white roses were ceremoniously placed to honor the five branches of the military, while three members of the UMass band played Amazing Grace.

Immediately after, Lieutenant Colonel Jay Fitzgerald, commander of Air Force ROTC, told the story of a World War II pilot and his efforts to save the other members of his mission, despite his own injuries, by landing a severely damaged plane carrying multiple explosives.

"[The Veterans] saw things no one should ever see for their children and grandchildren. They sacrificed their tomorrow for our today," continued Lt Col. Fitzgerald in his speech.

Airforce ROTC Cadet, Nathan Roberts, said of the story, "It was very inspiring to hear about what people are willing to give up for their country."

After Lt. Col Fitzgerald spoke, cadets introduced Lt. Col. Buford, who addressed the questions, "What is a veteran?" and "What is Veteran's Day?" He described Veteran's Day as a "quiet holiday of quiet heroes."

"It's a day for me to think big thoughts about liberty, freedom and tradition," he said.

Originally called Armistice Day to commemorate only veterans of World War I, November 11 became Veteran's Day in 1954 to celebrate all veterans of war.

The ceremony ended with the lighting of a candle to burn throughout the night, representing those who have fallen in war.

A closing ceremony, directed by the Army ROTC, will be held today at 4:00 p.m. in front of Memorial Hall.

SGA aims to increase funding

By Matt Bellivau
Collegian Staff

In the face of the upcoming hikes in minimum wage and in response to the approval of drastically increased funding of certain Registered Student Organizations in spring 2006, the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts is currently in a desperate search for avenues to increase funding.

Tonight's Senate meeting will debate various options for increasing funding, with one option being an increase of student activities fees by $6 by the end of the Fall 2007 semester.

SGA President Elvis Mendez said he's exploring every viable option to prevent only the second student activity fee increase in five years.

"I will not sleep tonight," said Mendez, late last night.

Mendez said SGA officials originally planned to debate the fee increase and possibly propose the motion next week, but were told by Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano that a decision needed to be reached by Monday.

The proposed hike will bump the current fee amount of $87

In attempting to avoid raising fees, Mendez says he's considering rehauling the way RSOs are funded.

"There were a couple of increases last year in club sports and other organizations that were kind of high," said Mendez. "Increases that typically don't happen from year to year. If we want to continue to fund these organizations, we may have to raise the fees slightly."

SGA officials have openly said that the SGA is finding

"Lethargic" skunk put down

Monday
November

8:57: Amherst Police responded to an automobile accident. A 1999 Jeep Grache crashed on 29 Hobart Lane and needed to be towed by Amherst Towing Company.

9:26: Amherst Police investigated vandalism at 7 Watson Farms.

12:30: Amherst Police sent summons to two Amherst minors charged with disturbing a school assembly.

1:00: Amherst Police recovered a bottle of Suboxone belonging to a Mr. Goldfarb. The bottle was found at the University of Massachusetts and belonged to a UMass student. The student's number was disconnected and out of service. The pharmacy was contacted and told the bottle was in Amherst Police possession.

1:39: Amherst Police investigated reports of a car's windows smashed on College Street. Several other cars in the area were also found with smashed windows.

5:15: Amherst Police responded to a car having run out of gas on North Pleasant Street. The car was pushed out of the street.

5:20: Amherst Police assisted citizen Mary Buzkurt who had complaints against an officer.

7:18 A large hay bail was found left on Leverett Road, apparently having fallen off of a truck. The hay was left with a note reading "I will be back for this in the morning." The bail had struck a guard rail and needed to be rolled to where it would not impede traffic.

Tuesday

Four children dead in Cleveland house fire

BY M.R. KROPKO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CLEVELAND — Fire swept through a house early Tuesday, killing four children and injuring three other people, one who jumped from a second-story window and two boys who were pulled to safety by a passer-by, a fire official said.

The passer-by, Nick Haviaras, saw the flames as he drove home about 3 a.m. At the house, he said, he heard cries: "'Help us, help us! We're in the basement!'"

Authorities said Haviaras, 43, broke open a glass block basement window, and pulled two boys to safety. The woman had jumped out.

The three who escaped were identified as Catherine Brownlee, 48, her 13-year-old son and a 14-year-old grandson.

Fire Department spokesman Larry Gray said. She hurt her leg and ankle, and the two boys suffered burns on about 30 percent of their bodies, authorities said.

The victims were tentatively identified as Daina Howell, 14, and Brownlee's grandsons, Tykr, 8; Corey, 3; and Austin, 1, Gray said. It was unclear if Howell was related to the others.

The four children died from smoke inhalation, authorities said.

The fire was reported about 3 a.m. and appeared to have started in the basement, Assistant Fire Chief Brent Collins said. Authorities were trying to determine the cause of the fire, though they said arson was not suspected at this time.

The fire gutted the two-story home and scorched its white aluminum siding black. The house is in a neighborhood of mostly small bungalows.

Crashing voting machines raise ghost of US elections past

EAST CLEVELAND, Ohio — Crashing voting machines and other computer glitches forced at least two U.S. states to extend voting hours, but balloting in most places was, as one voter said, a "piece of cake."

As millions of Americans cast their ballots in crucial mid-term congressional elections, early fears of new voting dramas emerged as soon as polls opened – especially in Ohio and Florida, the two battleground states scarred by voting dramas in 2000 and 2004.

In one elementary school in the predominantly black district of East Cleveland, Ohio, all 12 machines went down for two hours when voting opened at 6:30 am (1130 GMT), according to an AFP correspondent at the scene.

Polling officials in the Midwestern state refused to hand out paper ballots until a lawyer for the watchdog group Election Protection showed up.

Sporadic problems were also reported in Indiana, Colorado, Tennessee, Utah, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland and there were various claims by Democrats that under-pressure Republicans were trying to depress turnout.

In Lebanon County, located in the Eastern state of Pennsylvania, a court ordered the region's 55 polling stations to remain open for an extra hour, until 9:00 pm (0200 GMT) following a programming error in the voting machines that forced some voters to use paper ballots.

At least one machine at each polling station was misprogrammed," Elaine Ludwig, the county's chief clerk of elections, told AFP. "I am so up to my ears trying to get this thing rectified."

Voting hours were also extended in Delaware County, in the Midwestern state of Indiana, because of glitches with the electronic voting machines at 75 precincts, an official told AFP.

"The polls will close at 8:40 p.m. rather than 6:00 p.m. because a computer error prevented voters from casting ballots in various precincts," said Kristy Eller, the county's deputy clerk.

In Colorado's Denver County, a power outage led to a computer breakdown that prompted the mountain state's Democratic Party to seek a court order to extend voting.

Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, a non-partisan group that tracks election changes, told AFP that problems were also reported in Utah and several other states.

"What we're seeing so far are widespread but still significant problems that state and local officials are having to deal with," he said. "We were expecting these kinds of problems but I am a little bit surprised that ... they are in so many different places."

Crashing voting machines and other computer glitches forced at least two states to extend voting hours, but balloting in most places was, as one voter said, a "piece of cake."

Chapin warned that some of the computer problems and other glitches could be used to challenge the result in tightly contested races.

"Anytime you have these kinds of problems, at least theoretically, they can be used as a basis for a challenge," he said.

The FBI meanwhile said it was investigating complaints of voter intimidation in the Eastern state of Virginia where many people reported receiving intimidating phone calls.

In Florida's Broward County, notorious for the "hanging chad" debacle in the disputed race that saw Bush triumph over Al Gore in 2000, new problems were reported.

In one precinct, 14 voting machines stopped working for 90 minutes, prompting some voters to walk away. Service was later restored.

In one polling station in Friendship Heights, Maryland, just outside Washington, one of the 16 voting machines failed as soon as the polls opened.

Others worked well, but did not assuage voter concerns about whether their vote cast by electronic machines was safe.

"They are very user-friendly and there is good support, but I still wish they had a printout," voter Chris Strom told AFP after casting her ballot.

But voter Donald Rollert said he had no problem with the computers.

"It was a piece of cake" he said after voting.

while continuing to harvest billions of dollars in profits, largely through cost-cutting."

Financial distress in the newspaper industry would not only have an impact on shareholders, company spending, and the company itself, but would cause journalists to take a hard hit as well. With financial security in the newspaper industry already at a slow but steady downslide, journalists, such as Erica Dietsche, a recent Rutgers graduate, have begun to feel the pressure.

Dietsche, an editorial assistant for Bergen County, New Jersey's newspaper, The Bergen Record, says, "You definitely do feel the pinch in the newsroom. There are fewer people to do more tasks; fewer reporters have to cover more topics. And keeping expenses low is a big priority. There is very little excess money to go around."

Regardless of increasing pressure on journalists due to tighter funds in the pockets of company heads, Dietsche does not feel this to be a permanent dilemma. UMass Journalism professor Stephen Simurda agrees with Dietsche in that the decline in newspaper circulation should not be taken necessarily in a negative sense.

According to Dietsche, newspapers are evolving after a long period of stagnation in which many in charge became set in certain old ways each recognize may be hard to break. Dietsche predicts success only for newspapers, which embrace the new ways of the Internet to their fullest advantage.

The new, Internet savvy generation, which Simurda believes contributes to much of the decline in newspaper circulation, could end up helping the newspaper industry in the long run.

"Online versions of newspapers may end up creating jobs, while at the same time, those who are older and do read newspapers are being replaced by a younger generation that has failed to pick up the habit," says Simurda. He also acknowledges the fact that the Internet may help newspapers financially.

"It is a lot cheaper to put products online than paying a truck driver to deliver it to 6 million convenience stores," he says.

In the end, the journalists, whose careers depend upon newspapers to make a living, see promise in a situation many write off as dismal.

As Dietsche concludes, "Give it some time – five years? Ten years? It's hard to know for sure, but newspapers are going to have to find a way to make it happen. And I believe that it will happen."

UHS and School of Nursing prep students for flu season for about 10 days," Gagnon said. While a few weeks off from classes might sound like an appealing getaway, it is tempered with the prospect of fever, fatigue and muscle aches along with the prospect of falling behind in classes.

While the vaccine can be very effective in fighting off certain strains of influenza – it should be noted that it is not effective against pandemic or avian flu – there are many other preventative steps that people can take in order to minimize their risk of contracting a cold or the flu.

Psychological stress and a lack of sleep can harmfully interfere with the immune system, so it's extra important during flu season to take occasional breaks from studying and avoid all-nighters. Hand washing is also an excellent protection against infection, even without anti-bacterial soaps.

"As long as you wash your hands for about 20 seconds, regular soap will have the same effect," Gagnon said. Using an alcohol based hand cleaner can also be helpful because of frequent contact with a lot of common surfaces like door handles, hand rails and telephones where the flu virus can live for up to eight hours.

"I think everyone has to assess their own risk and their comfort," Becker said. Students looking for more information about cold and flu should either stop by the clinic or visit www.umass.edu/uhs.

The health fair, which will occur during the same time as the clinic, will have a diverse array of health information from a blood pressure screening to a table with information about HPV and the new vaccine for that disease. University Health Services and the School of Nursing are hoping to make the fair a permanent part of the clinic and use it as a tool to help spread information about personal health and wellness.

US bucks three year fall in number of international grad students

NEW YORK — The number of overseas graduate students taking courses in the United States has increased after three years of decline in the wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks, officials said.

The Council of Graduate Schools announced a modest one percent rise from 2005 to 2006 in the number of foreign graduates taking U.S. degree programs, in a small sign of recovery for the sector.

New students from India increased by more than 30 percent while those from China grew by 20 percent. The two countries already send the most students to the United States, the council said.

The number of students enrolling from the Middle East also increased one percent, the report found, identifying engineering and business degrees as those leading the overall growth.

"These findings confirm that there has been a recovery in international graduate student flows to the U.S. and I am optimistic that this encouraging trend will continue," council president Debra Stewart said in a statement.

"The increases reflect positively on both U.S government policy changes and the outreach efforts of graduate schools themselves," she added.

The U.S. government tightened visa requirements for overseas students in the wake of the September 11 attacks, prompting many to seek degree programmes elsewhere – particularly in Europe, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

The U.S. government has since introduced changes to visa requirements aimed at attracting more foreign students.

Although the report identified growth in the sector, author Kenneth Redd warned that although the United States had made efforts to recover after 9/11, other countries had also been busily investing in attracting foreign students.

He said that the U.S. share of total international students fell from 25 percent in 2000 to 22 percent in 2004.

The Council of Graduate Schools represents some 475 institutions in the United States and Canada.

Students charged in school plot

ROUND ROCK, Texas — Two high school students have been charged with conspiracy to commit capital murder after authorities uncovered what they described as potentially deadly school attack plot.

The boys, whose names were not released, were arrested Thursday, Williamson County Sheriff's Department Detective John Foster said.

Foster would not discuss specifics of the McNeil High School students' alleged plan after announcing the arrests Monday. He would not say how police and school officials learned of the plot but added that "we were very fortunate to discover this before it did happen."

"It jeopardized the lives of people there at the school: students and teachers," Foster said. "There were no specific targets other than the school and its occupants."

Round Rock Independent School District spokeswoman JoyLynn Occhiuzzi would not give the students' ages or grades other than that both were juveniles, which in Texas means younger than 17.

A letter to parents went home with students Monday explaining the incident, Occhiuzzi said.

"This has been pretty tightlipped until today, so not very many people knew about it," Foster said. "So we were able to act quickly and make an arrest on it. As far as the mood, I think most everybody at the campus was unaware of what had transpired."

McNeil High has about 2,700 students and 200 staff members. Round Rock is about 15 miles north of Austin and is the headquarters of computer maker Dell Inc.

UMass backs Deval Patrick

Deval Patrick won the support of UMass students through his dedication towards issues of child care, higher education and diversity.

childcare workers to form a union and negotiate for state subsidies, as the issue that brought her to out to vote.

For Ariel Weissman, a freshman majoring in finance and legal studies, it was national politics and turning control over both houses of Congress to the Democrats.

"He's a good guy with good views," Weissman said.

Recent UMass Alum, Danny McDonald, considered education the primary issue that drove him to the polls on Tuesday.

"Education and higher education have been overlooked in this election," said McDonald, a 2006 graduate of UMass. "Under Romney and Healey tuition and fees have skyrocketed."

A native of the Worcester area, McDonald said that the way Tim Murray had turned the city around as mayor, as well as what he viewed as a poor record on education by the Romney administration, led him to vote for the democratic ticket.

Registered voters at UMass voted for the first time in a centralized location in the Cape Cod Lounge, located inside the Student Union, according to Coordinator of Civic Engagement Core Carvalho. The polling station was staffed by election employees from the town of Amherst, but the Student Government Association at UMass plans to reimburse the town for election costs, making UMass the first and only student funded polling place in the country, Carvalho said.

Tuesday's midterm election follows an upsurge in 18-to-24-year-olds voting in the 2004 Presidential Election, according to The Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement (CIRCLE). Forty-six percent of youth voters in Massachusetts turned out to vote in the 2004 election, though that number only made up 8 percent of all voters.

A national poll, released last Wednesday by Harvard University's Institute of Politics found that 32 percent of youth voters "definitely" planned to vote Tuesday. The previous record number of youth voters in a midterm election was only 26.6 percent and set in 1982, according to USA Today.

SGA scrambles to increase funds itself deeper and deeper in financial debt, and that a fee increase may be its only way out.

Gigi Arguello, Secretary of Public Policy and Relations, said this proposed increase would be "just enough to keep us afloat."

As adamant as Mendez seems against the increase, he believes the increase itself won't break student's banks.

"The amount adds up to a meal swipe, said Mendez. "It's three cans of 'Rockstar'."

Unrelated to the possible increases, Mendez alluded to adopting a new form of participatory budgeting where students would be allotted a percentage of SGA funds to deliberate among themselves how, where and when to use them.

"The idea is to take 1% percent of the budget and open it up to everyone in an open forum," said Mendez.

In previous years, any proposal of a student fee increase was automatically directed to a campus-wide referendum to be voted on by the students. But due to a by-law created years ago, any increases under 7.5 percent of the student fee budget could be brought directly to Senate.

Senators will debate the proposal tomorrow in the Cape Cod Lounge.

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

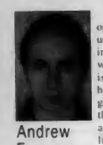
Troops' reaction lost in uproar



Andrew Freeman

I wanted to open this column with some insight about war. The truth is, however, I have none to give, because the war is not a part of my life. I feel profoundly disconnected from the fighting, the death and suffering and from the men and women involved in it all.

Once again, the troops are a subject of public attention, following their supposed slight at the hands of John Kerry last week. Kerry, while speaking to students in California, said, "You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq."

The comment generated immediate outrage, and Kerry apologized, claiming it was a botched joke. According to his aides, Kerry's prepared text – what he was supposed to say – read "get us stuck in Iraq." The intention was to mock the President's handling of the Iraq war. This has nothing to do with education, however, as Kerry and Bush both were C-students at Yale.

Lost in the uproar over these remarks was the reaction of the troops. Media coverage focused primarily on politicians, and to a lesser extent on military families and veterans. One of the few reactions that received any notice was a humorous photo: eight soldiers holding a poster filled with intentional misspellings, which were meant to be read "Help us John Kerry, we're stuck here in Iraq."

It is difficult to imagine that one statement by Kerry would shake the spirits of our troops. Nevertheless, our society reacts immediately to any perceived slight against them.

We look for stories of heroism, even in disaster. The rescue of Private Jessica Lynch was promoted by the army and media, obscuring the deaths of nine members of her company.

As a nation we laud our soldiers' service in rhetoric, and revile their detractors, whether imaginary or real, out of a perceived obligation to the troops.

We look for stories of heroism, even in disaster. The rescue of Private Jessica Lynch was promoted by the army and media, obscuring the deaths of nine members of her company. When former NFL player Pat Tillman was killed in 2004, his death was portrayed as a heroic sacrifice, though we later learned he was killed by friendly fire.

By idolizing and elevating soldiers, we lose touch with them. In the Kerry incident, it did not matter that soldiers were unfazed by his remarks and that at least some dismissed them with humor. Society has its notions of soldiers and how to speak about them, but these have nothing to do with the reality of their experiences.

In truth, we have no idea what is going on in Iraq and Afghanistan. Barring friends or family, we have no connection to it, and do not feel compelled to pay attention to the conflict. Most students I have talked to know no one serving in the military.

In the past, this was not the case. All of America was mobilized to contribute during the second World War, participating in rationing, creating victory gardens and enlisting in the army. During the Vietnam conflict, the draft hung over the heads of all young men, allowing the war to obtrude into any family. Whether helping the war effort, or opposing it, there was a feeling of connection to the conflict.

The conflict in Iraq and Afghanistan differs significantly from those conflicts. President Johnson chose not to mobilize the reserves in Vietnam, instead relying on the draft to fill military ranks.

President Bush has done the opposite, employing the reserves rather than instituting the draft. The distinction is not minor. The Iraq war goes largely un-protested because it does not endanger those outside of the military. Without the threat of their son being sent off to Iraq, many people are free to ignore the conflict.

More importantly, however, America has changed since those days. Society is increasingly atomized – we feel fewer and fewer connections to our neighbors, our leaders and our troops.

Sociologist Robert Putnam wrote over a decade ago of the decline of social groups, such as neighborhood associations, churches and labor unions, in his article "Bowling Alone." Overall, they have suffered decreasing attendance since the 1960s.

A major factor he attributed this to was the rise of television, which left society "wider but shallower," and individuals more connected to popular culture, but less connected to the people around them. With the advent of the Internet, these trends can only increase.

As a society, we should reach out to soldiers, not place them on a pedestal. We must recognize them as ordinary people, not martyrs or victims. Most importantly, we must not ignore them.

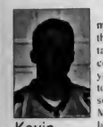
The truth hurts



Kevin Dooley

He may have more money than all the mustard companies combined, but you didn't want to be the junior senator from Massachusetts last week. If John Kerry can make a bad joke, so can yours truly.)

It has now been a week, and most of the political bee-hawing has subsided since the infamous botched joke heard round the world, which shined the spotlight on Kerry. Now there are some questions that need answers.

In consideration of time, we'll save repeating the joke. But it's safe to repeat that Kerry, or his speechwriters, have been under the false assumption lately he's the next Jerry Seinfeld. Case in point: Kerry's barrage of jokes when he visited UMass back in September after arriving 10 hours late.

Let's take off our Democratic and Republican glasses for the duration of this column and look at what transpired rationally. The guy made a mistake. You don't think George Washington or Abraham Lincoln ever misspoke during a speech? Our current president is also known to have a slip-up now and then as well.

Here's what Kerry was trying to accomplish when he told the worst joke in the history of mankind: First, he was poking fun at President Bush for not doing his homework back at Yale and, as a result, we're now in Iraq.

Yes, it came out horribly wrong, and Democrats will concede the fact their nominee for president in '04 would be eliminated in the first round of "Last Comic Standing."

Yes, it came out horribly wrong, and Democrats will concede the fact their nominee for president in '04 would be eliminated in the first round of "Last Comic Standing."

Second, Kerry was trying to point out that this administration was unprepared for what lay ahead in Iraq. In other words, they were bad boys who didn't do their homework.

Or maybe the administration lied to the country about why we went to war, which would be plagiarism or just making stuff up, grounds for possible expulsion from UMass, but not from the White House.

Kerry may have been unable to overcome the Republican mastermind Karl Rove in 2004, but the guy is no dummy, just a horrible comedian. Why would he ruin the best chance his party had at winning Congress for the first time in 12 years?

However, we should probably now turn our attention on why both Republicans and Democrats reacted the way they did after Kerry's speech.

If those in power knew in their hearts that our troops are some of our most educated and well-off citizens, respresentive of people from all socio-economical classes, we would not have witnessed the politicians rush in defense of our troops the way they did after Kerry's speech, period.

Kerry's remark would have had no reason to be interpreted the way it was if it wasn't the truth. But it was the truth. Kerry hit a sensitive nerve to get such a reaction from people. In short, all the politicians made a lot of noise, and the best defense against fear (or in this case fear that the truth will be exposed) is noise.

Here's what all the politicians were trying to hide by going off on a crusade against Kerry. Wars have always been about exploiting the lower classes – who usually don't have access to a good education – like they're a commodity for fighting wars which will ultimately benefit someone else.

Very few benefits come to the people who put their lives at risk. And if they're lucky to make it out alive, they have the honor and privilege of coming home having just witnessed unspeakable horrors and the very worst mankind has to offer.

Our elected leaders, and the leaders of corporations (cough, cough Halliburton) have much to gain from wars. But surprise, surprise, they're not sending their sons or daughters to fight the wars they staunchly support back in the safe confines of Washington and Texas.

They're not the ones saying goodbye to their loved ones. They aren't the ones defending their country in the name of freedom, patriotism and democracy, or any other word you can think of conjuring images of an eagle flying over your head.

Kerry was the scapegoat in an effort by politicians to drape a cloak around reality. Not to say that he isn't guilty in all of this since his counter-attack on Republicans clearly shows he too knows that many of those people fighting our wars around the globe make up the lower rungs of the economic ladder.

The Kerry situation is very similar to whenever politicians go nuts and blame radio personality Howard Stern or rapper Eminem for all the problems which plague our society. Kerry unintentionally brought up a sobering truth that is all too known, the same way Stern or Eminem are known to be very controversial just because they are not afraid to tell the truth.

Turning the attention, and jumping all over the people who tell it like it is, is the only way those in power can paint themselves as the do-gooders and avoid the truth. In reality, they're the problem, not the people who jump for joy at the sight of the Tickle Chair or playing Lesbian Dial-A-Date.

And just a message to all the troops: The dumbies reside in Washington.

Against gendered music label

Teresa Franco

While browsing through new CD releases or reviews, the one genre that makes me to cringe is the man-made term "chick rock." First off, "chick" is defined as a young chicken in the dictionary, and the musicians shoved into this category do not have feathers and chirp.

As a female musician I speak for all women in music when I say there is nothing more frustrating than having every riff and harmony we put our souls into oppressed by this gendered label.

It is a grave insult that most female musicians, whether folk, indie, acoustic or punk, are all lumped in the same category simply because of their sex. Male musicians, however, are classified by the different types of music they play and not by their chromosomes.

Plenty of women musicians can rock out at the same level as any testosterone driven band. Artists have broken the barrier years ago. This is quite an admirable achievement, so if it has been proven a woman can perform at the same performance level as a man, why doesn't she receive the same amount of recognition?

Female musicians have been victims of numerous misconceptions throughout the years. Women who write angst-ridden songs about runaway lovers are branded with the title of cold-hearted bitches. If a woman is not sweetly singing melodies in a hushed angelic voice, she is dubbed a man-hating shrewd, when for years men have been complimented for shouting obscenities over three messy chords. In the music world, anger coming from a woman's voice is often thought of as a disgrace, while angst from a man is applauded.

Another obstacle female musicians have overcome is how to be heard without shedding their clothes. Decades ago, most women in the music world were found in tight fitting clothing hanging on the shoulder of some bulky rock star on the covers of magazines.

Women have progressed over the years, becoming the performer and not an asset. Now skimpy getups are only left to the promiscuous pop-stars who most likely would get little recognition if it weren't for their appearance. Women who avoid the road leading them to wear little clothing are taken more seriously by far.

Today, it's not huge news if a woman plays types of music that were originally thought of as male dominated. Ladies of the music world have steadily outgrown these derogatory stereotypes and proved to be as equally talented as any other musician.

Magazine articles have been using less and less phrases in their reviews that begin with variations of "This up and coming singer songwriter is [gasp] a girl," as if women do not have the capability to carry the weight of a guitar around their shoulders. Also, it's not a rarity to see guys proudly stating they are fans of Fiona Apple and Tori Amos.

So, if girls can roar over the shred of guitars with the same level of intensity as any guy, why is this category of "chick rock" still in existence? Judgment of music makers should be based on one thing and one thing only, their music, not their fashion sense, not their hairstyle and most certainly not whatever gender they may be. Musicians strive for their audience to be more concerned with what they are trying to convey in their songs. Segregating female artists suggests women are only capable of creating one generic sound.

Though this "chick rock" label is only the crumbs left of the unfairness female musicians have hurdled over the years, the utterance of the phrase halts the progress women have been steadily making. No matter what the insults may be though, female music makers will continue to sing their hearts out and ignore the faulty names given to them.

Resisting the call

John Gruenenfelder

Oh, to be free of the annoyance that is the cell phone. Of course, short of hiding in the woods, that isn't going to happen, so I'll just file that into the pipedream folder. Even more than the increasingly annoying ring tones, I find I most dislike the fact that cell phones make one always connected, always on.

Despite being a bit behind Europe and Asia, cell phone usage in this country is growing at quite a pace, and ownership is now around 62 percent. Most of you are on campus, so this is really no surprise. New conversations are forming all around, probably interrupting ones already in progress. Everybody seems to have a phone with them at all times.

I guess you could call me a quasi-luddite, but only for select advancements. I've got a nice computer and a do-it-yourself Tivo-like machine. I always carry my PDA with me. There are some notable anachronisms, however. I've got an old and heavy Bell system desk phone, and yet, it's connected to an adapter which makes it an Internet phone. And I'm also quite attached to my analog wind-up wristwatch.

I resisted the call of the cell phone for as long as I could. Eventually, though, I was given one by my family and at their behest I accepted. I keep it in my backpack, but it's turned off.

I've got technical reasons, too. Call quality on cell phones is, in my experience, terrible. Landline phones are usually far superior, and a well configured Internet phone can have even better quality.

My lack of a cell phone was more than a technological throwback. A cell phone represents a new advance in the human web and one I'm not altogether fond of. The benefit is you can call at any time from anywhere. The downside is you can also be contacted at any time, anywhere.

That's the crux of the issue for me. I enjoy being unavailable. I want to communicate at a time of my choosing. A bit selfish, perhaps, but I've got enough distractions already.

Instant messaging via computer is more my speed. It's less interactive, more like very fast mail. When an IM arrives you can ignore it or respond, and you can respond in whatever time frame you choose. E-mail is very similar, though at a slower pace. The slow equivalent for phones was the answering machine which has now become voice mail. It's a grand invention, indeed.

When I'm at home, I'm near the phone and my IM client is probably running on the computer. That makes me available to the world. When I'm out, I'm hopefully doing something meaningful. I don't need to be interrupted by friends or family who just want to say hello.

Cell phones are, of course, entirely too useful to go away. They are useful enough in an already well-off country like the U.S., but in growing poor nations many people start off with a cell phone, since landlines are hard to acquire and prone to problems. That's an incredible increase in communication for poor countries and a boost for the world as a whole.

So, with all the benefits, there are definitely downsides to not using one. Maybe you'll miss an invitation from a friend, or important news from your family or a doctor. In reality, if it's important, you'll find out eventually. Somebody has probably left you a message. You'll still get a warm feeling from good news and bad news because it already travels fast enough without extra assistance.

In reality, if it's important, you'll find out eventually. Somebody has probably left you a message.

Admittedly, many of my concerns and complaints can be addressed by simply turning off the cell phone. This really defeats the purpose, though. If you make a habit of it, soon you will be paying for a device and service you don't use. That's hardly a benefit college students will pay for, but then most college students seem to make heavy use of their cell phone plans.

Using, or not using, a cell phone is a personal choice. A random college student can choose to spend half of his or her time chatting away just as readily as I can choose to unplug for a while. And I do.

Keeping my connected world apart from my unconnected world makes life a little more quiet and harmonious. Given the ever marching advance of technology, landlines are sure to be gradually replaced with cell phones of one type or another. And in the future I'll probably have a cell phone built into my eyeglasses. Just leave a message at the beep, because I'm sure to have it off.

Language studies feel futile

Caroline Moretti

I hate to admit it, but I've taken a handful of classes at UMass that I don't remember much of. Whether it is because of too much drinking, or not enough studying, a lot of what I once learned just hasn't exactly stuck with me. I can already tell I'm taking a few classes this semester that will disappear into the mists of my short term memory, and one of them is German 240: my fourth and final semester of foreign languages at UMass.

I have toiled over worksheets and "Hausufgaben" for nearly two years, and I'm excited to say I've nearly reached the glimmer of light at the end of the tunnel. I'm very well aware, too, that as soon as I emerge on the other side, my vocabulary and grammar will start to fade away, to wherever my high school French and middle school Spanish went. It will probably vanish for all the same reasons too. I will not likely be practicing the language, given my limited opportunities to speak conversationally. I also just don't have much of a memory for languages. Pretty soon all I'll know how to say is "I'm hungry" and "Where is the train station?"

I have not yet discerned, I have to complete four semesters of German in order to graduate as an English major.

Admittedly, it's somewhat my own fault my language studies feel futile. The German language is hardly the wave of the future. The last time a fluency in German was culturally significant to Americans was in 1942. Once upon a time, knowing German meant knowing the enemy.

Now that the two countries are allies, Germany isn't a threat, and the nation hardly holds a position on our radar of political awareness. Our national gaze has shifted from the placid, friendly and cooperative shores of Europe to the tumultuous deserts of the Middle East: German-speakers aren't exactly in high demand at the CIA, unless they can converse in Arabic as well.

Knowledge of German isn't even all that necessary for traveling through the country, though it is socially and culturally polite. A vast portion of the German population speaks English. It's not all that uncommon for a German citizen to use a nice American tourist as a chance to practice his/her English conversation skills either.

American influence is visible throughout the country. German magazines and newspapers often print advertisements in English. If you're a tourist who really wants to avoid cultural absorption altogether, you can ditch local restaurants for the neighborhood McDonalds.

It's fairly easy to see that Germany isn't exactly the dominating, global super-power it once was, and spending all this time and effort to learn their language, especially when I have no current intentions of traveling there, seems about as practical as learning Luxembourgish.

I'm not trying to say the German department is obsolete, or should be reduced or fazed out of the University system (especially since my German teacher might read this). For many people, the study of German is extremely rewarding and enjoyable. There are quite a few German majors out there who really love what they do.

I'm also not trying to imply that the study of language is pointless or unnecessary. Spending time studying a different language helps you understand the structure of communication and words. It can also help you gain an understanding of other cultures and histories you wouldn't normally be exposed to.

What I am suggesting, however, is that some colleges within this University put far too much emphasis on foreign language requirements. For some reason I have not yet discerned, I have to complete four semesters of German in order to graduate as an English major. I was only required to take one math class in my entire college career.

Wouldn't a greater knowledge of mathematics be just as beneficial to me as an understanding of a foreign language? Why not give us an equal exposure to history or science? Most people never get a chance to experience the many strong departments at this school.

Why not have requirements that bring students to SOM or the journalism department? Even if you're taking a more socially relevant language, like Arabic or Chinese, these skills often have little application to one's University education or future career. Being knowledgeable in computers is just as important as a foreign language in the job market. Why not have a computer literacy requirement for Humanities students?

I've often felt my four-semester internment in the German department was a futile struggle, a fight against my bad memory to recall information just long enough to pass tests and get by. Now the war is almost over, and I can get back to the business of forgetting. Feel free to ask me, though, if you want to know where the train station is.

Media's rankings are superficial

Michael Dennis

In the spirit of truly empathizing with (and getting into the minds of) those guilty of propagating the awful phenomenon of ranking anything and everything under the sun, I present this to you. The top five greatest reasons why top 10 and so on lists are shallow, convoluted, oversimplified and a general affront to our complexities and sensibilities as human beings.

5. THEY CREATE WHOLLY UNNECESSARY CONTROVERSY.

I'm not one to discourage people from healthy debate, and these lists certainly create a good forum for discussion. But there's a difference between more inherent forms of polarization, such as those resulting from contentious political topics, and artificially constructed lists which in turn create superficial strife.

In fact, more often than not, the individuals responsible for producing such materials will present them with an acknowledgement that their rankings will surely be met with hearty criticism. This is because they know it's impossible to successfully pull off. If they're so unsure of the quality and accuracy of their work and don't have much faith in the value of their opinions, why bother publishing such a list at all?

4. THEY'RE BIASED AND SKEWERED TOWARDS CONTEMPORARY FIGURES OR PHENOMENA.

The Bravo television network, known mostly for its formulaic reality television shows and constant "Law & Order: Criminal Intent" reruns, aired a series known as "The Greatest American" in 2005. The goal was to compile a list of 100 American heroes, leading up to the proclamation of "The Greatest American."

Presumably, anyone who made significant contributions, or had a substantial impact on America since its inception, would be eligible. Thus, Bravo and its voters had 225 years from which to choose their nominees. So naturally, Lance Armstrong, Dr. Phil, Brett Favre, Rush Limbaugh, Michael Moore, Arnold Schwarzenegger and the entire Bush family (George, George W., Laura and Barbara), among others, made it onto the list, which brings us to our next point...

3. THEY'RE ALL TOO OFTEN POLITICALLY OR GEOGRAPHICALLY BIASED.

Ahh, the grand old "Greatest American" list. These days, terms such as "American," "patriot," and "national pride" are, for better or worse, politically loaded terms. All too often, those who support the war in Iraq are seen as "real Americans," and all others are labeled as mere infidels. It seems as though this must have been the line of reasoning behind Bravo's selections (which, despite claiming to be the genesis of a free and open voting process, clearly are skewered).

Consider the top of the list. Ronald Reagan, the God of Conservatives and the bane of Liberals, is the #1 "Greatest American." Wouldn't a more appropriate choice have been someone like Abraham Lincoln (#2) or Martin Luther King, Jr. (#3), two heroic individuals who stand for humanity more so than any divisive political ideology?

2. THEY SUGGEST THAT WE ALL SHARE ONE CONCRETE SET OF VALUES WHICH CAN BE APPLIED TO ANY ASPECT OF CULTURE.

They assume we can't handle uncertainty.

The fact is, nothing in the world is perfectly structured enough to take a group of individuals, ideas or events and judge them in a totally fair, unbiased manner

Ranked lists are produced often by a small group of individuals, a tiny sampling of voters or sometimes even one person. They are nonetheless usually presented as being representative of what the everyday person would deem to be accurate and fair.

This is dangerously close to being a full-blown totalitarian point of view, as it leaves no room for individual diversion. The fact is, nothing in the world is perfectly structured enough to take a group of individuals, ideas, or events, and judge them in a totally fair, unbiased manner.

1. THEY'RE IMPOSSIBLE TO SUCCESSFULLY PULL OFF.

You'll never see a list of the "Top 60 Greatest" or "Top 71 Greatest" anything, because odd numbers just aren't very sexy. However the problem with perfect round numbers is they assume an ideal cutoff point, which leads to unfair exclusions and/or ridiculously uneven standards of qualification.

Rolling Stone's list of the "Top 100 Greatest Guitarists" assumes that there is an elite club of 100 guitarists that has no room for number 101. This, in reality, is woefully inaccurate.

Such a list leads to one of two things, depending on how you look at it. Either undeserving, dubious individuals are included to top off the group and make it to 100, or deserving individuals are left off because the nice round number leaves no room for them.

In closing, just remember that such lists can't be trusted, because there is so much to be said when debating the different viewpoints and individuals associated with any given topic or phenomenon. We do not all think Ronald Reagan is "The Greatest American," or Jimi Hendrix is "The Greatest Guitarist" (though I'd love to see some of the alternatives that people come up with).

Nor does this vary but that I've elected represent the view of the world's entire population, by any stretch of the imagination. But as long as I include a disclaimer that my list is not perfect, and that I know there will be controversy, then I'm safe from any criticism. At least, I think that's how it works, right?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DISRESPECT TO A RACE

I would like to address the Oct. 27, 2006 article on the issue of the UMass seal being changed. Unprofessional and untrue comments were made in that article.

First of all, if the writer does not know why the Native Americans would be so upset about the use of a Native American for our seal he should ask them why.

The comment on Jeffrey Amherst basically wiping out the Native Americans was not only untrue but in much distaste. Yes, it is true actions of Jeffrey Amherst, and others like him, did much damage. They killed many people, but by no means are these people "wiped out."

If you are going to be a responsible writer of the truth and public opinion, you may want to consider using research skills to get more information before printing such atrocities in the future.

Secondly, the comments on the buffalo killings. Most people who know American history know that it was the Native American Indians who suffered from the extinction of the buffalo, and it was the white men shooting them from the trains and killing them for their hides only that depleted the population.

I know many people, not only on this campus, who are of like mind with me when I say you should apologize and do more research on the subject and revise your article. You could consult with the UMass history, anthropology and archaeology departments, as well as the many Native American Indian professors here on campus.

Next time you print an article such as this one you should weigh out the feelings of all involved. Thank you for your attention to this matter.

ACTING CHRISTIAN?

Are college newspapers exempt from checking facts before they print stories? I ask this because it would appear that few to none were checked on this story.

Are you aware, Mr. Klecjak, that over nine million Indians lost their lives in the 1600s due to the massacres of different tribes by the colonists? Gee, I wonder if this will get printed.

Do you know, Mr. Klecjak, that in 1775, Massachusetts legislation was signed promising a bounty for male Indian scalps? Yes, it was the Indians who were being scalped.

Do you know how the land was being taken away from the Indians? Christian Discovery ... if land was not deemed owned by a Christian then it was OK for a Christian to take it. The Indians did not speak the same language as these white settlers and therefore could not tell them how they worshiped.

These same Christians were taught by the Indians how to grow plants in America and were kept from starving to death because of them. The Indians shared their ancestral lands with them.

Are you beginning to understand who was really acting Christian and who the savages were? Read about the Children Massacre at Ywahoo Falls in 1810. Do you know about Wounded Knee? Read the Cointelpro Papers. There's a real eye opener for you.

Maybe you should get a college education. We all know that the stereotypical college student just drinks and parties, right? If you are not going to get the facts correct, then maybe you should not speak. (Oh, you don't like being stereotypicalized? hmmmm...)

I think if you are going to write fiction, you should sell it as fiction. Are you beginning to see the whole picture? We are not the savages Mr. Klecjak. It was the white people who were savages under the guise of being Christian.

Do you want to be one of the people responsible for continuing these lies upon us? Are you afraid to show who we really are? We are a very noble people. We are very spiritual people, we worship everyday. We all have the same Creator. We may take a different path to get there, but it is to the same destination.

You should be writing a story about how upset you are at being lied to by your teachers all these years. I challenge you to read the facts, and then rewrite this story. Are you man enough? Indian-Giver? Yikes. Just how bigoted are you anyway?

IS AMERICA FREE?

I have a question. Do you feel that you need to be afraid of George Bush, that he will cut you out of the press room for being honest with the American People? This administration has shoveled nothing but fracking bull down your ears. People should not be afraid of their government, their government should be afraid of the people.

The last time I read the constitution freedom of the press is guaranteed and no government, be they state, town, provincial, county or even the central government, shall have power over truth. Iraq has been a frack job from day one. 20,000 wounded, maimed for life. 2,500 killed, another 200 killed from allied detachments. And their families left without brothers, sisters, cousins fathers and mothers.

I ask you ladies and gentlemen, fear not the government. Make it fear you by printing the truth about the war. You are the tool to turn on the lights in America. Be that tool, and chase the lies away from truth. I know many of you have read what I have written. It is time to stop burying our children. It is time to stop fearing our government.

Yin Man Wei said, "Those who fail to learn history are doomed to repeat it, those who fail to learn history correctly why they are simply doomed."

It is time to unite and throw off the blinders and the hatred and bigotry and say in one voice we will not walk quietly into the night, that come July 4, 2007 America reinvents itself. That we are all equal, be we members of the LGBT community, or any other culture in our land.

For in the United States of America we judge you for what you do, not who your father was or where you came from or whom you choose to love or be loved by for we are Christian, Judean, Wican, Celtic, Muslim Buddhist gay or straight. We worship one God or many Gods.

It is how we live that we are judged. Let us show the Bush family the door of the White House and every Republican governor the door which reads exit and do not ever come back. Arthur Casles said it well before the battle of Baden hill.

"The gift of freedom is ours by right, it is not in some far off land, it's in us and in our actions on this day, so if this be our destiny then so be it, but let history remember that as free men we chose to make it so."

WELCOME TO THE JUNGLE

an introduction to The Durfee Conservatory

UMass is a big place, as we all know. With our diverse interests and busy schedules, one could easily spend four years here never even aware of some of the invaluable resources and wonders that our University has to offer us. Many of you might have never been to Totman Gym, or even know where it is. Did you know it has a swimming pool open for your enjoyment? Some of you might never see the magnificent Stonehenge-like sundial at the edge of campus. There's the craft center, where you can learn leather working or photography in your free time! I myself have heard rumors that there's a big library somewhere down in the middle of campus. Maybe someday I'll visit it...

We are privileged, my fellow Minutemen and women. Only a small fraction of those who apply each year get to come to this University, and we are lucky enough to have the skills and the financial means – both not easy to come by – to be in that fraction. It's our privilege and practically our duty to take advantage of all that UMass has to offer us, to get out and explore the secrets of our campus. Without further ado, I proudly present to you one UMass's most overlooked and precious gems; the Durfee Conservatory.

Located at the base of Orchard Hill across the street from University Health Services (one place I'm sure most of us have discovered) sits Durfee, passed everyday by hundreds of students on their walk to class. Durfee is a magnificent five-room greenhouse unlike any other on campus. Every other greenhouse on campus is used in conjunction with a class or certain field of study, filled with rows and rows of the same, common plants, full of working students, often shut off from the public. Durfee Conservatory, contrarily, exists independently, as a living museum of sorts, full of truly rare and exotic plants from all over the world. This is no exaggeration, folks. Step into Durfee and you'll find cacti from Central and South America, Japanese Maples from Mount Fuji, Japan, a newly augmented collection of orchids from Hawaii and south Asia, bonsais, ferns, bromeliads, medicinal herbs, and the list goes on!

Be sure to walk through House 3, possibly Durfee's most precious exhibit, the tropical rainforest room, an authentic rainforest garden, complete with flowering trees reaching up to the ceiling, a bamboo patch, beautiful tropical flowers like Birds of Paradise, and even a tinkling pond with goldfish and coy fish and four friendly resident turtles! Stroll over it on the memorial footbridge and feed the fish in the sweet balmy air and peace and quiet – quite an escape on a gray day in January! And do feel free to step in, dear readers. Durfee is open to anyone who wishes to visit, five days a week, from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

At Durfee, independent means independent. Tragically, the greenhouse is no longer funded by the University on any level. It supports itself, by means of its ongoing plant sales (stop by and pick up an Aloe plant or Dwarf Jade to bring home to Mom!) and donations from several generous private plant enthusiasts and organizations, including Mr. Armand Prevost, Durfee's own dedicated and expert director and curator. It resides on campus, but otherwise Durfee is truly its own entity. It works in conjunction with many local and national organizations, trading and sharing collections, partaking in conventions and hosting respected horticultural scholars and enthusiasts. Almost weekly Durfee offers tours (given personally by Mr. Prevost) to local garden clubs, excited preschool classes, and visiting parents and students.

Besides Mr. Prevost, Durfee is staffed completely by students. Some are work-study students who are enrolled in the agricultural sciences and most are just dedicated volunteers. Some students are studying related fields and some not, though each one shares an interest and appreciation for this enchanting little world on campus. The Durfee staff is friendly and informed, and do whatever they can day in and day out to promote the greenhouse, which has seen livelier days.

The original Durfee Plant House was one of the first five buildings on campus, erected in 1867, even earlier than the first greenhouse was erected at Smith College. This is four years after our school – then Massachusetts Agricultural College – was founded. In its early years the conservatory received "world-wide attention" for its groundbreaking studies and experiments on different plants and fruits. Over the years Durfee added to its collection. In 1935 it received a large donation of plants from Harvard University. Then sadly in 1938 an entire house was destroyed by a fallen Oak tree.

The original elegant Victorian structure was torn down a few years later and the current Durfee greenhouse was constructed in 1954, becoming the new home to a now invaluable and renowned collection of flora. Since then Durfee has persisted, though its prestige and reputation have dwindled. Friends of Durfee was formed in 1990 in hopes of reversing this trend, with a mission to celebrate and preserve the greenhouse, recognizing it as a significant and unique resource on campus to students, faculty and public alike. For the last sixteen years, Friends of Durfee have been working to improve the space, adding a meditation garden on the south side, among other things.

So come by, step into our world and explore this special place. You'll be glad you did. The Collegian will keep you updated on what's happening at Durfee from week to week. We hope to see you there!

–Paul Jackmauh is a regular volunteer at Durfee Greenhouse and a plant enthusiast

The Durfee Conservatory holds a wide variety of bonsais, small plants that are surprisingly old. Some of the plants on display are well over 100 years old.

In the corner of Durfee's central plant house, a thicket of bamboo shoots hides a stone bench and tablet. The solidarity makes it perfect for meditation, or just a quiet place to sleep.

A tropical jungle awaits as you enter into the center plant house of Durfee Conservatory. Visitors are free to feed the dozens of goldfish and various coy fish beneath a walking bridge.

Broad benches and a small wooden stage are located outside, along the skirt of the grounds. Musical and performance groups are often seen performing in this area.

Ziggy Marley brings love tour

BY LAUREN MODISETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Everyone is familiar with the musical styles of Bob Marley, the Rastafarian legend. What many don't know is that one of his many sons, Ziggy Marley, is coming to Northampton's Calvin Theatre this Saturday, November 11.

Ziggy Marley is now on his "Love is My Religion" tour. Iron Horse Entertainment Group website www.iheg.com states Ziggy Marley first sat in on recording sessions with his father when he was ten years old. Joining with his three siblings to become The Melody Makers, Ziggy crafted his own soulful sound blending blues, R&B, hip-hop and reggae. After two decades as the driving creative force behind The Melody Makers; a triple Grammy-winning act which included brother Stephen and sisters Sharon and Cedella, Ziggy released his debut solo album in 2003, "Dragonfly."

Marley claims that his latest album "Love is my Religion" is "from his heart," and according to desertnews.com, Marley states, "I was just writing songs about love. And then I thought about the words and realized that love is my religion. And that's where the album's title came up. With the state of the world being as it is, with people fighting and citing religion as their cause, I thought about how negative religion is becoming. So my purpose of the album

Goodbye ambition, bonjour laziness: new literary release questions work ethic

BY J.M. FRIEDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Attention future middle managers of the corporate world: Getting into Isenberg's shiny, wireless classrooms will prove to be harder and more important than any challenge or project you will ever encounter in the workplace of big business. Your tasks are basically worthless and unproductive, and everything that you've learned in class and will one day contribute to your future position is hollow, and without a just cause. All this according to Corinne Maier, author of the do-nothing manual, "Bonjour Laziness: Why Hard Work Doesn't Pay"

Written in the wake of the big business scandals that crushed Enron and Vivendi, Bonjour Laziness stumbles along a line somewhere between dead serious social commentary and "Office Space" style subversion handbook. While Maier admits in the introduction that the book is "intentionally cynical", her work deals with important and under-discussed aspects of loyalty, motivation, and fulfillment in the corporate world. At times, Bonjour Laziness reads like a manifesto for worker revolution. At other moments it appears to be nothing more than a tongue-in cheek stab at corporate structure. The reader is left to pick and choose the true message.

A 2004 bestseller in her home country of France, Maier was nearly fired from her job as a part-time economist at EDF, a state-owned corporation. In her free time, of which she had plenty, Maier has penned nine books and practices psychoanalysis. Neither of which should surprise the reader, as the book flows with comedic ease through 144 pages and reads like a self help manual.

The misfortune of Bonjour Laziness is twofold: The funniness of the work detracts from its apt criticism of corporate business while making the resulting discourse of ethics and purpose in the workplace less critical and immediate. Questions of job security and personal fulfillment in the corporate world are pressing issues for college students as they prepare for white-collar jobs that demand heavy hours and workloads. Commentary on the hypocrisy of business and the worthlessness of all things corporate is no joking matter to the future occupants of cubicles and boardrooms.

While Maier offers keen diagnosis of the idiosyncrasies within corporate jargon and practice, she fails to offer the reader any resolutions to the predicament she so carefully dissects. In a Newsweek interview, Maier was asked, "What's the solution" to which she responded, "I don't know. I write about the problems, but solutions I leave to someone else. It's too difficult for me to figure that out."

What Maier lacks in solutions to the "big questions" of corporate sustainability and happiness in the workplace, she makes up for with a game plan of subterfuge that would make Dilbert proud. Maier accomplishes this end through, by her own admission, sufficiently demoralizing the worker to cause the loss of desire to work for his/her corporation, and providing that new slacker with the cunning and deftness to cover up their lack of production. All this from a woman who declares, "It's curtains for business. Just look at the facts: it's no longer a place of success."

See LAZINESS on page 7

New book fails to show substance

"It's appropriate a Frenchwoman has written it," remarked Donald Trump.

Essentially, Maier advocates "active disengagement", "time theft" and other forms of subtle sabotage at the workplace. According to Bonjour Laziness, the 'hard work' of older generations is dead, and downrightstupid. The only thing worth doing during office hours: nothing. In the opening chapter, "Business Is Not Humanistic" Maier reveals that she makes her own young children promise to never go into business, and advocates that the children of the middle class should bail on the corporate world by, "heading for professions less integrated into the capitalist game (the arts, sciences, teaching) or by withdrawing partially from the corporate world, middle finger elegantly raised as a parting gesture"

While Maier claims not to be political, one cannot help but observe that she seems to be advocating a small sort of social revolution, while predicting the impending doom of corporations as we know them. In handling such heavy issues with the tone she does, Maier appears nothing more than a poorly disguised wolf in sheep's clothing. 'Hey I'm only joking, but I'm really not.' For the sake of the future occupants of the corporate world, let's get serious.

Influential rock pioneer Lou Reed's eyes are on the future

BY SHAY QUILLEN
SAN JOSE MERCURY NEWS, CALIF.

Lou Reed isn't one to focus on the past.

The music he created in the 1960s and '70s remains a touchstone for the hippest rock bands. But Reed would rather talk about his new Moog Voyager synthesizer – "the Stradivarius of electronics," he calls it – and the possibilities of today.

"There couldn't be a better time to be a musician than right now with all these astonishing instruments available," says Reed, 64. "I mean, someone's gonna put this stuff together in a different way, somebody really smart, and just bust it open."

That's exactly what Reed and his bandmates did with the Velvet Underground in the 1960s, bringing pop art, hard-boiled literature and avant-garde musical techniques into rock 'n' roll to create something that flopped commercially at the time but still is reverberating 40 years later.

After leaving the band in 1970, Reed received as much attention throughout the '70s for his provocative public image as for his wildly inconsistent recorded output, which included his only hit single, "Walk on the Wild Side."

At the end of the decade he got married and sobered up, and for the past 25 years, he more or less has settled into his status as a serious writer and musician and respected elder statesman of rock. For the past decade he has shared a home in New York City with his partner, performance artist Laurie Anderson.

Although Reed's commercial impact has been moderate, his influence – particularly from the work with the VU – has shown no signs of going away.

In the '70s, Reed's androgynous image and aggressive attitude inspired glam and punk rockers. In the '80s, such college-rock bands as R.E.M. responded to Reed's melodic pop songs and tender ballads. In the '90s, it was the British "shoegazer" movement, with feedback-drenched music from such bands as My Bloody Valentine and the Jesus and Mary Chain.

Reed's influence popped up again in the new millennium with the emergence of the New York garage rock scene: the Strokes, the Yeah Yeah Yeahs and Interpol, as well as like-minded bands from other regions, including Detroit's White Stripes.

Rock connoisseur Lou Reed has been trying to put a focus on today's young musicians, hoping that music will once again "go a little deeper."
